

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF TENNESSEE EX REL. KATIE SPRATLIN, Appt.,

v.

LOUIS P. THOMPSON.

(118 Tenn. 571, 102 S. W. 349.)

Judgment — default — failure to call defendant.

1. Failure to call out defendant prior to the entry of a default judgment will not render the judgment void.

Trial — default — substantial damages.

2. Failure to file in court the insurance policy on which suit is brought will preclude the entry of a substantial judgment by the court on default without the intervention of a jury.

Mandamus — parties.

3. An insurance company against which a judgment has been rendered by default is a necessary party to a mandamus pro-

Subject Note. — Necessity of jury to compute damages on default judgment.

I. American cases, 1.

II. English cases, 33.

III. Summary, 35.

I. American cases.

Alabama:

In this state, in actions on contracts in writing designating the amount due, a jury is held not necessary. This was provided for by an early statute and the present Code, but some of the cases do not refer to any statute or Code. Where the damages are fixed by statute it is also held that a jury is not necessary. It seems that in all cases not within the exception of the Code or statutory provision, a jury is necessary; and this applies to cases on contracts where evidence is required, as well as to cases of torts and unliquidated damages. This is in accord with the common-law rule.

So, under Ala. Rev. Code, § 2682, provided.

ceeding to compel the issuance of a fieri facias thereon.

Execution — vacated judgment.

4. The clerk cannot issue an execution on a judgment which has been set aside by the court.

Same — remedy.

5. Mandamus to compel the issuance of an execution is not the proper remedy to question the propriety of the court's action in setting aside a judgment.

(May 11, 1907.)

APPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Shelby County dismissing a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the issuance of an execution. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas M. Scruggs, for appellant:

The order purporting to set aside the judgment was void.

ing that a written instrument purporting to be signed by defendant's agent must be received in evidence without proof of execution, unless denied by affidavit, and Rev. Code, § 2770, providing for judgment by default without a jury, it was held that, in an action on a certificate of deposit, a jury was not necessary in default. Talladega Ins. Co. v. Woodward, 44 Ala. 287.

And, under Ala. Code, § 2740, authorizing a judgment by default without a jury in an action founded on a written instrument ascertaining the demand, it was held that a jury was not necessary in a default in an action on a note and interest. Allen v. Lathrop-Hatton Lumber Co. 90 Ala. 490, 8 So. 120.

And a note to pay principal, interest, and 10 per cent attorneys' fees was held sufficiently definite to support judgment by default for the entire amount due, including the attorneys' fees, without the intervention of a jury, under Ala. Code 1886, § 2740. Wood v. Winship Mach. Co. 83 Ala. 424, 3 Am. St. Rep. 754, 3 So. 757.

judgment against a cosurety on a motion, it was held that it was the practice for the court to receive proof and render judgment where the defendant did not make an issue to be tried by the jury. Irwin v. Scruggs, 32 Ala. 516. The court said: "The statute which authorizes the rendition of judgment final, upon judgment by default, nil dicit, or on demurrer, where the action is founded upon an instrument of writing ascertaining the plaintiff's demand, has no application to this case, and is not to be construed as prohibiting the rendition of a judgment without the intervention of a jury in all cases not described by it."

The same was held in Barclay v. Barclay, 42 Ala. 345.

Under the city charter of Decatur, providing for a city court and authorizing questions of fact to be tried by the court without a jury unless a jury is demanded, it was held that a jury was not necessary in a default. Decatur & N. Improv. Co. v. Crass, 97 Ala. 524, 12 So. 41. The court said: "It is insisted, however, that the defendant may not desire to make defense to the merits in a suit on an unliquidated demand, and abstain therefrom, reserving the right to appear after judgment by default and give evidence in mitigation or reduction of the damages. . . . When the complaint was filed in this case, it was competent for defendant to have made its demand for a jury by writing it on the complaint. It did not do it, and it cannot be relieved of its own negligence on appeal to this court." The cause of action does not appear, except that it was an attachment against a nonresident.

It was held that an action against an indorser on a note could be rendered without the intervention of a jury, under Ala. act 1812, providing that in all actions founded on any writing, ascertaining the sum sued for, if judgment by default be entered therein, the court may enter judgment for the demand without the intervention of a jury. Chapman v. Arrington, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 480; McKenzie v. Clanton, 33 Ala. 528; Malone v. Hathaway, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 29. In the last case the court said: "We are all of 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

opinion that the judgment by nil dicit in this case was clearly within the statute, and final, without the necessity or resorting to a jury to assess damages."

In an action of assumpsit against an indorser of a bill of exchange, where the indorsement was made in this state and the law controlled the rate of damages, it was held that a jury was not necessary. Cullum v. Casey, 9 Port. (Ala.) 131, 33 Am. Dec. 304.

So, in an action against an indorser of a bill of exchange, it was held that a jury was not necessary, as a default admitted that the steps necessary to fix the liability had been taken, and also admitted the amount of the bill and damages recoverable. Henderson v. Howard, 2 Ala. 343.

In an action against a drawee of a bill of exchange it was held that a jury was not necessary, as a default admitted that all steps necessary to fix the liabilities had been taken. Randolph v. Parish, 9 Port. (Ala.) 76.

But in an action against the indorser of a note not payable in bank, it was held that a jury was necessary as evidence was required to fix the liability of the indorser, where there was no allegation of a suit against the maker nor any showing that such suit could be dispensed with. If it was mercantile paper it was necessary that the signatures of the maker and indorser should be proved. Langdon v. Williams, 22 Ala. 681.

So, in an action against an indorser on a common money count, it was held that a jury was necessary, as it did not appear to be founded on an instrument in writing ascertaining the sum due. Kennon v. M'Rae, 3 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 249. In this case the first count of the complaint was on the indorsement, but did not allege demand and notice; the second count was for money had and received, but this did not appear to be on an instrument in writing; and the first count, being bad, would not support a judgment on the second count by referring to the first count.

Nell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the March term, 1906, the case of Katie Spratlin against the United States Casualty Company in the circuit court of Shelby county, a judgment by default was rendered against the defendant in that case for $5,172. The judgment recites that the plaintiff "moved the court for a judgment against the defendant for the amount of the debt and interest sued on in said declaration, and evidenced by the policy sued upon; the defendant having been properly served with process herein, and having failed to file any pleas to said declaration." The entry does not show that the defendant was called out; nor does it appear that the policy had been filed with the record. The record shows, on the contrary, that it was not filed until a subsequent term; that is to say, the judgment by default was rendered on May 12, 1906, and the policy was filed October 24, 1906.

On the 2d of June, 1906, which was during the May term of the circuit court, the following entry was made in the cause referred to:

Katie Spratlin

v.

U. S. Casualty Co.

This cause came on to be heard on the could be taken without a jury, as a jury would be bound by the valuation fixed by the parties. Spain v. Grove, Minor (Ala.) 177.

And in an action on a note containing a stipulation for 10 per cent for attorneys' fees it was held that a jury was not necessary on default. Ledbetter & Co. v. Vinton, 108 Ala. 644, 18 So. 692.

And in an action of debt it was held that the court could render final judgment on default without writ of inquiry. Pettigrew v. Pettigrew, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 586. It was held that the Alabama act of 1812, giving a summary remedy by petition to the county court to recover a legacy, was cumulative to the remedy provided by Ala. act 1803, p. 333.

After an action on a note was begun it was stipulated that, if not paid within a certain time, a judgment by default for the debt and damages, without a jury, could be entered. This was held sufficient waiver of a jury trial, especially as the claim sued on was a note. People's Ice Co., v. People's Nat. Bank, 133 Ala. 248, 31 So. 804.

On a trial against a sheriff and his sureties for failure to return an execution, where the measure of damages was fixed by statute, it was held that there was no necessity for the intervention of a jury on a default. Garey v. Edwards, 15 Ala. 105.

So, in an action for a statutory penalty against a corporation engaging in business without complying with the statute, it was held that it was not necessary for a writ of inquiry to assess the damages, as judgment had to be rendered for the amount of the penalty, if for anything. Tennessee Mut. Bldg. & L. Asso. v. State, 99 Ala. 197, 13 So. 687.

But, in an action on an account, it was held that, on default judgment, a jury was necessary, under Ala. Code, § 3032, which is substantially the same as § 2366 of the prior Code, providing that default judgments be entered by the clerk in actions on instruments of writing ascertaining the plaintiff's demand. Rhea v. Holston Salt & Plaster Co. 59 Ala. 182.

sold and delivered and for money paid, it was held that, under Ala. Code, § 2366, a jury was necessary. Porter v. Burleson, 38 Ala. 343.

The intervention of a jury was held necessary in an action on a fire-insurance policy, as this was not an action on an instrument of writing ascertaining the plaintiff's demand, under Ala. Code 1876, § 3032. Manhattan F. Ins. Co. v. Fowler, 76 Ala. 372. The amount of plaintiff's loss could not be known without the aid of evidence.

And an action on a fire-insurance policy was held not to be one authorizing a final judgment after default without a jury, under Ala. Code 1886, § 2740. Home Protection v. Caldwell, 85 Ala. 607, 5 So. 338.

In an action for unpaid calls for railroad stock, it was held that a jury was necessary on default, as there were no instruments of writing ascertaining the plaintiff's demand, as provided by Ala. Code, § 2366. Connolly v. Alabama & T. Rivers R. Co. 29 Ala. 373.

So, in an action for damages for cutting timber, it was held that a jury was necessary to assess the damages on judgment by default. Wagon v. Turner, 73 Ala. 197. This was on the ground that it was not an action founded upon an instrument in writing ascertaining the plaintiff's demand.

And, where the action was not on contract in writing, it was held error to render final judgment on appeal by default without a jury. Kenum v. Henderson, 6 Ala. 132. The statute authorizes a final judgment by the court in actions on written evidence of debt if under $20.

On a motion prosecuted against sureties on a bond against a deceased sheriff, where judgment by default was had, with leave to execute a writ of inquiry, it was held that this was proper; but it was also held that the judgment entry should have shown that every material averment of the motion was proved. Chandler v. Reid, 114 Ala. 390, 21 So. 475.

In an action to recover compensation for recopying records it was said that, after judgment by default, it was necessary to execute a writ of inquiry. Washington County v. Porter, 128 Ala. 278, 29 So. 185.

motion of defendant to set aside the judgment by default heretofore entered, to wit, on May 12, 1906, and to reinstate the cause, which said judgment by default was granted on the statement made by counsel for plaintiff that it would be set aside if any counsel appeared and made application therefor. And, counsel for plaintiff having appeared in open court and assented thereto, it is accordingly ordered and adjudged that said judgment by default be set aside and this cause reinstated; and defendant is allowed thirty days within which to plead.

On the 23d of June the pleas of the defendant in that case were filed.

On October 24, 1906, a petition for mandamus was filed against the clerk, and that petition is the foundation of the present action.

In a suit on a foreign judgment, it was held that the common law would be presumed to prevail, and that the plaintiff would not be entitled to any notice with reference to the execution of the writ of inquiry awarded on defendant's counterclaim where plaintiff was in default. Christian & C. Co. v. Coleman, 125 Ala. 158, 27 So. 786.

And, where there was a partial breach of a written contract of sale, it was held that, in order to recover damages not liquidated, it was necessary to have a jury. McPherson v. Robertson, 82 Ala. 459, 2 So. 333. This was an action to recover a penalty.

And, where the declaration claimed a certain sum as debt, but did not show such a contract as, by the statute of Alabama or by any principle of common law, authorized final judgment by default, it was held error to render final judgment without the intervention of a jury. Martin v. Price, Minor (Ala.) 68.

Under the common law, in all actions in which uncertain damages were sought to be recovered, it was held that they were to be assessed by a verdict before judgment could be recovered. It was also held that the damages should be assessed by verdict before judgment could be rendered, under Ala. Laws 1802, 304, § 7, providing that any person who shall cut down a tree on land not his own, without the consent of the owner, shall forfeit and pay for each tree so cut. Byrne v. Haines, Minor (Ala.) 286.

And, it was held in Phillips v. Malone, Minor (Ala.) 110, that final judgment without a jury could not be taken on a note for the payment in property at a stated price.

On a judgment by default on a contract to pay a certain sum for staves at $2 a thousand, subject to deduction for those not furnished, it was held that the court could not render judgment without the intervention of a jury. It was necessary to allege what staves were procured by plaintiff, and it was also necessary to prove this fact, as the writing did not furnish any data as to 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The petition, after reciting the recovery of the judgment by default and the order setting it aside, further alleges that the last-mentioned order was made without petitioner's consent and over her protest; furthermore, that the judge had no power to enter the order, since the term of the court at which the judgment by default was rendered had already terminated. It further alleges that, on the 16th of October, 1906, the petitioner demanded of the clerk of the circuit court a writ of habeas corpus, but the clerk refused to issue it. Thereupon the petitioner prayed that a mandamus be issued, commanding the clerk to issue the writ.

The United States Casualty Company was not made a party to the proceeding.

A copy of the record in the case in which the fi. fa. was sought accompanied the petition, and from it appeared the facts con-the amount. Martin v. Woodall, 1 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 244.

And, where evidence was necessary to ascertain the rate of interest of another state, in an action on a note, it was held in Evans v. Irvin, 1 Port. (Ala.) 390, that, under the Alabama statute, judgment by default could not be rendered without a jury.

In an action of debt on a foreign judgment and for damages to the extent of interest, it was held in Murray v. Cone, 8 Port. (Ala.) 250, that it was necessary to have a jury or an inquiry as to damages. The statute or usage of the place of judgment should be proved.

So, the rate of interest in another state will not be judicially noticed, and must be proved. It was held that in an action of debt on a judgment from another state asking interest it was necessary to have a jury on default. Clarke v. Pratt, 20 Ala. 470.

And a jury was held necessary in an action on a contract for the payment of rent for land supposed to contain 10 acres, more or less, as the sum was not fixed with precision, but had to be ascertained by the quantity of the land rented. Driver v. Spence, 3 Ala. 98.

In an action on a written contract for the receipt of so much money, "for which I agree to account on a final settlement," it was held that a jury was necessary, as proof of demand and settlement was required. Wellborn v. Sheppard, 5 Ala. 674.

And, in an action of debt on an administration bond, against the principal sureties, where it was necessary to prove a devastavit, it was held that a jury was necessary. Amason v. Nash, 24 Ala. 279.

In an action of assumpsit it was held that on a default judgment final judgment would have to be by jury. Beville v. Reese, 25 Ala. 451; Young v. McLemore, 3 Ala. 295.

Arkansas:

Under an Arkansas statute, default judgments in actions on writings may be rendered by the court where the amount due is shown by the instrument; in other cases a netted with the judgment by default and the order setting it aside, and the other facts above detailed. The declaration in that cause was as follows:

"The plaintiff, Katie Spratlin, sues the defendant, United States Casualty Company, a corporation doing business in the state of Tennessee, for the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000), with interest thereon since October 16, 1905, and, for the cause of such action, shows: That the defendant corporation is doing business in Tennessee, with power to insure the lives of persons and to issue its policies therefor. That, in consideration of the premium then and there paid by plaintiff to the defendant, the defendant did, on the 5th day of January, 1904, issue its policy to the plaintiff upon the life of William A. Spratlin, which policy is numbered 163,589, and denominated

"Peerless Policy of Personal Accident Insurance," which policy is here to the court shown. That, by said policy of insurance, or contract, the defendant obligated, promised, and bound itself to pay to the plaintiff, Katie M. Spratlin, wife of W. A. Spratlin, the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000) upon satisfactory proof of the death of William A. Spratlin. While said policy was in full force and effect said William A. Spratlin received a bodily injury, effected exclusively and directly by external, violent, and accidental means, independent of any other cause, resulting in the immediate death of said William A. Spratlin, due notice of which was given the defendant, as provided in said contract. That, according to the terms of said contract or policy, the payment of said $5,000 was demanded of the defendant, but the same was refused, and writ of inquiry is necessary. There was some confusion in regard to actions on penal bonds, under the act of 1843, but the statute has been changed so that a court may assess the damages, except for a breach of condition other than the payment of money, and except in proceedings on official bonds.

So, in an action on an open account it was held that Ark. act 1866-67, p. 210, providing that a party upon his oath may make a prima facie case when the opposing party does not dispute such evidence, did not change the time or mode of trial, nor restrict the defendant's right to trial by jury where it was not waived. Gould's Dig. (Ark.) p. 858, § 81, provides that, when an interlocutory judgment shall be rendered by default in any suit founded upon an instrument of writing, and the demand is ascertained in such instrument, the court shall assess the damages; and in all other cases the damages shall be assessed by a jury. Hodges v. Crawford, 25 Ark. 565.

And, where a judgment was rendered on default on an appeal from a judgment on an account, it was held error where no jury was called. Pirani v. Allhime, 4 Ark. 440.

And, where the only plea filed was want of jurisdiction in an action on an account, it was held error for the court to render final judgment without a writ of inquiry, where it overruled the plea to the jurisdiction. Evans v. Parks, 10 Ark. 306. It was also held that the plea to the jurisdiction was well taken.

And, in an action on a bill of exchange for damages, interest, and protest, it was held that the amount of the instrument could be ascertained on default, but that damages arising out of protest, under Ark. Dig. chap. 25, should be settled on proof, for which a jury was necessary. Johnson v. Frank, 16 Ark. 199. Ark. Dig. 126, §§ 81, 82, provides that, on a judgment by default in a suit founded upon any instrument of writing, where the demand is ascertained by such instrument, the court shall assess damages, and in all other cases of such interlocutory judgment the damages shall be assessed by a jury.

And, in an action of covenant on an instrument payable in current bank notes of the state of Arkansas, it was held that a jury was necessary. McKiel v. Porter, 4 Ark. 534. This was because an action of covenant was for damages for breach of contract, and the extent of damages must depend upon the evidence introduced. Plaintiff was entitled to recover only the value of the notes at the time they were to have been paid.

And, in an action of covenant, it was held necessary that a jury should assess the damages on default, in Johnson v. Pierce, 12 Ark. 599. This was because the court could pronounce upon and ascertain only liquidated demands.

An action on a writing payable in current bank notes was held to be one for unliquidated damages; and it was held that a writ of inquiry was necessary to show the value of the bank notes. Ellett v. Chilton, 5 Ark. 181.

And, where damages could not be assessed by calculation, it was held that on default a jury was necessary, in Wallace v. Henry, 5 Ark. 105. This was an action on a note payable in "Arkansas state bank paper."

In an action on recognizances given on appeal, where the appeals were dismissed with costs for want of prosecution, it was held that a writ of inquiry should have been awarded to assess the damages, and not judgment nil dicit for the whole amount of the recognizance. Ashley v. Brasil, 1 Ark. 144.

And, in an action of replevin, on judgment by default, it was held that an inquest for damages should be held. Jetton v. Smead, 29 Ark. 372. In this case the plaintiff would have to prove the value of the cotton, so that he could take an alternative judgment for the value in case its delivery could not be had.

In an action of debt on a penal bond conditioned for the conveyance of land, and for the defendant still fails and refuses to pay the same without cause. That said failure and refusal to pay said sum of $5,000 by the defendant is not in good faith, and the plaintiff has been forced to an additional cost of $1,250. Plaintiff therefore sues the defendant for the sum of $6,250, with interest thereon since the 16th day of October, 1905, as provided by said contract and the laws of Tennessee; and the plaintiff demands a jury to try the issues involved in this cause."

The circuit judge declined to issue the alternative writ prayed for in the petition, and dismissed the petition. Upon this action of the court the petitioner appealed to this court, and has here assigned errors.

During the argument a question was suggested concerning the failure of the plaintiff to call out the defendant in the original cause before the default was taken.

Good practice requires that the party should be called out, and that entry be made of the fact; but failure to do this will not make the judgment void. 6 Enc. Pl. & Pr. pp. 78, 79. The rule is probably more stringent when the default is entered on an appearance bond in criminal cases as a preliminary step to the issuance of a scire facias. State v. Grigsby, 3 Yerg. 280; White v. State, 5 Yerg. 183, 184.

In all cases where the default is taken upon an instrument showing a present indebtedness, as a bond, bill, or note, or liquidated account, signed by the parties, so that the amount may be ascertained by simple failure to convey, it was held that a writ of inquiry was necessary to ascertain the damages on default. Lee v. Leech, 9 Ark. 423.

But, where a court could make the computation in an action on a bail bond, the damages being the recovery in the original suit, with interest, it was held that a jury was not necessary. Leech v. Pirani, 5 Ark. 118. The court said: "The rule being well established that, where the damages are mere matter of figures, and it is perfectly clear what the damages must be, the court may always assess them upon judgment by default, or nil dicit."

In Williams v. State, 10 Ark. 256, an action of debt on an official bond of a sheriff for failing to pay over county revenues, it was held that on default a jury was necessary, under Ark. Dig. chap. 120.

In an action on a delivery bond it was held that there must be a jury on a default, as it was a bond other than for the payment of money. Jennings v. Ashley, 5 Ark. 128. The court said: "The 41st, 42d, and 45th sections of chap. 60, Rev. Stat. pp. 380, 381, provided the means of ascertaining the quantum of damages on a forfeited delivery bond. But the above sections, together with the 39th, are repealed by act of 3d December, 1840, pamphlet act, p. 5, so that the statutory means therein prescribed no longer remain."

And, in an action on a forfeited delivery bond, where the cause of action arose before the passage of the act of 1843, it was held that the amount of damages would have to be ascertained by a jury under Ark. Rev. Stat. chap. 112, §§ 5-8. McKisick v. Brodie, 6 Ark. 375.

And, in an action on a forfeited delivery bond, it was held that a writ of inquiry was necessary. Pelham v. Page, 6 Ark. 148. But this was overruled in Calloway v. Roane, 7 Ark. 354, holding that Ark. Acts 1842, p. 49, act 1843, provides that, where any delivery bond has been forfeited, and no judgment entered, plaintiff may, on motion and notice, obtain judgment as judgment on penal bonds, the court ascertaining the damages. The court said that in Pelham v. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Page, supra, the court overlooked the statute that authorized the court to ascertain the damages.

Since Ark. act January 7, 1843, it was held that the court could assess the damages on a judgment, on motion, on a forfeited delivery bond. Hall v. Fowles, 8 Ark. 175.

In Nelson v. Hubbard, 8 Ark. 477, it was held that the Arkansas act of 1813, concerning judgments on delivery bonds, which authorized the court to assess damages, applied only to summary proceedings. Where it was a common-law proceeding on the bond, it was held that a jury was necessary to assess the damages.

But it was said in Chapline v. Robertson, 44 Ark. 202, that now, by statute, a default authorizes the court to assess the damages in an action on a penal bond, without calling a jury.

So, likewise, the cases of Jennings v. Ashley; Nelson v. Hubbard; McKisick v. Brodie; and Johnson v. Pierce,—supra, holding that, in actions on penal bonds, the intervention of a jury is indispensable, have been superseded by an alteration of the statute.

In an action on a bond conditioned for the payment of a less sum, where the amount due could be ascertained by computation, it was held that the court could assess damages on default without a jury. Witt v. State, 14 Ark. 173. This was an action on a bond given by sureties of a sheriff reciting that there remained due a given amount which was to be void if sums were paid on a certain day. It was said that the Arkansas statute, title "Penal Bonds" provides for three classes of cases,—the first four sections relate to actions on bonds for the payment of a less sum of money, §§ 5-15 apply to suit on bonds for a breach of the condition other than the payment of money, §§ 15, etc., regulate the mode of proceeding on official bonds, including administrators and guardians; and it is only in the last two classes of cases that a jury must be called, unless waived, to assess the damage. The court said: "But, upon the reading of the statute, those provisions have no application to actions on bonds conditioned for the payment of a less sum, and where the amount calculation from the papers, judgment may be entered at once upon default taken without the intervention of a jury; but in all other cases a jury is required to fix the amount. Masonic Educational Asso. v. Cook, 3 Head, 313; Williams v. Bank of Tennessee, 1 Coldw. 44-46; Mississippi & T. R. Co. v. Green, 9 Heisk. 588, 593; Beeler v. Huddleston, 3 Coldw. 201, 204; 3 Meigs's Dig. p. 1699, § 1723; Id. p. 2019, § 2823.

Manifestly, if the suit be based upon such a bill, bond, or note as above referred to, but there is no such instrument filed in the cause, there are no "papers" from which the calculation can be made; and such was the case in which the judgment by default was entered. A jury was therefore, under the facts stated, necessary before judgment could be entered for anything more than nominal damages. It is true that profert of the policy was made in the declaration; but this only means, not that the paper is in court, but that the plaintiff has it, and holds himself in readiness to produce it upon demand. Caruthers. History of a Lawsuit, 184, 186; Standard Loan & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Thornton, 97 Tenn. 1, 40 S. W. 136.

The judgment was entered for $5,172 without a jury. It would therefore be wholly improper for us to award the writ of mandamus to compel the issuance of an execution on such a judgment, since the court would thereby lend its aid to the effectuation of a palpable injustice. Moreover, the proper parties are not before the court. The person whose interest is most vitally due is ascertained, or ascertainable by computation from the face of the instrument itself, as is the case here. In all such cases the penalty is inserted rather as an adherence to ancient form, and not because it is an essential part of the contract; and, while no good reason can be imagined for the intervention of a jury to assess the damages, the statute is not so unreasonable as to require it." California:

In California, under the practice act and Code provisions, a jury is held not necessary in actions on contract. In ejectment suits the practice is to dispense with a jury on defaults. It seems that, where the amount is not ascertainable by calculation from a contract, a jury is required; and the court may order a jury in damage suits. In some of the cases the Code was not cited.

Cal. practice act 1851, § 150, provides that, in actions arising on contracts for the recovery of money or damages, if no answer is filed, the clerk may enter default judgment for the amount specified in the summons, and in other actions, if the taking of an account or the proof of any fact be necessary, the court may hear or order a reference; and where the action is for damages, the court may order the damages to be assessed by a jury, or by a reference if the examination of a long account is necessary. It was held that, in an action on an unliquidated demand where the summons stated the amount for which the plaintiff would take judgment, a writ of inquiry was not necessary. Hartman v. Williams, 4 Cal. 254. This was an action for violating a verbal contract of employment. The same provisions are carried into the Code of Procedure of 1902, § 585.

In Alexander v. McDow, 108 Cal. 25, 41 Pac. 24, which was an action on a note for 10 per cent for attorneys' fees, it was held that the sum asked was susceptible of exact determination by calculation, and it was proper on a default to render judgment for the amount.

In an action of assumpsit, where the complaint was on the common money counts and also a count that plaintiff was the assignee of city warrants which were unpaid, it was held that a default could be taken although some of the counts were imperfect; but this did not affect the right of the plaintiff to take judgment on those that were good. Hunt v. San Francisco, 11 Cal. 250.

In an action of ejectment, where the complaint alleged damages in a certain sum for ouster, and there was no issue as to the damages alleged, it was held that no proof was required, as that is the practice in this state. Johnson v. Vance, 86 Cal. 110, 24 Pac. 862.

In ejectment after judgment by default it was held in Smith v. Billett, 15 Cal. 23, that it was not error to refuse a jury trial, because there was then no issue to try.

In an action of damages against the sheriff for wrongfully seizing money on an illegal assessment for taxes, where the complaint was verified, it was held that, on a default, no proof was required, and the court could render judgment. Tuolumne Redemption Co. v. Patterson, 18 Cal. 415. This question of jury does not seem to have been discussed.

On service of the summons and failure of the defendant to appear, it was held that the court acquired jurisdiction, by reason of the default, to enter judgment, and it was not necessary that a formal default should have been previously entered by the clerk. Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc. v. Matthai, 116 Cal. 424, 48 Pac. 370. This was an action of foreclosure.

But, under Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 585, subd. 1, authorizing the clerk to enter judgment on default in actions arising on contracts for the recovery of money or damages only, it was held that he could not enter judgment in an action for damages for trespass as it was not an action on contract, —especially as the complaint did not specify for what sum the judgment would be entered. Shay v. Chicago Clock Co. 111 Cal. 549, 44 Pac. 237.

Colorado:

In Colorado, where the action is for money only, due on a writing, and the amount rests in computation, a jury is not necessary by statute. In other cases a jury has been concerned, the United States Casualty Company, is wholly omitted. All persons interested should be made parties. State ex rel. Lyle v. Willett, 117 Tenn. 334, 97 S. W. 299; Powell v. People, 214 Ill. 475, 105 Am. St. Rep. 117, 73 N. E. 795; Austin v. Cahill (Tex. Civ. App.) 88 S. W. 536.

In addition to the foregoing, it is clear the clerk did not wrongfully refuse to issue the execution. He could act only in obedience to his records. In the face of a minute entry setting aside the judgment on which the petitioner asked him to issue an execution, he could not issue such execution. It was not for him to pass judgment on the act of the circuit judge in setting aside the judgment. He was only a ministerial officer. State v. Miller, 1 Lea, 590, 606, 607; State v. Wilbur, 101 Tenn. 211, 220, 47 S. W. 411; 2 Spelling, Inj. & Extr. Rem. §§ 1378, 1418.

If the petitioner desired to question the entry setting aside the judgment by default, she should have brought to this court by the writ of certiorari the case in which the entry was made, and the error, if any, could have been corrected in that form. Possibly, held necessary. The later Code provisions authorize the court to assess damages.

Whether it is constitutional to authorize clerks in vacation to enter default judgments was held to be a question not necessary to discuss at length, in Phelan v. Ganabin, 5 Colo. 14; but it was held that the statutory conditions give the sentence of judgment, the statute directs the judgment, and the clerk has no judicial functions.

This case was approved in Terpening v. Holton, 9 Colo. 308, 12 Pac. 189.

In an action for damages for diverting water in an irrigating ditch, it was held that a jury was necessary on default. Jones v. Stevens, 1 Colo. 67. Colo. act 1861, p. 275, changed the common-law rule so as to permit the clerk to assess damages where the action was on a writing for the payment of money only, and where damages rest in computation.

At common law, on a judgment by default a writ of inquiry was necessary and issued to ascertain the damages of the plaintiff. It was held that this procedure was modified and adopted by Colo. practice act, § 15, Rev. Stat. 506, for the district courts. By probate act, § 28, Rev. Stat. 526, the rules of practice for district courts were prescribed for probate courts. Colorado Springs Co. v. Hewitt, 3 Colo. 275. It was held that in a default in probate court, where the damages did not rest in computation, a writ of inquiry was necessary, and the inquiry should be by a jury of twelve men.

In an action of debt on a recognizance of bail it was held that a judgment by default could be entered for the amount of the penalty without a jury, as there was nothing for a jury to determine. Crump v. People, 2 Colo. 316.

also, the action of the court could have been corrected by appeal or writ of error.

The learned counsel for petitioner has cited numerous authorities (Bronson v. Schulden, 104 U. S. 410, 26 L. ed. 797; Anderson v. Thompson, 7 Lea, 262; State v. Dalton, 109 Tenn. 549, 72 S. W. 456; Johnson v. Russell, MSS. Jackson, April term, 1895) to the effect that a judgment cannot be set aside at a subsequent term of the court. Without controverting these authorities at all, we only say that the question cannot be brought before this court in the manner attempted. Mandamus is an extraordinary writ, and can be resorted to only when other remedies fail. Re Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 131 U. S. clxxx. Appx. and 26 L. ed. 561; 2 Spelling, Inj. & Extr. Rem. §§ 1308, 1309; High, Extr. Legal Rem. 3d ed. § 39.

The foregoing objections are insuperable obstacles in the way of the maintaining of the petition.

It results that there is no error in the judgment of the court below, and it must be affirmed.

In an action for unliquidated damages it was held that evidence was necessary in a default. Colo. Civ. Code, chap. 11, relating to judgments on failure to answer, provides that, if the taking of an account or proof is necessary to enable the court to assess the damages, the court may hear the proof or may order a reference; or, where the action is for damages, in whole or part, the court may order the damages to be assessed by a jury, or they may be assessed by the court. Ruth v. Smith, 29 Colo. 154, 68 Pac. 278.

Under a similar provision (Colo. Code Civ. Proc. § 168), it was held that the evidence and final judgment should be taken in the county where the court was sitting. Hotchkiss v. First Nat. Bank, 37 Colo. 228, 85 Pac. 1007, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 393.

In an action on a note where the defendant was in default and the amount was liquidated, ascertainable from the terms of the contract, it was held that the judgment was properly rendered by the court, under Colo. Code 1883, §§ 37, 149. Thomas v. Colorado Nat. Bank, 11 Colo. 511, 19 Pac. 501.

And in an action of damages for debt, where the answer was unverified, it was held that judgment should be entered in favor of the plaintiff, as by default, for want of an answer. Perras v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 5 Colo. App. 21, 36 Pac. 637.

Connecticut:

In Connecticut, until 1899, the writ of inquiry was unknown, and the courts could assess the damages. This was held not to invade any constitutional rights. In 1899 a statute provided for a jury in actions of tort.

The practice of assessing damages by the court having been established in Connecticut before the adoption of the Constitution, it was held that, on a default, the court could assess the damages in an action of tort; and that this did not conflict with the Constitution, providing: "The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate." Seeley v. Bridgeport, 53 Conn. 1, 22 Atl. 1017. The court said: "But it had never been the practice to have damages upon a default assessed by a jury. It had always been done by the court. This provision of the Constitution has therefore no application to the case."

In an action for damages it was held to be the settled practice in Connecticut for the court, on default, to assess the damages without a jury. Lennon v. Rawitzer, 57 Conn. 583, 19 Atl. 334.

In an action of book debt, on a default, it was held in Fox v. Hoyt, 12 Conn. 491, 31 Am. Dec. 760, that a justice of the peace could enter judgment for the damages. The court said: "The assessment of damages after default in England, as well as in some of our sister states, is made by a jury upon a writ of inquiry or by a reference to the clerk or prothonotary. By our law damages in such cases are assessed by the court, and this has been done in the present case."

In Lamphear v. Buckingham, 33 Conn. 251, it was held that cases on default and on demurrer overruled are in the same condition in respect to an inquest or hearing in damages. The court said: "By our practice, this inquiry is not by writ of inquiry, or by reference, but made by the court on a hearing in damages."

And in Batchelder v. Bartholomew, 44 Conn. 494, an action on the case, it was said from the earliest history of jurisprudence in this state, where, in an action on the case for the recovery of unliquidated damages, the defendant has suffered a default, the assessment has been made by the court without the intervention of a jury; but it was held that after a default, and for the purpose of reducing the damages, the defendant could prove that he was not guilty of negligence.

Conn. Pub. Acts 1897, chap. 190, p. 884, provides that damages in actions of tort, in a judgment on default or demurrer overruled, are assessed by the court, when the defendant gives written notice of his intention not to plead over. Chapter 220 provides that defendant cannot contradict the negligence alleged unless he filed a notice of such intention. If this notice is not filed, the only questions on the hearing relate to the damages; but, when it is filed, the court cannot assess substantial damages if the defendant disproves the negligence. Morris v. Winchester Repeating Arms Co. 73 Conn. 690, 49 Atl. 180.

Conn. Laws 1889, chap. 157, taking effect August 1st, providing that, in actions of tort, where defendant defaults and there is a hearing in damages, such hearing shall be by a jury, unless the defendant gives notice that he will suffer a default to the clerk of the court within thirty days after the time fixed by law for closing pleadings, was held not to apply to actions pending, in Rowen v.

New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 59 Conn. 304, 21 Atl. 1073.

Florida:

In Florida, under the statutes, where the action is on an open account or contract for the payment of money, not requiring evidence, a jury is not needed on a judgment by default, but is required in other cases.

So, in an action on a note, it was held that the plaintiff should produce and file the evidence on which the damages were to be assessed, as he was required to do in an action upon a written instrument. Snell v. Irvine, 17 Fla. 234. Fla. act February 24, 1873, chap. 1938, provides that, if the action is on an open account or contract for the payment of money, not in writing, upon the entry of a default the clerk shall ascertain the amount which the plaintiff is entitled to recover, from the examination of plaintiff under oath, or other proofs, by affidavit or otherwise, and enter up judgment for the amount so assessed.

And, under Fla. act February 24, 1873, chap. 1938, in an action on a note, on default it was held that the records should show that the plaintiff produced to the clerk the note sued upon, and that the clerk assessed the amount. Coons v. Harlee, 17 Fla. 484.

In an action on a joint note where one of the makers was in default, it was held that the jury trying the issues of fact should also assess the damages against the one in default, as Fla. act 1873, chap. 1938, § 7, authorizing the clerk to assess damages on default where the action was on a written promise, did not apply where an issue was joined as to one joint defendant. Netso v. Foss, 21 Fla. 143.

And, under Fla. act 1873, the records must show that the plaintiff produced to the clerk the note sued on. If the clerk did not comply with Fla. act 1873 in entering a default, it was held that his proceedings were invalid, and, in an action on an account, the judgment should show what evidence was produced. Blount v. Gallaher, 22 Fla. 92.

But, in an action to recover rent on a lease, it was held proper for the court to refer the case to a jury during the term time to assess the damages on a default. McClellan's (Fla.) Dig. p. 835, § 100, providing for default in an action on a liquidated demand not requiring evidence, was held not to apply. Parkhurst v. Stone, 36 Fla. 463, 18 So. 596.

In cases where evidence outside the contract sued upon was necessary to ascertain the amount to be recovered it was held that on default the clerk could not enter final judgment, under Fla. Rev. Stat. § 1035, authorizing clerks to enter a default where the cause of action was purely and simply a money demand founded upon a contract for the payment of money only. Glens Falls Ins. Co. v. Porter, 44 Fla. 568, 33 So. 473.

Georgia:

In this state, under the Constitutions from 1868 to 1877, the court was required to render judgments on default "in actions on contract" where an issuable defense was not filed under oath. In 1877 this was changed to read: "in cases on unconditional contracts in writing." The judgment by the court on failure to demand a jury is held not to infringe on any constitutional rights.

Ga. Const. 1868, art. 5, § 3. Code 1873, Appx. § 5091, provides: "The court shall render judgments without the verdict of a jury in all civil cases founded on contract where an issuable defense is not filed on oath."

Const. 1877, art. 6, § 4, ¶7, Code 5145, provides, the court shall render judgment without the verdict of a jury, in all civil cases founded on unconditional contracts in writing, where an issuable defense is not filed under oath or affirmation.

So, under Ga. Const., Code, § 5091, requiring the court to render a judgment without a jury in all civil cases founded on contract, where an issuable defense was not filed on oath, it was held that, in an action on an insurance policy on default, a jury was improper, as a jury trial was directly contrary to the Constitution. Lester v. Piedmont & A. L. Ins. Co. 55 Ga. 475.

It was held in an action of assumpsit that, under Ga. Const. 1868, requiring a sworn plea, the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment by default before the judge, not as at common law, but as understood under act 1799. Craig v. Pope, 48 Ga. 551. It was said: "The end sought to be attained by the introduction into the Constitution of the state of this clause was not, as we think, to introduce a mode of trial by a judge, instead of the ancient mode of trial by jury. Whatever may be the case now with a certain class of minds, as to the opinions they have of jury trials, we do not think any distrust of that ancient system existed in the convention of 1868. It put a clause into our fundamental law elevating the qualifications of jurymen, but it guarantees the right of trial by jury, as heretofore used. The real intent of the clause under consideration was to prevent delay. With this view, appeal trials were abolished, and this provision made, that there should be no trial by jury unless the defendant would, under oath, set up a substantial, issuable defense."

Where no issuable defense was made to a suit against the principal and sureties on a sheriff's bond, it was held to be the duty of the court to render judgment without a jury, under Ga. Const. 1868. Burnett v. Smith, 60 Ga. 314.

And, where a written contract promised to pay a certain sum of money, or, on default, to pay so much cotton for rent, it was held that, in a suit on the first promise, no defense on oath being filed, a judgment by the court without a jury was valid. Mosely v. Walker, 84 Ga. 274, 10 S. E. 623. It was held that the promise to pay a certain sum was not qualified by the subsequent provision.

In an action of attachment on a note, and a notice, under Ga. Code, § 3309, that the plaintiff purposed to take a general judgment L.R.A. (N.S.)

ment, it was held, where no defense was made, that a judgment by the city court of Macon without a jury was proper. Sutton v. Gunn, 86 Ga. 652, 12 S. E. 979. Ga. Acts 1884-85, p. 473, creating the city court, authorized the judge to give judgment, and provided that either party was entitled to a jury by demanding the same, in cases where such party was entitled to a jury under the Constitution and laws of this state. It was held that every party was presumed to desire that his case would be tried by the court if he failed to demand a jury, and more onerous terms might be exacted without infringing upon the constitutional sacredness of trial by jury.

And, in a joint action against the makers and indorsers of a note where no issuable defense was filed under oath, it was held that the court could render judgment without a jury. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Pendleton, 87 Ga. 751, 13 S. E. 822. The court said: "In our opinion, there is no variance either from the truth or sound principle in classifying this case as one founded upon an unconditional contract in writing, and the court properly rendered its judgment against all of the defendants without a jury." And in this case "it would not be going too far to hold that these persons were not, in a strict sense, indorsers, but were really sureties, and liable as makers." And it was held that, if the necessity of a jury was doubtful, the judgment would not be open to attack by illegality after the expiration of the term.

Under Ga. act 1872, Augusta charter, providing that a judge of the city court shall render judgment without a jury when no issuable defense is filed on oath, was held to be constitutional, in Dortic v. Lockwood, 81 Ga. 293. (This is from the syllabus of the case prepared by the court.) The act entitled either party to a jury by a demand in writing, which was not done in this case.

But, where no plea or defense was filed in an action against the maker and indorsers of a note, it was held that the court had no jurisdiction to enter judgment against the indorsers, without a jury, as their liability was not an unconditional one, but depended on proof of protest and notice. Kaiser v. Brown, 98 Ga. 19, 25 S. E. 923.

And, in an action by a second indorser against the first indorser of a note, an allegation not apparent upon the instrument, which rendered protest necessary, was held to make a case proper for the jury, and not for the court, although no issuable defense was filed. Everett v. Westmoreland, 92 Ga. 670, 19 S. E. 37. The declaration alleged that it was negotiated at a chartered bank, and it became necessary to bind the first indorser to show by proof that it was protested. The court said: "Whenever it is incumbent on the plaintiff to make proof of anything outside of what is contained in the contract sued on, the verdict of a jury should be taken, whether an issuable defense has been filed or not."

Ga. Stat. 3457, providing that on a default on an open account the plaintiff shall be permitted to take judgment, was construed to mean a verdict under the Constitution of 1877. Stephens v. Gate City Gaslight Co. 81 Ga. 150, 6 S. E. 838.

Ga. Code 1873-1882, § 3457, provides for default and trial by jury, except as provided elsewhere in this Code (taken from act 1799), provided that in suits on open accounts, where process has been served personally and there is no defense, the plaintiff shall be permitted to take judgment as if each item were proved. (This proviso is from act 1861, p. 59, and the Constitution of 1868.) Since the Constitution of 1877, the word "judgment" should read "verdict" in the Code, and in a suit on an open account on default the plaintiff may take a "verdict." But a suit on a receipt for notes and accounts to be collected and for failure to pay over was held not a suit on account, and to require proof before a verdict on default. Fryer v. Cole, 70 Ga. 687.

Under Ga. Rev. Code, § 3405, it was held that cases in default were to be tried by a jury, and the plaintiff should fail unless he made out a case by the necessary proof, in an action of assumpsit for goods sold. Durden v. Carhart, 41 Ga. 76. In this case it was said: "The English practice on this subject has never been adopted in Georgia. There, in case judgment is rendered by default, if the suit is for a specific thing, as in an action of debt for a sum certain, the judgment is absolute. But, says Blackstone, vol. 3, p. 398: 'Where damages are to be recovered, a jury must be called in to assess them, unless the defendant, to save charges, will confess the whole damages laid in the declaration; otherwise the entry of the judgment is that the plaintiff ought to recover his damages (indebitely); but, because the court knows not what damages the said plaintiff hath sustained, therefore the sheriff is commanded that, by the oaths of twelve honest and lawful men, he inquire into said damages and return such inquisition into court. This process is called a writ of inquiry, in the execution of which the sheriff sits as judge and tries by a jury, subject to nearly the same law and conditions as the trial by jury at nisi prius, what damages the plaintiff hath really sustained.'"

On an appeal from a common-law judgment rendered in 1860, it was held that a judgment rendered in 1874 against the defendant in favor of his security on the appeal, without a jury, was void, although no defense was filed under oath. The Constitution of 1868 provides that there shall be no appeal from one jury in the superior court to another; but the court may grant a new trial. The court shall render judgment without a jury in civil cases founded on contract where an issuable defense is not filed on oath. It was held that this clause, "there shall be no appeal" (Code, § 5031), was prospective. Appeals should be tried as before, under the Constitution of 1868 (Code, § 5124), providing that the right of trial by jury, except where it is otherwise provided in this Constitution, shall remain inviolate. The court said: "Such a thing as an appeal trial without a jury, on facts, is still unknown to our jurisprudence, unless by consent to submit facts as well as law to the court." Walker v. Bivins, 57 Ga. 323; Birdsong v. Woodward, 57 Ga. 354.

And, under Ga. Code, § 3457, in an action on notes and accounts which were introduced in evidence, it was held not error to direct a verdict on default. Wiggins v. Mayer, 91 Ga. 778, 18 S. E. 430.

Illinois: In Illinois an early statute authorized a default judgment in actions on an instrument in writing for the payment of money only and for the assessment of damages, and in other actions by the court in case neither party required a jury. This has continued through various statutes, and it is held that in damage suits either party may demand and obtain a jury.

So, in an action of replevin it was held that the court could assess the damages, and that Ill. practice act, March, 1847, providing that, if judgment shall be given for the defendant without a trial, the damages may be assessed by the court, was no violation of the constitutional right to a trial by jury, as there was no issue to be tried. Campbell v. Head, 13 Ill. 122.

And the right of trial by jury was held not impaired by refusing a jury to assess damages in default, in Hopkins v. Ladd, 35 Ill. 178. The court said: "This is a mere matter of practice, none will deny, and, being so, the assessment of damages could be made by the court without a jury. The idea that a party has a constitutional right to have a trial by jury is not controverted. Here was no trial in any sense of that term. The defendant has declined putting his case on trial by abiding the judgment on the demurrer."

Ill. Rev. Laws, 490, Gale's Stat. 532, providing that, whenever judgment shall be given by default in any action brought on an instrument of writing for the payment of money only, the court may direct the clerk to assess the damages by computing the interest and report the same to the court, upon which final judgment shall be given, and in all other actions when judgment shall go by default the plaintiff may have his damages assessed by the court, was held to mean that the plaintiff may, if he elects, have his inquest taken in court; but he may waive this right. Vanlandingham v. Fellows, 2 Ill. 234.

And, in an action on a note against two defendants, where a default was made as to one, it was held that the court who tried the issue could compute the amount and enter judgment as to both. Smith v. Harris, 12 Ill. 462.

And, in an action of attachment on a note, it was held that the court could assess damages on default, under Ill. act February 11, 1857, authorizing certain circuit courts on interlocutory judgments, to enter default in actions on contract where the damages are unliquidated and do not rest in computation. Quigley v. Spear, 33 Ill. 352.

In an action of debt upon a judgment record for a sum certain it was held that, on default, the damages could be computed by the court without the intervention of a jury, as they were made up of interest on the unpaid debt and rested wholly in computation. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Miller, 43 Ill. 199.

And, under Ill. Laws 1857, p. 392, providing the same rule of practice for the court of common pleas in Aurora as was provided for the Kane circuit court, it was held that the court could assess damages on default without a jury. Miles v. Goodwin, 35 Ill. 53.

Scates's (Ill.) Comp. 261, provides that, where interlocutory judgment is given in an action on an instrument in writing for the payment of money only, and the damages rest in computation, the court may refer it to the clerk to assess the damages, and in all other actions where judgment shall go by default the plaintiff may have the damages assessed by a jury. Act February 14, 1863, provides that in all suits in courts of record upon default where writ of inquiry has heretofore been required to assess damages, it shall be lawful for the court to assess damages without a jury, unless either party shall claim a jury. In 1857, a special law authorized the court of the thirteenth circuit to assess damages in all cases of default. Scates's Comp. 637, act February 18, 1859, provides that the practice in the circuit court of Kendall should be the same as that in the thirteenth circuit. This was held to be a mere matter of practice, and the assessment of damages could be without a jury. Hopkins v. Ladd, supra.

And, in an action of assumpsit, it was held that after a default the assessment should be made by the court, unless a jury was demanded by either party, under Ill. act 1863, p. 47. Crabtree v. Green, 36 Ill. 278. In this case it was held error to render final judgment without default.

In an action for damages not resting in computation, it was held that the clerk had no power to enter up judgment, especially in the absence of all proof. Towner v. George, 53 Ill. 168. The court said: "In this case the damages were an open question to be tried by a jury on evidence, or by the court under the act of February 14, 1863. Under that act the court may, unless a jury be demanded, assess the damages, but the clerk has no such power."

On default, where neither party asked to have the damages assessed by jury, it was held proper for the court to assess the damages, under Gross's (Ill.) Stat. p. 512, § 23, authorizing the court to make the assessment. Reed v. Horne, 73 Ill. 599. This was an action of damages for selling liquor to a husband.

And, under Ill. Rev. Stat. 780, § 41, providing that, upon default, either party may have the damages assessed by a jury, it was held, in an action of debt on a penal bond, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

where defendant demanded a jury, that it was error to refuse. Pinkel v. Domestic Sewing Mach. Co. 89 Ill. 277.

And, under Ill. Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 110, § 40, providing that, where interlocutory judgment shall be given on a penal bond or upon an instrument in writing for the payment of money only, and the damages rest in computation, the court may refer it to the clerk to assess and report the damages, and may enter judgment therefor, provided that either party may have the damages assessed by a jury, it was held that a jury was not necessary unless either party demanded it. Palmer v. Harris, 98 Ill. 507.

In an action against two as partners, where one defaulted, and the jury were sworn to try the issue only, without swearing them to assess the damages as against the party in default, it was held that the party pleading could not complain when no objection was made by the party in default. McDonald v. Fairbanks, M. & Co. 161 Ill. 124, 43 N. E. 783.

In Blizzard v. Epkens, 105 Ill. App. 117, a defendant who was in default was held entitled to demand a jury at any time before the damages were assessed, under Ill. practice act, § 41, providing that either party may have the damages assessed by a jury. In this case the demand for a jury was not made on the first day of the term, as required under Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 37, § 200. It was held that those provisions applied only to cases pending at a term where no jury had been summoned.

A judgment by nil dicit was held to operate substantially as a judgment by default admitting every material allegation; but the default did not admit the amount of damages, and it was held that the defendant was, upon demand, entitled to a jury. Loellke v. Grant, 120 Ill. App. 74.

And, in a judgment by default in an action on a note, it was held that the court could assess the damages, under Ill. Rev. Laws, 490, Gale's Stat. 532, without requiring the clerk to assess the same. Wilcox v. Woods, 4 Ill. 51.

And, in an action on a note payable in cattle, for $300.50, it was held that, after the expiration of the day, it became payable in cash, and therefore was a money demand; and the clerk could assess the damages in default of a valid plea. Vanhooser v. Logan, 4 Ill. 389, 38 Am. Dec. 90.

Under Ill. Stat. 1858, 261, 262, in an action of assumpsit on a note, it was held that the assessment of damages by the clerk was specially authorized by statute in cases of interlocutory judgment on default, where the damages rested in computation. Robertson v. Hamet, 19 Ill. 161.

In an action on a note payable in currency it was held that the clerk could assess the damages on a judgment by default. Swift v. Whitney, 20 Ill. 144; Trowbridge v. Seaman, 21 Ill. 101.

In an action on guaranty of a note where the declaration contained also a common count for money had and received, it was held that the clerk could assess the damages on default. Thompson v. Haskell, 21 Ill. 215, 74 Am. Dec. 98. Scates's (Ill.) Comp. 261. provides that the clerk may assess the damages, and this was held to have the force and effect of a writ of inquiry.

So, in an action of assumpsit on an order for a definite sum of money, to be paid on condition, which was alleged to have happened, it was held that, on default judgment, the damages rested merely in computation, and could be assessed by the clerk. Phelps v. Reynolds, 49 Ill. 210.

And a writ of inquiry was held unnecessary in any case where the damages could be ascertained by computation, in Rust v. Frothingham, Breese (Ill.) 258, and Clemson v. State Bank, 2 Ill. 45.

In all cases where the promise was not in writing for a specific sum of money, it was held that the damages must, on default, be assessed by the court or jury, under Ill. practice act, Sess. Laws 1872, p. 344, providing that in all cases of default where the damages are to be assessed it shall be lawful for the court to hear the evidence and assess the damages without a jury; but either party may have the assessment made by a jury. Meyers v. Phillips, 72 Ill. 460. This was an action on a note promising to pay a certain sum of money if the promisor should get drunk, and a special count on the agreement, not referring to the note, required a jury or the court to assess the damages.

In an action of assumpsit against a sheriff for money had and received, it was held error to assess damages without a jury. Whiteside v. Bartleson, Breese (Ill.) 42.

Indiana:

Prior to Ind. Code 1852, if evidence was necessary to enable the court to render judgment, a jury was required. The Code authorizes the court to hear proof, and, in actions on contract, assess the damages or direct the same to be ascertained by a jury. The defendant in default, in damage suits, is held entitled to require a jury.

Under 2 Gavin & H. (Ind.) Stat. 216, Code, § 360, providing that the assessment of damages in case of default shall be on or after the day on which the default is taken; and § 367, providing that, if the taking of an account or proof of fact or assessment of damages is necessary after the failure to answer, the court may hear the proof, and, in actions on contract, assess the damages or direct the same to be ascertained by a jury,—it was held that, in the assessment of damages, the defendant may appear and demand a trial by jury. Briggs v. Sneghan, 45 Ind. 14. This is § 600 (582) of the present Code of Civil Procedure.

2 Ind. Rev. Stat. p. 115, § 340, was held in Langdon v. Bullock, 8 Ind. 341, to change the rule of common law; and, in a suit for tort in taking personal property, the failure to appear at the trial was held to waive a jury.

In Briggs v. Sneghan, supra, where a jury was had on default in an action for damages caused by the erection of a house in an unskillful manner, the court said that a default admits the cause of action "but leaves the amount open to be determined by the proof; that, in the assessment of the damages, the defendant may appear and demand a trial by jury." The Code was not referred to, but the statement was the conclusion of a review of the authorities at common law.

And, in an action for assumpsit against an administrator on account of effects unadministered, and for money had and received, it was held that, on judgment by default, damages should be assessed by a jury, and not by the court. Wood v. Lemon, 1 Blackf. 198.

And, in an action on a penal bond, it was held that, on default, the damages should be assessed by a jury. Tannehill v. Thomas, 1 Blackf. 144. The court said that, in a bond for the performance of covenants, Ind. Stat. 1817, p. 37, "expressly requires that the damages for the breaches assigned should be assessed by a jury."

In an action on a delivery bond it was held that, on judgment by default, the damages should be assessed by a jury, unless the parties, by consent, submit the matter to the court. Campbell v. Woolen, 5 Blackf. 80.

Where a declaration on a note contained the common counts, and there was judgment by default for the plaintiff, it was held that there should be a writ of inquiry, unless the parties submit the case to the court, or a nolle prosequi is entered as to the common counts. McFall v. Wilson, 6 Blackf. 260.

So, where the declaration in assumpsit contained a count on a note, and a general count for goods sold and delivered, it was held that, on a judgment by default, a writ of inquiry was necessary. Starbuck v. Lazenby, 7 Blackf. 268.

And the same was held where the judgment was nil dicit. Sherman v. Wilson, 7 Blackf. 362.

In an action of debt, where the three counts did not contain such a statement of facts as would enable the court to determine by calculation the amount due the plaintiff, it was held that the assessment should have been made by a jury. Linn v. Schmall, 8 Blackf. 94.

And, where the declaration consisted of the special and the common counts, and the defendant made default, it was held that the common count should have been dismissed, or the damages assessed by a jury. Carter v. Spencer, 4 Ind. 78.

But, in an action of covenant on an obligation for a certain sum with interest payable in whisky, it was held that, on judgment by default, the plaintiff could take final judgment for the principal and interest without the intervention of a jury to assess the damages. Mettler v. Moore, 1 Blackf. 342.

And, where the amount of damages depended upon a mere calculation, it was held that no writ of inquiry was necessary on default. Henrie v. Sweasey, 5 Blackf. 273. Indian Territory:

A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and, on plaintiff's motion, default judgment was entered. It was held that a default judgment admitted the allegations of the complaint, and, as this fully stated the amount of the debt for goods and merchandise sold, the court could enter judgment without a jury. Tynon v. Crowell, 3 Ind. Terr. 346, 58 S. W. 565. Iowa:

In Iowa the Code provides that the court may assess damages unless a jury is demanded by the party not in default. This is held to be constitutional, as the right to a jury under the Constitution may be lost or waived.

On plaintiff's motion an action of replevin was dismissed, and on defendant's motion redocketed to assess the damages. It was held that the plaintiff was in default and could not demand a jury, under Iowa Code, § 3151, which, after providing for the manner of assessing damages on a money demand, declares that in other cases the court shall assess the damages unless a jury is demanded by the party not in default. Wilkins v. Treynor, 14 Iowa, 391. The court said: "If there is no issue, and it is a mere inquiry into the damages sustained by the party not in default, the party who had lost or failed to secure a standing in court cannot, as a matter of right, claim to be heard as if he was diligently prosecuting or defending the action. The right of trial by jury, guaranteed by the Constitution, may be lost or waived by the act or consent of a party. This right is not an attribute or inalienable in its nature and character, but rather a privilege that may be waived or forfeited."

And, where the defendant in an action on a note and mortgage was in default, it was held that he had no right to demand a jury, under Iowa Rev. 3152. Carleton v. Byington, 17 Iowa, 579.

And, where the defendant was in default, it was held that he had no right to a jury in the assessment of plaintiff's damages. Armstrong v. Catlin, 17 Iowa, 581.

In Clute Bros. v. Hazleton, 51 Iowa, 355, 1 N. W. 672, the plaintiff was in default for want of reply against a counterclaim. It was held that he could not demand a jury on the counterclaim and at the same time waive a jury on the cause of action in the petition. In this case the plaintiff offered evidence, but the court refused to receive it, and said: "The difficulty here is that the plaintiff's cause of action was admitted, and, as we understand, the only question to be determined was the amount defendant was entitled to on his counterclaim. As to this, the only right plaintiff had was to cross-examine defendant's witnesses."

So, under Iowa Code, § 2872, providing that, when a party is in default, the court is empowered to assess the damages, unless a jury is demanded by the party not in default, it was held that the party in default was not entitled to a jury to assess the damages. Preston v. Wright, 60 Iowa, 351, 14 N. W. 352.

And, under Iowa Code, §§ 1828-1832, providing that, when the action is for money demand, and the amount is a mere matter of computation, the clerk may assess the damages, and in other cases they are to be assessed by the court unless a jury is demanded by the party not in default, it was held, in an action on a subscription of stock where instalments had been called for, that the clerk could not assess the damages; but this should have been done by the court, unless a jury was demanded by the plaintiff. Burlington & M. River R. Co. v. Marchand, 5 Iowa, 468. In this case defendant's liability was not definitely fixed by the articles of subscription.

Iowa practice act, § 13, Rev. Stat. 471, authorizing the court to direct the clerk to assess damages when judgment was given by default on any instrument of writing, but providing that in all other actions the plaintiff may have his damages assessed by a jury, was held to apply to actions brought originally in the district court, and not as an imperative rule on appeal cases from a justice's court. Taylor v. Barber, 2 G. Greene, 350. In this case the action was tried before a jury on a claim for money due. On appeal the defendant defaulted. Justice's act, art. 8, §§ 2, 3, 16, provide for an affirmance or trial on appeal. This was held to control.

And, where a judgment was given by default on a note, it was held that, under Iowa practice act, § 13, the court could direct the clerk to compute the interest, and assess the damages. Parvin v. Hoopes, Morris (Iowa) 204.

Iowa Code, § 2872 (Rev. 3151) provides that, where the action is for a money demand, and is a mere matter of computation, the clerk shall ascertain the amount. In other cases the court shall assess the damages unless a jury is demanded by the party not in default.

Where the statute provided that, on default, the court may direct the clerk to assess the damages, it was held not prejudicial error for the court to assess the damages in an action of debt. Davis v. Morford, Morris (Iowa) 99.

And, under Iowa Code, § 1831, providing that in cases of default, where the damages are assessed either by court or jury, the defendant may appear at the time of the assessment and cross-examine the plaintiff's witnesses, but for no other purpose, it was held that the defendant could not introduce evidence, nor address the jury, nor ask instruction. Cook v. Watters, 4 Iowa, 72.

Kansas:

Kan. Code Civ. Proc. (1868) § 401 (Gen. Stat. 1897, § 397), provides that, if the taking of an account, or proof of fact, or the assessment of damages, is necessary, the court may, with the assent of the party not in default, assess the damages, or, with like assent, refer the same to a referee or jury.

So, in an action on a penal bond, it was held that an interlocutory judgment should have been entered on default, and an order should have been made by the court that the truth of the breaches assigned be inquired into and the damages sustained thereby assessed; and this should have been done by a jury, as in other cases. Simmons v. Garrett, 1 Kan. Dasser's ed. 82, Appx. The court said: "See Laws 1855 (p. 540, §§ 5 and 7; p. 561, § 42), which clearly points out this mode of proceeding."

In an action against a city for injury to property in consequence of changing the grade of a street, default was taken against the defendant, and the cause was referred to a master to assess the damages. It was held that the defendant, having been summoned, could not require a second notice of assessment. Leavenworth v. Hicks, 1 Kan. Dasser's ed. 160, Appx.

And, in a suit on a foreign judgment for a sum certain, where the answer of the defendant was withdrawn, it was held that the defendant had no right to demand a jury, as there was no issue to try, nor any damages to assess, nor facts to ascertain. Butcher v. Bank of Brownsville, 2 Kan. 70, 83 Am. Dec. 446.

And, in an action on a note, where the defendant was in default, it was held that a trial by the court, where the plaintiff consented, was proper, under Kan. Code, § 290, providing that the trial by jury may be waived by the consent of the party appearing when the other party fails to appear. Goff v. Russell, 3 Kan. 212. Kentucky:

Ky. Civ. Code Pr. § 379 (409), provides that, if the taking of an account, or the proof of fact, or the assessment of damages, is necessary on a default, the court may hear the proof, and (in actions on contracts, Code 1854, § 479) assess the damages or refer the same to a jury. Under the former practice, in actions for a liquidated sum, no jury was required, but one was necessary where the damages were uncertain.

So, in an action against a sheriff and a surety on his bond, it was held that a default judgment was properly rendered without a jury. Combs v. Breathitt County, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 809, 38 S. W. 138, 39 S. W. 33. This was an action for revenue collected by the sheriff, which he had failed to pay over.

So, under Ky. Code, Pr. § 418, authorizing the court to ascertain the amount for which judgment should be rendered on failure of the defendant to answer, it was held that the court could assess the damages where the petition showed the amount claimed, and this was sustained by record evidence made part of the petition. Lambert v. Ingram, 15 B. Mon. 265.

Actions on contract under the Code of 1854.

In an action on notes where defendant was in default, it was held that the court could render judgment. Marr v. Prather, 3 Met. (Ky.) 196. This was under Ky. Civ. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Code, § 409, providing that, if the taking of an account or assessment of damages is necessary to enable the court to pronounce judgment on a failure to answer, the court may hear the proof, and, in actions on contracts, assess the damages.

And, under Ky. Civ. Code, § 153, in an action to recover the amount of goods sold and delivered, it was held that the court could render judgment on default without the intervention of a jury. Civil Code, § 409, confers on the court power not only to render judgment on default, but to assess damages and to hear proof. Francis v. Francis, 18 B. Mon. 57.

So, in an action on a contract, where the defendant was in default, it was held that the court had a right to try the case and render a judgment. Harvey v. Payne, 2 Met. (Ky.) 451.

And, in an action founded on contract, on default it was held competent for the court to hear the evidence and assess the damages, under Ky. Civ. Code, § 409. Dehoney v. Sandford, 2 Bush, 169.

Under Ky. Civ. Code, § 409, it was held that on default, where an assessment of damages was necessary, in an action on a contract, the court could have heard the proof and assessed the damages, or referred it to a commissioner or to a jury. But the record was defective and did not show that the court heard proof in an action to recover the value of whisky which the defendant agreed to deliver. Beam v. Hayden, 5 Bush, 426.

Under Ky. Civ. Code, § 153, it was held that, in a suit ex contractu for medical services, where the account was exhibited and there was no answer, the court could pronounce judgment on default. Harris v. Ray, 15 B. Mon. 630.

But, in an action for the refusal to permit plaintiff to perform stipulated services, it was held that the court could not assess the damages without a jury and without proof. Wood v. Morgan, 6 Bush, 507.

And, in an action of ejectment and for damages, it was held that a default judgment for damages was improper where there was no inquest by jury, nor any evidence before the court. Burchett v. Herald, 98 Ky. 530, 33 S. W. 85. The error was on a question of evidence.

Under the former practice, the court could render default judgments where the amount was certain; but, where evidence was required, a jury was necessary.

In an action on a covenant for the payment of a certain sum, on default it was held that the court might have assessed the damages without the intervention of a jury. Dicken v. Smith, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 209. The court said: "The right of the court in such a case to assess the damages was, no doubt, first asserted at an early period; but that right has been uniformly maintained ever since."

And, in an action of covenant where the damages were liquidated, it was held that the court could render a judgment in a default without the intervention of a jury. Jenkins v. Yeates, 2 J. J. Marsh. 48.

But, where the debt demanded was payable in currency, differing in value from that of this state, and interest was to be calculated, it was held that a jury was necessary to assess the damages. Pollock v. Colglazure, Sneed (Ky.) 2.

And the intervention of a jury was held necessary where the obligation sued on was payable in Virginia currency. Lynch v. Barr, Sneed (Ky.) 170.

So, a clerk was held not authorized to calculate interest on single bills, in pursuance of Ky. act 1799, chap. 17, § 2, if the single bill was given prior to that act; but the interest should be found by a jury on a writ of inquiry. Troxwell v. Fugate, Hardin (Ky.) 2.

And, in an action on a note and for interest according to the laws of another state, it was held that the law would have to be proved and ascertained by the verdict of a jury, and the court could not render judgment for the interest on default. Pawling v. Sartain, 4 J. J. Marsh. 238.

In an action of covenant, where the sum to which the plaintiff was entitled was a certain amount, it was held that, on default, the court could assess the damages without a jury; but not if the case came within the statute of 1 Ky. Dig. 248. Goff v. Hawks, 5 J. J. Marsh. 341. The court said: "It may well be doubted, under this rule, whether there be any case in covenant, wherein the court can render judgment without the aid of a jury, except it be where the defendant has stipulated to pay money. In this case the covenant or obligation declared on is not for the payment of money."

A default in an action of detainee was held to admit the plaintiff's right of action to the property sued for, but not the value as stated; and a jury was held necessary to assess the value as well as the damages for detention. Thompson v. Thompson, 7 B. Mon. 421.

And, in an action of equity for damages for entering on land and cutting trees, it was held that the failure to appear did not dispense with the necessity for a jury, unless with the assent of the court. under Ky. Civ. Code 1854, § 361, providing that a trial by jury may be waived by the parties in actions arising on contracts, and, with the assent of the court, in other actions, by failing to appear at the trial, by written consent filed with the clerk, or by oral consent in open court. Clarke v. Seaton, 18 B. Mon. 226.

But, in an action of conversion and detention of personal property, it was held that the court could try the case without a jury on default, under Ky. Code Pr. § 373, providing that trial by jury may be waived by the parties in actions arising on contract, and, with the assent of the court, in other actions, by failing to appear at the trial. Daniel v. Judy, 14 B. Mon. 393.

And, in an action on a covenant to pay an attorney a reasonable fee for defending a party, it was held that, under Ky. Code Pr. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

p. 80, art. 3, providing that a trial by jury may be waived by a party in actions on contract, by failing to appear at the trial, the court could give judgment without a jury. Wilson v. Barnes, 13 B. Mon. 330.

In an action for damages for loss of a slave unlawfully carried on a steamboat, whereby the slave escaped, it was held that the court could not assess the damages without a jury. Shirley v. Landram, 3 Bush, 552. This was under Ky. Rev. Stat. chap. 7, §§ 3, 4, providing that in proceedings in chancery to enforce the liability of the owners of a boat, under the preceding sections, the damages should be assessed by jury; it was further held that Ky. Civ. Code, § 419, authorizing the court in certain cases to assess special damages given by statute, did not apply, but it was controlled by §§ 451-454, requiring, in actions like this, the damages to be assessed by a jury.

Louisiana:

In Louisiana, under the Code, where the damages are uncertain, a jury is required.

So, where damages were uncertain and rested on opinion alone, without a fixed rule or means of proof to ascertain them precisely, it was held that a jury was necessary, under La. Code Pr. art. 313, providing that when, from the nature of the case, damages are to be assessed, the court will direct a jury to be summoned; but it was held, where they were fixed by contract or by law, as legal interest, a jury would not be required. Brander v. Goodin, 6 La. Ann. 521.

So, under this article, in an action of tort where damages are to be assessed, it was held that a jury was necessary, in Olivier v. Cannon, 18 La. 474.

And, under this section, it was held that damages for disturbance of possession could not be rendered on default without a jury. Guillotte v. Thompson, 5 Rob. (La.) 141.

In Daly v. Van Benthuyzen, 3 La. Ann. 69, it was said that La. Code Pr. 313, has always been held to relate to the assessment of damages under judgment by default.

In an action to recover a note and damages for its detention, it was held error to render a judgment by default without the intervention of a jury. It was further held that La. Code Pr. art. 313, requiring the party who wishes for a jury to deposit $12 applied to the plaintiff, for without a jury the court could not legally give the plaintiff damages. Liles v. New Orleans Canal & Bkg. Co, 6 Rob. (La.) 273.

Maine:

In Maine, it appears that the court render judgment by default in damage unless the plaintiff demands a jury. as to whether the defendant may waive a jury,—Quare.

So, in an action of debt on a tax collector's bond, it was held that, whatever might have been the right of the defendant to have the damages assessed by a jury if he had seasonably applied therefor, he waived his right to a jury trial by neglecting to demand one until an auditor had been appointed and made his report. Gorham v. Hall, 57 Me. 58.

And in Wood v. Leach, 69 Me. 555, which was a judgment on default, the court said: "The plaintiff had a right to have his damages assessed by a jury. Not claiming that right, the court might refer the matter to a master or assessor 'for informing the conscience of the court, and his doings, being approved and adopted by the court, become theirs.' . . . Much more, then, may the parties agree upon an individual by whom damages, as in this case, were to be assessed."

In an action of trespass quare clausum on a default, it was held that a jury was properly impaneled. Crommett v. Pearson, 18 Me. 344.

In an action of trover it was held to be the duty of the court, where the damages were not the subject of mere computation, to give judgment for such damages as they should find the plaintiff had sustained, unless the plaintiff should move to have a jury, in which case, judgment was to be entered for such damages as they should assess. Begg v. Whittier, 48 Me. 314. The court said: "If the defendant be defaulted, the court assess damages unless, for special reasons, they order an inquiry by a jury."

If not claimed by the plaintiff to be done by the jury at the time, the right to an assessment of damages by them is waived."

Maryland:

In Maryland the common-law rule seems to prevail. This was modified by the statute of 1858 allowing the court to enter judgment in actions on verified accounts. This was held not to authorize judgment for interest without a jury.

In an action for a broker's commission in finding a purchaser, it was held that a judgment by default did not settle the right of plaintiff to recover the amount stated, but the defendant was entitled to an inquisition by a jury. Cooper v. Roche, 36 Md. 563.

On a judgment by default in an action of assumpsit on a note, a writ of inquiry was had, and the verdict of the jury was for "damages and about $10 for costs." The question of costs was held to be a mere formal defect. Kiersted v. Rogers, 6 Harr. & J. 282.

On a judgment by default, in a suit on a sheriff's bond for an escape, it was held that the court would not assume the power of assessing damages and giving final judgment, under 8 & 9 Wm. III. chap. 11, § 8, providing that, in actions on bonds, plaintiff may assign as many breaches as he pleases, and a jury shall be summoned to fix the damages, which was adopted in Maryland. State use of Creedy v. Lawson, 2 Gill, 62. In this case the court said: "This case being within the equitable provisions of the statute, the defendant is liable to no greater damages than the plaintiff has actually sustained, to be ascertained by the verdict of a jury."

held that the court had no power to allow interest, as this should be ascertained by a jury on a writ of inquiry. Mailhouse v. Inloes, 18 Md. 323. The court said: "We entertain no doubt that, under the provisions of the act of 1858, the court had power to enter a final judgment at the proper term or rule day, for the amount of the appellees' claim 'for goods sold and delivered,' where the account is authenticated and verified by the affidavit of the plaintiffs, as prescribed in the 9th section of said act. But the judgment must be restricted to the amount of the account thus authenticated, and the court had no power, of its own mere motion, to allow interest on the account. The interest was a subject of inquiry by a jury, as provided for by the 6th section of the act."

In an action of trover it was held that a judgment by default, if regularly entered, was as binding as any other in declaring that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, although the amount of the recovery remained to be ascertained by a jury. When that was determined, it was held there was no rule of law which gave to such finding less dignity than to a verdict founded upon the issues. Green v. Hamilton, 16 Md. 317, 77 Am. Dec. 295.

Under Md. act 1864, chap. 175, authorizing a judge, upon satisfactory proof of the correctness of the account, to assess the damages, it would be assumed, in the absence of proof, that the court, in assessing the damages, proceeded under the common count, and not under a special count, in an action to recover money on the usual money counts and a special count for unliquidated damages for nondelivery of hay. Horner v. O'Laughlin, 29 Md. 465.

Massachusetts:

In Massachusetts it is optional with the plaintiff, under the statute, whether he will require a jury or not.

So, Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 171, § 2, providing that, when the defendant defaults, the court shall award such judgment for plaintiff as it shall, upon inquiry, find to be just, unless the plaintiff moves to have the damages assessed by a jury, in which case they shall be so assessed, was held to require a motion for the jury after default; and a jury trial claimed when the action was entered was held not to avail. Gallagher v. Silberstein, 182 Mass. 20, 64 N. E. 402.

In an action of dower where the defendant was in default, it was held that, under Mass. Stat. 1784, chap. 28, § 7, providing that a default is a confession of the charge in the declaration, and that damages may be assessed by the court with the plaintiff's assent or he may have a jury, the court, with the plaintiff's assent, might have assessed her damages. Perry v. Goodwix, 6 Mass. 498. The court said: "The court generally refuses to assess the damages in actions where the law has prescribed no rule by which they may be measured, but leaves them to the feelings of a jury."

And, under Mass. Stat. 1784, chap. 28, § 8, providing that, where the defendant does not appear, his default should be recorded, and the court should give such damages as they shall find upon inquiry that the plaintiff has sustained, unless the plaintiff shall move for an inquiry by jury, it was held that a jury was not necessary when not demanded in an action for damages for injuring a hired horse. Jarvis v. Blanchard, 8 Mass. 4.

Michigan:

In Michigan, it seems that it is optional with the parties whether or not they will require a jury.

Mich. Comp. Laws 1897, § 10,259 (Comp. Laws 1857, § 3435, How. Stat. § 6485), provides that all issues of fact shall be tried by the court, unless a jury is demanded by one of the parties, providing that in all actions of tort, and in all other actions peculiarly proper for a jury, it shall be competent for the court to order the cause to be tried by a jury. Section 10,281 (Comp. Laws 1857, § 4423, How. Stat. § 7644) provides that, on default in actions on certain specified written contracts, the court shall direct the clerk to report the sum the plaintiff ought to recover.

How. (Mich.) Stat. § 7647, provides that, if the defendant shall have appeared, or shall have given notice of his intention to appear, the clerk shall give like notice of assessment of damages, as is required of the trial of a cause. This was held to refer to the length of time elapsing between the service of the notice and the assessment. Sinnock v. Hosmer, 97 Mich. 475, 56 N. W. 800. How. Stat. § 7658, chap. 265, provides that in all other suits wherein the clerk is not authorized to assess the damages, they may be assessed by a jury. The court said: "Our statutes contain no other provisions regulating the case where the damages are to be assessed by court or jury;" and further said that the writ of inquiry is unknown in our practice.

In a default on a declaration containing only common counts in assumpsit, it was held that damages should have been ascertained by the court or by a jury. Mich. Const. 1850, art. 6, § 27, provides that the right of trial by jury shall be deemed waived in all civil cases, unless demanded by one of the parties, and act 1853, Comp. Laws, § 3435, provides that all issues and questions of fact shall be tried by the court, unless a jury is demanded by one of the parties. O'Flynn v. Holmes, 8 Mich. 95.

In a joint action against the maker and indorser of a note, where one defaulted, it was held that the plaintiff could have the damages assessed on default by the jury sworn to try the issue, and take a joint judgment. Storey v. Bird, 8 Mich. 316.

In an action on a bill of exchange, default was entered and made absolute, and a reference was made to the clerk to assess damages, and judgment was rendered on the assessment. It was held to be a proper case for assessment by the clerk. Wilcox v. Sweet, 24 Mich. 355.

Mich. Rev. Stat. 1838, p. 460, §§ 8, 9, provide that, in actions for breach of a bond or for a penalty for nonperformance of contract, when it shall appear by default that the condition is broken or penalty forfeited, judgment shall be entered in common form for the penal sum, and execution shall be awarded for so much as is due, to be ascertained by the court, and, if either party desires it, or the court directs, by jury. It was held in an action upon a covenant the court had power, in default, to assess the damages. Prentiss v. Spalding, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 90.

Minnesota:

In this state the present statutes direct the clerk to make the assessments in actions on contracts for the payment of money only; and in other actions for money the plaintiff may have a writ of inquiry. Rev. Laws 1905, § 4133.

So, under Minn. Stat. p. 555, § 173, subd. 1, requiring the clerk to enter judgment on default for the amount mentioned in the summons, where the action arises on an obligation for the payment of money only; and providing that in other actions for the recovery of money only, on filing a like proof, the plaintiff may have an order entered by the clerk that a writ of inquiry of damages issue, and, upon return of the inquest, judgment may be entered for the amount without further application to the court, or he may apply to the court to have the damages assessed, and for judgment,—it was held that this section contemplates that, when the defendant, in an action on an instrument in writing to pay money, suffers a default, his confession shall be all the proof requisite for the clerk to perfect the judgment; but in other cases the damages must be assessed by some of the modes pointed out. It was also held that errors of the clerk in the assessment of damages must be corrected by the trial court before an appeal will lie. Babcock v. Sanborn, 3 Minn. 141, Gil. 86.

This was overruled in Reynolds v. La-Crosse & M. Packet Co. 10 Minn. 178, Gil. 144, where it was held error for the clerk to assess damages where the complaint contained counts on contract and one on tort.

Where the defendant appeared in an action on a note and answered, and, when the cause was reached, abandoned the issue and contested the amount of damages, it was held that the court had a right to treat the case as if no answer had been put in, and send it to the clerk for judgment as for want of an answer, for he certainly had the power to determine the question himself when requested to do so; and it was further held that any question of damages that belongs to the clerk to determine might in the first instance be submitted to the judge. Kent v. Bown, 3 Minn. 347, Gil. 246.

Mississippi:

In Mississippi, under the statutes, a jury is not necessary in actions of debt for a sum certain and on instruments of writing ascertaining the sum due, or upon open account filed; but is required in all other cases.

So, in an action on a tax collector's bond for money not paid over, and for failure to collect taxes, it was held that a writ of inquiry should have been awarded to ascertain the amount due after deducting all legal allowances. Boykin v. State, 50 Miss. 375. Miss. Code 1857, art. 253, provides that, in actions of debt for a sum certain, and actions on an instrument of writing ascertaining the sum due, or on open accounts filed, if judgment is entered by default the clerk shall calculate the amount and judgment be entered; and in all actions when the sum due does not appear, and in all actions for damages, interlocutory judgments may be taken on which writs of inquiry shall be awarded.

And, in an action of debt on notes and an open account and a bill indorsed giving the kind of money which, if not used at par, was to be redeemed, it was held in Sandford v. Campbell, 7 Smedes & M. 107, that a jury was necessary on default. The court said that, under Miss. Stat. (Howard & H.) 616, § 9, a court is authorized to enter up final judgment without a jury on a bill single and note.

And, in an action on a note made in the District of Columbia it was held necessary to have a writ of inquiry to ascertain the amount of interest, on a judgment by default. Fretwell v. Dinsmore, Walk. (Miss.) 484. This was because the foreign laws would have to be proven.

But, a writ of inquiry was held not necessary on a judgment by default in an action of assumpsit founded on an award for a specific sum. This was under Miss. Code, 120, § 97, providing that all judgments by default, founded upon any instrument in writing ascertaining the sum due, shall be final on the last day of the term. Chace v. East, Walk. (Miss.) 439.

And, on a judgment by default in an action against the indorser of a note, it was held that it became final without the intervention of a jury, it being for a sum certain. Owen v. Little, Walk. (Miss.) 326.

And, under Miss. act 1822, chap. 13, § 67, in an action on a note and for interest, where default was taken, it was held that interest should be calculated by the clerk. Washington v. Planters' Bank, 1 How. (Miss.) 230, 28 Am. Dec. 333.

And, a jury was held unnecessary in a judgment by default in an action on a note with the usual money counts, under Miss. Rev. Code, 120, § 67, providing for ascertaining the amount due, where the action is founded on any instrument of writing for a sum certain, without the intervention of a jury. Gridley v. Brigs, 2 How. (Miss.) 830.

In an action on an instrument in writing ascertaining the sum due, it was held that default judgment should have been entered without calling a jury, under Miss. (Howard & H.) Dig. 616, § 9. Harrison v. Agricultural Bank, 2 Smedes & M. 307.

And, in an action on a note, it was held error to submit the case to a jury on default. It was also held that swearing the jury to try an issue when there was no issue to try was a mere clerical error,—following Garrett v. Felt, 32 Miss. 137, and saying that it was held differently in Wilkinson v. Patterson, 6 How. (Miss.) 193, and Harrison v. Agricultural Bank, supra. But Miss. Rev. Code, 501, art. 153, requires all regular jurors to be sworn to try all issues and execute all writs of inquiry that may be submitted to them. Hewett v. Cobb, 40 Miss. 61.

Missouri:

In Missouri, under the statutes, a jury is not necessary in actions on notes payable in money. In other cases a jury is optional with plaintiff. This privilege is also held applicable to the defendant, although not specifically given by statute.

In an action for damages for wrongful seizure of slaves under execution, it was held that a writ of inquiry must be executed by a court or jury, and the damages shown by proof, under Mo. Pr. act of 1849, § 12, providing that, if the action is founded upon a bond, bill, or note for money, and there is no answer, the clerk may, under the direction of the court, enter judgment for the amount; and, in other cases where there is no answer, the plaintiff may, if he requires it, have a jury, and, if no jury is required, the court may assess his damages. Wetzell v. Waters, 18 Mo. 396.

In Robinson v. Lawson, 26 Mo. 69, it was held that, where the answer was stricken out, the case stood as upon a default, and no more proof was required than was necessary in the assessment of damages on a default.

Where the defendant demanded a jury on an inquiry of damages on default, and the plaintiff waived the jury, it was held error to refuse the intervention of a jury. The statute provides that the plaintiff may, if he demands it, have a jury to assess his damages, and, if no jury is demanded, the court shall, at the proper term, assess the damages. It was held that no negative words were used, implying a prohibition on the part of the defendant to demand a jury. Brown v. King, 39 Mo. 380.

And, under Mo. Code Pr. 1849, art. 12, § 2, providing that, where there is no answer in cases not founded on a bond, bill, or note for money, the plaintiff may have a jury if he requires it, to assess his damages, it was held that there was nothing prohibiting a writ of inquiry at a subsequent term. Froust v. Burton, 15 Mo. 619.

A writ of inquiry was held to be necessary in an action on a bill payable in currency, as currency at the date of the bill was not a specie, and it became necessary to ascertain its value. Farwell v. Kennett, 7 Mo. 595. So it was held that, where the note was payable "with the current rate of exchange on Philadelphia, when due," a jury was necessary. Guelberth v. Watson, 8 Mo. 663. This was under Mo. Rev. Code 1835, p. 461, §§ 34, 35, providing that, when an interlocutory judgment by default is entered on an instrument of writing, and the demand is ascertained by such instrument, the court shall assess the damages, and in all other cases the damages shall be assessed by a jury.

So it was held, in an action on an account under this section, that a jury was necessary on a default before a justice. Pratte v. Corl, 9 Mo. 163.

But a jury was held unnecessary where there was nothing in the record to show that the defendant, after his default, asked for the aid of a jury, under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, §§ 2133-2215. Mumford v. Keet, 71 Mo. App. 535. This was an action on a covenant of warranty. In this case part of the answer was stricken out and the defendant refused to stand on his answer and plead, and judgment was entered as default.

And, in an action of covenant for rent on a deed, it was held that the court could calculate the amount on a default without a writ of inquiry. Dent v. Morrison, 1 Mo. 130. Geyer's Dig. (Mo.) 251, provides that in all cases where the demand is liquidated and reduced to writing the clerk may, on a judgment by default, calculate the principal and interest, and indorse the amount on execution. The practice under this act, which was passed in 1807, has uniformly been for the clerk to calculate the amount and the court to render judgment accordingly.

And, in an action of debt on a single bill, a writ of inquiry was held not necessary as the sum was fixed and certain. M'Cutchin v. Batterson, 1 Mo. 342.

Under the Missouri statutes regulating the practice, providing that, if neither party requires a jury, the court shall assess the damages, and the attachment law, providing that, if the damages are liquidated or are ascertainable by writing, then the court shall assess the damages, otherwise a writ of inquiry shall be awarded, it was held that no writ of inquiry was necessary in an action on a note payable in commonwealth's paper. Alexander v. Hayden, 2 Mo. 211. Nebraska:

Neb. Code, § 432, provides that the court, with the assent of the party not in default, may assess the damages, and § 896 provides that the above shall not impair the right to a jury trial, if demanded.

In Bankers' Reserve Life Assn. v. Finn, 64 Neb. 105, 80 N. W. 672, where a demurrer was overruled and an answer tendered was refused, it was said that Neb. Code, § 432, provides that, "if the taking of an account, or the proof of a fact, or the assessment of damages, is necessary to enable the court to pronounce judgment upon a failure to answer, . . . the court may, with the assent of the party not in default, take the account, hear the proof, or assess the damages, or may . . . refer the same to a referee, master, or . . . a jury."

In an action against several parties on a note, where some of the parties made default, it was held that judgment should have been entered against them, and the jury should try the issue only as to the 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

parties who pleaded. German-American Bank v. Stickley, 50 Neb. 321, 80 N. W. 910. Nevada:

In Nevada, under the practice act, a jury is discretionary with the judge.

Nev. Pr. act, § 150, provides that (1) where the action is on contract for the recovery of money or damages only, on failure to answer, the clerk shall enter the default and enter a judgment; (2) in other actions default is entered in the same manner; but it is made the duty of the plaintiff to apply to the court for the relief demanded, and if the taking of an account or proof of any fact is necessary, the court may take the account, or hear the proof, or order a reference; and, where the action is for the recovery of damages, the court may order the damages to be assessed by a jury. This was held to be directory, leaving it discretionary with the judge. Ballard v. Purcell, 1 Nev. 342.

In Haley v. Eureka County Bank, 21 Nev. 127, 12 L.R.A. 815, 26 Pac. 64, it was said: "In an action arising upon contract, for the recovery of money or damages only, a default and final judgment may be entered by the clerk. In all other cases the plaintiff must apply to the court for the relief prayed for in his complaint, and, when he does so, the court may require additional proof; and it is not error for the court to refuse to enter judgment on the pleadings alone, and the proof must be made when demanded."

New Hampshire:

In New Hampshire the writ of inquiry is said to be unknown in the practice in that state. The reference to a jury seems to be discretionary with the court.

In Bowman v. Noyes, 12 N. H. 302, it was said: "The practice in this state, when a default has been entered, is for the court to assess the damages, instead of awarding a venire, unless for special reasons the court should order an inquiry into the damages by the jury. And where, in actions on contracts, one defendant is defaulted and another defends, there has not been, in point of form, any inquiry of damages against the one defaulted; but in practice the jury have in effect assessed them, if they found against the other defendant. If they found for the one who pleaded, prior to the statute of 1834, no judgment was rendered against the one defaulted."

In West v. Whitney, 26 N. H. 314, it was said that the practice in that state is that damages are to be assessed, on default, in one of three ways: First, where the damages are merely a matter of computation, they are computed by a clerk; second, where the damages are uncertain, the amount is determined by the jury under the direction of the court, in the nature of an inquiry, if either party makes application for such a hearing; and the same applied where the court, for its own information, submitted the case to a jury. In other cases the evidence is taken in writing and laid before the court, and the damages assessed by the judges. The court said that the writ of inquiry of damages and the assessment by a jury under the direction of a sheriff is unknown in this state.

To the three modes of assessing damages upon default, enumerated above, was added a fourth,—where the assessment is made by a judge upon oral evidence produced before him in court, the record then should show that oral testimony was produced before the court. Collins v. Walker, 55 N. H. 438.

And, in an action on the case against a sheriff for default of his deputy in not paying over money collected, it was held that in New Hampshire the court assesses the damages unless for some special reason it orders an inquiry into the damages by jury. It was further held that the neglect to demand a jury until after the damages were assessed by an auditor would be considered as a waiver of the rights, if any existed. Price v. Dearborn, 34 N. H. 481.

New Jersey:

In New Jersey, in cases where the damages are not a mere matter of computation, a jury is held to be necessary. The statute dispensing with a jury was held to apply only to actions of assumpsit and to matters of mere calculation. In an action on a constable's bond the statute gives to either party the right to a jury.

So, N. J. (Nixon's) Dig. 729, § 71, making it the duty of the court to assess damages on interlocutory judgments by default, unless a writ of inquiry is demanded, was held to apply only to actions of assumpsit. Peacock v. Haney, 37 N. J. L. 179. The court said: "Independently of statutory provision in actions of assumpsit, debt, and covenant, the practice of the court is to assess damages . . . in certain cases." Where the damages are a mere matter of computation, a writ of inquiry is not necessary; but, where the damages are uncertain, to be ascertained on the hearing of testimony, they should, in cases not within the statute, be determined by writ of inquiry.

In an action of trespass on the case upon promises, the first three counts being on special undertakings and the fourth for money had and received, it was held that the court could assess the damages without a writ of inquiry where none was demanded. under N. J. Rev. Laws, 423, § 70. Belton v. Gibbon, 12 N. J. L. 76.

But, in an action of debt on a constable's bond, it was held that a writ of inquiry for the assessment of damages on default would be awarded on the demand of either party interested, under Nixon's Dig. (N. J.) 638, § 148, providing that assessments of damages in actions respecting constables shall be made by a jury on application of either party interested. Jersey City v. Chase, 30 N. J. L. 233.

In an action on a bail bond given in an action on a contract for an uncertain amount, which could not be ascertained by calculation, it was held that a writ of inquiry should be awarded to assess the damages. Simmons v. Kelly, 39 N. J. L. 438.

In Simmons v. Kelly, supra, it was said: "In Middleton v. Bryan, 3 Maule & S. 155, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

classing replevin bonds with bail bonds, and using precisely the same arguments which have been urged in this case, it was held that no writ of inquiry was necessary because the value of the goods distrained had been ascertained before the bond was given. Such has not been the practice of our court, and the better rule should be applied to both kinds of bonds. By § 149 of our practice act, the plaintiff may have his damages assessed by the court in actions of assumpsit, or by the clerk when the court is not actually in session. By § 150 of the same act, in all actions ex contractu where the damages or sum recoverable are a mere matter of calculation, or can readily be ascertained, the same may be assessed on judgment by default by the court or a clerk, as in actions of assumpsit." The damages in this case are not matters of calculation. New Mexico:

In Lamy v. Remuson, 2 N. M. 247, it was held that the right of the court to assess damages in replevin on a default judgment did not infringe any constitutional right, the court saying: "The weight of decisions in the states upon similar statutes is in the affirmative."

New York:

In New York the practice under the Revised Statutes was for the clerk to assess the damages on contracts where the amount was a mere matter of calculation; in other cases a writ of inquiry was necessary. This was substantially continued by the Code of Procedure. The Code of Civil Procedure, § 1215, provides that in all cases of personal injury or injury to property the damages must be ascertained by a writ of inquiry; and this is the present Code provision.

In an action for conversion of money, it was held that a writ of inquiry was necessary. In Fullerton v. Young, 46 Misc. 292, 94 N. Y. Supp. 511. The court said: "It was unquestionably the ancient practice for this court to assess damages in tort actions where the same could be ascertained by mere calculation or was fixed by agreement, and only in instances where the damages were uncertain, such as slander, libel, and assault and battery, were writs of inquiry required. Such, also, was the practice for many years under the Code of Procedure (§ 246), but upon the adoption of the Code of Civil Procedure, in 1876, important changes were made, and, among others, a provision that in all cases of personal injury or injury to property the damages must be ascertained by a writ of inquiry. Code Civ. Proc. § 1215. The term 'injury to property,' as so employed, might very well be regarded as having reference only to physical acts inflicting injury upon specific real or personal property, were it not for the definition contained in § 3343, subdiv. 10, where the words 'injury to property' are defined as 'an actionable act whereby the estate of another is lessened, other than a personal injury or the breach of a contract.' The word 'property,' as defined by §§ 2, 3, and 4 of the statutory construction law (Laws 1892, chap. 677, p. 1486), embraces money. I therefore see no escape from the conclusion that the conversion of money collected by the defendant and belonging to the plaintiffs' assignor constituted an injury to property, as such conversion certainly lessened the estate of such assignor."

And, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1215, authorizing a court to make an assessment on default, except where the action is for damages for personal injuries, it was held that, in an action for personal injuries, the damages must be ascertained by a writ of inquiry. Elsay v. International R. Co. 93 App. Div. 115, 87 N. Y. Supp. 28.

In Bossout v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 131 N. Y. 37, 29 N. E. 753, which was an affirmation of a verdict of damages, and a remittitur directing a judgment to be entered pursuant to the stipulation on appeal, it was held that the effect of the affirmation of the order granting a new trial and the entry of judgment absolute thereon in the supreme court was the same as if the whole of plaintiff's action had been admitted and a default had occurred, and the sole question left was as to the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff. The court reviewed the old practice and that of the Code for assessing damages on writ of inquiry.

In a proceeding against a defendant by publication, proof of the cause of action was made to the court on default. The court said: "The Code does not specify the nature of such proof. It was sufficient here to satisfy the court, and consequently there was jurisdiction to grant the judgment." Stow v. Stacy, 14 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 45.

Under N. Y. Code, § 246, subdiv. 2, providing that the court may assess the damages or order a reference, it was held that, on a judgment by default on failure to answer, the court might order the damages to be assessed by a jury in an action on a bail undertaking given to procure a discharge from civil arrest. Kelsey v. Covert, 15 How. Pr. 92.

And, under N. Y. Code Proc. § 246, subdiv. 1, authorizing the clerk to assess the damages on default in an action on an instrument for the payment of money only, it was held that the Code did not require that the contract should be one stipulating by its terms for the payment of money, but required that the action should be one arising on contract, and that only money should be sought to be recovered. Croden v. Drew, 3 Duer, 652.

And, under N. Y. Code Proc. § 246, providing that in actions not on an instrument for the payment of money the clerk is to ascertain the amount, it was held that the clerk was substituted for the former sheriff's jury of inquiry, in an action on account for goods sold. Squire v. Elsworth, 4 How. Pr. 77.

And, under N. Y. Code, § 266, where the defendant did not appear, it was held that the plaintiff could waive a jury and take an inquest before the court at the circuit. Haines v. Davis, 6 How. Pr. 118, 1 N. Y. Code Rep. N. S. 407. The court said: "It has been several times decided that the 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

practice of taking inquests at the circuit was not abolished by the Code of Procedure (Anderson v. Hough, 1 N. Y. Code Rep. 50; Dickinson v. Kimball, 1 N. Y. Code Rep. 83; Sheldon v. Martin, 1 N. Y. Code Rep. 81; Jones v. Russell, 3 How. Pr. 324.) Provision is also made for taking inquests by the 12th rule. . . . Usually in these cases the defendant does not appear, and the importance of a jury to him cannot depend on the order, in regard to other causes on the calendar, in which his is tried."

And, under N. Y. Code Proc. § 1008, providing that, in actions triable by a jury, if the parties waive the trial by jury of the issue of fact, the action must be tried by the court without a jury, unless a reference is directed, and § 1009, providing that a party may waive his right to a jury by failing to appear at the trial, it was held that on default the defendant waived his right to a jury. Thompson v. Finn, 9 Daly, 379. This was an action for personal injuries, and the court could have tried the case with or without a jury.

In an action for damages for injury to the person, on default the court, in Stanley v. Anderson, 1 N. Y. Code Rep. 52, directed the sheriff to summon a jury on a writ of inquiry. N. Y. Code 1848, § 202, subdiv. 2, providing for judgment by the clerk in actions on contract, and, where proof is required, that the court may order a reference, and, where the action is for money only, the court, if the plaintiff requires it, shall order the damages to be assessed by a jury, being silent as to the manner in which such assessment should be made, the plaintiff demanded a jury and the damages were assessed at $12.

A judgment by default against defendant in action of trespass entered without proof is erroneous, as an assessment of damages is necessary. Dutch Reformed Church v. Wood, 8 Barb. 421.

In an action for damages for an assault it was held that such damages should be assessed by a jury, unless the examination of a long account was necessary,—this being an action for the recovery of money only,—and a reference was erroneous. Boyce v. Comstock, 1 N. Y. Code Rep. N. S. 290.

On a default in an action containing a count on a note, and the common money count, it was held that the clerk could assess general damages. Colden v. Knickerbacker, 2 Cow. 31. 1 N. Y. Rev. Laws, 522, authorizes the court in certain cases, on judgment by default, to refer to the clerk to assess the damages. Section 17 provides that, if the suit is on any bill or note truly set forth in the declaration, the execution of such bill or note need not be proven. Section 18 authorizes the clerk to take proof, and, if required, report the same to the court. So may the clerk assess damages on an account stated.

And in an action of debt on default, it was held that a writ of inquiry was not necessary, and that the damages could be assessed by the clerk. Fenton v. Garlick, 6 Johns. 287.

And where, in an action of assumpsit on a default, a jury was summoned and the damages assessed in the presence of the court without an inquisition, it was held that the proceedings were regular, as the court could assess the damages without a jury. McCollum v. Barker, 3 Johns. 153. The court said: "If the court might have dispensed with the jury, they could, of course, have dispensed with an inquisition formally signed and sealed by the jury, who acted in their presence."

Where a writ of inquiry was directed to be executed at the circuit, it was held that the circuit judge, and not the sheriff, could take direction of its execution. Ellsworth v. Thompson, 13 Wend. 658. The court said: "In actions sounding in damages, or where the demand is unliquidated, it is said the court may assess the damages themselves, and that the inquisition before the sheriff is merely to inform the conscience of the court; but, whatever theories we may indulge, the assessment of damages by a jury, when it cannot be done by calculation, is a proceeding which the court have no right to depart from."

In Fenton v. Garlick, supra, it was said: "In Blackmore v. Flemmyng (7 T. R. 446) it was held to be at the election of the plaintiffs to have the prothonotary tax interest on the judgment on which the action of debt was brought, or to have the sum assessed by a jury of inquiry. In Nelson v. Sheridan (8 T. R. 395) the court of King's bench refused to grant a rule to refer a similar point to the master, and said it should be left to a jury. These cases are not reconcilable with each other; but the former is the better guide, and the more correct decision, for it is warranted by the settled practice and the old authorities."

In Kreitz v. Frost, 55 Barb. 474, it was said that the practice under N. Y. Rev. Stat. 280, before the adoption of the Code of Procedure, required the clerk to assess damages on default on bills of exchange, notes, contracts for absolute payment of a sum certain, or on contracts for the delivery of specific articles, and, in all other cases where the damages were not a mere matter of calculation, the only mode of ascertaining them was by a writ of inquiry. It was held that this practice was substantially continued by the Code of Procedure; only where taking of an account or proof of any fact is necessary, the court may order a reference. In an equity suit a writ of inquiry was never ordered.

In Brown v. Miller, 1 Barb. 24, where plaintiff, on default, wanted a reference, a rule was made that hereafter a sworn copy of the account on which suit was brought would be required to be attached, so that it could be ascertained whether a reference was necessary. The court said: "Cases of this kind have occurred where the damages could very conveniently have been ascertained by a sheriff's jury, but where the plaintiff's attorney, upon an affidavit like this, has obtained a rule of reference and very largely and unnecessarily augmented the costs."

In Randolph v. Foster, 3 E. D. Smith, 648, which was an action for a mechanics' lien, the defendant made default and plaintiff's damages were assessed by a sheriff's jury. The plaintiff asked for an extra allowance and costs.

Where the plaintiff in a libel case obtained an order for a sheriff's jury to assess the damages, he could not thereafter have that order changed to a jury before the judges. Joannes v. Fisk, 3 Robt. 710. The court said: "The Revised Statutes seem to provide for the holding of a court by the sheriff in such cases (2 Rev. Stat. 286, §§ 47, 58), and, if so, he must have a right to exercise judicial powers as to the subordinate questions arising in the course of the assessment, as well as the preservation of order and the punishment of witnesses for disobeying a subpoena."

On a motion by plaintiff on default, in an action for assault and battery, that the amount be assessed before a jury at the trial term, instead of by a sheriff and his jury, it was held that the fact that the attorneys for the defendant were the advisers of the sheriff was insufficient to change the practice. Hays v. Berryman, 6 Bosw. 679.

North Carolina:

Under the various Code provisions, the decisions in North Carolina are to the effect that, where the amount can be ascertained by computation, a writ of inquiry is not necessary; but in all other cases a jury is necessary.

So, under N. C. Code Civ. Proc. § 217, providing that, if the taking of an account or proof of fact is necessary, the court may hear the proof or order a reference; and, where the action is for the recovery of money only, or real or personal property, with damages, the court may order the damages to be assessed by a jury or a reference,—it was held that, in an action for the recovery of money only, it was competent for the court to pass upon the facts or refer them to a jury. Dunn v. Barnes, 73 N. C. 273.

And, in an action for goods sold and delivered, where the claim was precise and agreed to, or could be rendered certain by computation, it was held that there was no necessity for a writ of inquiry, under N. C. Code Civ. Proc. § 217, providing that, in all actions on contracts for the recovery of money only, the court shall render judgment. Adrian v. Jackson, 75 N. C. 536.

And, under N. C. Code Civ. Proc. § 217, where the action was on an account for property sold and money lent, and was not sworn to, it was held that the amount should be assessed by the clerk on a default before final judgment. Oates v. Gray, 66 N. C. 442.

And, where the complaint was sworn to and the action was for a specific sum, due by contract, it was held that, on default, a jury was not necessary under N. C. Code Civ. Proc. § 217. Rogers v. Moore, 86 N.

C. 85. The court said: "The section of the Code under review, so far as it undertakes to delegate judicial power to the clerk which he might exercise in vacation, has been superseded and rendered inoperative by subsequent legislation which makes the summons returnable to terms of the court, and the judgments the act of the judge and not of the subordinate officer under him. Battle's Rev. Stat. chap. 18; Mabry v. Erwin, 78 N. C. 45. The result seems to restore the old practice in this particular, and to refer the inquiry of damages after an interlocutory judgment to the jury acting under the supervision of the judge, and not to leave this to the mere oath of the plaintiff as to what he supposes those damages to be."

In Williams v. Beasley, 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 112, it was said: "There cannot, therefore, properly be a final judgment, by default, upon appeal from a justice of the peace; but the matter must be determined upon proofs, either by the court or by a jury."

On an appeal from a justice, where the defendant did not plead, it was held that the proper practice was to call in a jury to assess the sum due the plaintiff; in the nature of an assessment of the damages on a writ of inquiry on a judgment by default. It was held that this practice was not founded on a statute, but was proper to aid the court, and was not erroneous, for, if the court could give a summary judgment, there was no harm in adding a jury. Ramsour v. Harshaw, 30 N. C. (8 Ired. L.) 480.

In an action of assumpsit upon an unliquidated account judgment was had and an appeal taken. It was held that in default on an appeal it was necessary to have an inquiry of damages. Act 1808, 1 Rev. Stat. chap. 31, § 96, Rev. Code, chap. 31, § 91, provided that, in suits on bills of exchange, notes, and signed accounts, a clerk could ascertain the interest without a writ of inquiry, and the amount ascertained was to be included in final judgment. Section 105 of the Revised Code provides the same on appeals, and that, in default on such demands as are mentioned in § 91, the plaintiff shall have judgment, and, in other cases, have his inquiry by a jury. This required a writ in actions which sounded in damages, as covenant and assumpsit. Hartsfield v. Jones, 49 N. C. (4 Jones, L.) 309.

A default judgment and damages in an action of trespass without a writ of inquiry was held erroneous, under N. C. Rev. Code, chap. 31, § 57, providing that, on failure of defendant to answer, the plaintiff may have judgment by default, which, in actions of debt, should be final, unless where damages are suggested on the roll; and in that case, and all others not specially provided for where the recovery shall be in damages, a writ of inquiry shall be executed at the next term. Moore v. Mitchell, 61 N. C. (Phill. L.) 304.

held erroneous, as a jury should have assessed the damages on a writ of inquiry before the judgment was made final. Williams v. Rockwell, 64 N. C. 325.

N. C. Rev. Code, chap. 31, § 91, provides that, on default, in an action on a single bond, a covenant for the payment of money, bill of exchange, note, or a signed account, a judgment is final; and the clerk ascertains the interest without a writ of inquiry. It was held that the practice was that, where the action sounded in damages, as in assumpsit, covenant, or trespass, a judgment by default was only interlocutory, and the amount of damages should be ascertained by a jury upon a writ of inquiry. Parker v. Smith, 64 N. C. 291.

And in Merwin v. Ballard, 66 N. C. 398, it was said: "This action is upon an open account and sounds in damages, and the judgment upon demurrer, like a judgment by default in such cases, can only be interlocutory, and the amount of damages must be ascertained by a jury upon a writ of inquiry." The North Carolina Civil Code of Practice had just gone into effect and was held not to apply to this case, but the law as it existed when the action was brought.

In an action on a constable's bond where there was default, it was held that N. C. Code Civ. Proc. § 217, applied, providing that, in actions on contracts for the recovery of money only, the clerk ascertains the amount; and in other actions the judge may, upon proof, ascertain the damages or may order a reference, or have the damages assessed by a jury. Parker v. House, 66 N. C. 374.

In an action for unliquidated damages, a judgment final on default, instead of interlocutory with an inquiry as to the damages, was held erroneous, under N. C. Code Civ. Proc. § 217, sub. 2. White v. Snow, 71 N. C. 232.

In an action for conversion of personal property it was held that it was for unliquidated damages, and a writ of inquiry was necessary. Mayfield v. Jones, 70 N. C. 536.

In Wynne v. Prairie, 86 N. C. 73, the court said: "The requirement in the Code that, upon default, the clerk 'shall enter judgment for the amount mentioned in the summons' has become impracticable by the change in its form; and it would seem that the provisions in regard to ascertaining the amount of an unliquidated demand by the clerk have been superseded by the restoration of the old practice of a writ of inquiry following the interlocutory judgment that the plaintiff ought to recover, and that he do recover, his damages, until they have been assessed and determined. This court has also extended the right to a final judgment, as in Mabry v. Erwin, 78 N. C. 45, to cases which do not rest on contract, but where the judgment is for a definite and liquidated demand according to the former mode of procedure."

N. C. Code, § 385, provides for judgment by default final on a verified complaint on a contract to pay a sum of money fixed or capable of being ascertained by computation. Section 386 provides that in all other actions judgment by default and inquiry shall be had at the return term, and the inquiry shall be executed at the next succeeding term; and, in an action to remove a cloud on title, except where a reference may be ordered to state a long account, the inquiry shall be by jury, unless, by consent, the court is to try the facts as well as the law. It was held, in an action to remove a cloud on title, that this section controlled, and a default final at the return term was error. Junge v. MacKnight, 135 N. C. 105, 47 S. E. 452.

And a jury was held necessary on a judgment by default in a suit on a bail bond, under N. C. Code Civ. Proc. § 217, amended by N. C. Code, § 385, providing that final judgment may be taken by default on a verified claim on a contract to pay absolutely a sum of money fixed by contract or capable of being ascertained therefrom by computation. Roulhac v. Miller, 90 N. C. 174.

And, in an action on an open account to recover the value of goods sold, it was held that judgment should be by default and inquiry, under N. C. Code, § 385, in Witt v. Long, 93 N. C. 388. In this case the allegation of an agreement to pay did not imply that the defendant stipulated to pay the price charged, and the sum to be paid was not fixed by the terms of the contract.

And, in State ex rel. Anthony v. Estes, 101 N. C. 541, 8 S. E. 347, in an action on a guardian bond for misconduct, the question of damages was submitted to the jury on default.

And, where the amount could not be ascertained by computation, or was not fixed by the terms of the contract sued on, a final judgment on default was held erroneous, under N. C. Code, §§ 385, 386. Skinner v. Terry, 107 N. C. 103, 12 S. E. 118.

In an action for malicious prosecution on default, the damages were referred to a jury, in Banks v. Gay Mfg. Co. 108 N. C. 282, 12 S. E. 741.

And in Faucette v. Ludden, 117 N. C. 170, 23 S. E. 173, it was said that, under N. C. Code, § 385, 'if a complaint should allege a breach of contract without setting out that the contract provides for the payment absolutely or upon a contingency of a sum or sums of money fixed by the terms of the contract or capable of being ascertained therefrom by computation, and no answer is filed, the proper judgment is one by default and inquiry.'

And, in an action on an official bond of the clerk of the superior court, it was held that a final judgment under N. C. Code, § 385, was not the judgment required; but it could only be a judgment by default and inquiry, under § 386, which could not be executed until the next term. State ex rel. Battle v. Baird, 118 N. C. 854, 24 S. E. 668.

In an action on an open account a default judgment that was final was held to be irregular, as it should have been by default and inquiry; but even this judgment should not be set aside without showing a good defense. Jeffries v. Aaron, 120 N. C. 167, 26 S. E. 696.

In Junge v. MacKnight, supra, Connor, J., dissenting, held that this case overruled Jeffries v. Aaron, supra, on the ground that in this case the default judgment was set aside without showing prima facie a valid defense.

But in an action for goods sold, where the complaint alleged that the defendant promised to pay a sum certain, and the complaint was verified, the plaintiff was entitled to final judgment on default, under N. C. Code, § 385. Hartman v. Farrior, 95 N. C. 177.

And, in an action for a sum certain expended for the benefit of defendant, where the complaint was verified, a judgment by default final was held to be proper, under N. C. Code, § 385 (1). The court said: "There was nothing for the jury to pass upon. Upon a judgment by default and inquiry the legal liability is fixed by the default, and the inquiry is only to ascertain the amount." Cowles v. Cowles, 121 N. C. 272, 28 S. E. 476.

And, where the action was for a sum certain, expended for the benefit of the defendant and upon an implied promise to repay, and the complaint was verified, it was held that judgment was proper by default final, under N. C. Code, § 385, subdiv. 1. Scott v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. 137 N. C. 515, 50 S. E. 221.

In an action on a note and for fraudulent conversion of money, on a judgment by default, it was held that the court had a right to enter final judgment on the cause of action on the note, under N. C. Code, § 385; but it was said that it did not have the right to enter judgment on the charge of fraud, which would have required a writ of inquiry if such judgment had been asked for. Stewart v. Bryan, 121 N. C. 46, 28 S. E. 18.

In an action sounding in damages and for tort, it was held that a judgment by default and inquiry was conclusive as to the cause of action; and the plaintiff would have been entitled to nominal damages without any proof. McLeod v. Nimocks, 122 N. C. 437, 29 S. E. 577.

Ohio:

In Ohio, under the statutes of that state, if neither party demands a jury, the court may assess the damages.

On a default it was held, in Eaton v. Morgan, Tappan, 45, that liquidation of damages could not be referred to a clerk; and a reference was therefore held void.

In an action of ejectment it was said: "If this judgment had been properly rendered by default, it would then have been competent for the court to assess the damages; the statutory provision being as follows: 'That, where judgment shall be entered by default against the defendant, the court shall assess the damages, unless the plaintiff or defendant request a writ of inquiry.' Swan Stat. (Ohio) 671, § 98." Slocum v. Swan, 4 Ohio St. 161.

In Averill Coal & Oil Co. v. Verner, 22 Ohio St. 372, which was an action to recover money for services and for money loaned, it was said: "By § 376 of the Code it is provided, however, that the court may, in an action where the taking of an account, or the proof of a fact, or the assessment of damages, is necessary to enable the court to pronounce judgment upon failure to answer, refer the same to a referee on the motion of the party not in default. At the time the order of reference was made in this case the defendant was in default of answer, and no jury was demanded by it at that or at any other time during the pendency of the action." The court said that, if the defendant had not answered or demanded a jury, the judgment on the report of reference could not be disturbed.

Oregon:

In Oregon the court may, under the Code, assess the damages in cases of default. This is held not to be in conflict with any constitutional right.

In Gohres v. Illinois & J. Gravel Min. Co. 40 Or. 516, 67 Pac. 666, it was said that Hill's Anno. Laws (Or.) § 249, subdiv. 12, provides that, on default, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment in action on contract for the recovery of money or damages only; but in all other actions, including those sounding in damages or tort, as opposed to an action of debt, the clerk shall enter the default, and thereafter the plaintiff may apply for the relief demanded; and, where the judgment is rendered otherwise than on a verdict, the court shall, without a jury, assess the damages, and may hear, proof or make an order of reference.

Hill's Code 1892, § 249, subdiv. 2, authorizing a court to assess damages without a jury, was held not to conflict with the Constitution. Deane v. Willamette Bridge Co. 22 Or. 167, 15 L.R.A. 614, 29 Pac. 440. In this case it was said "that a writ of inquiry, as established at common law, was a matter of practice, and not of right, and is subject to the supervision of the court or the legislature." The language of the territorial statute which was in force at the time of the adoption of the Constitution is that upon default "the court may order the damages to be assessed by a jury," indicating that the power vested in the court was discretionary, either to assess the damages itself or direct a jury to assess them. This construction is consistent with the practice as established at the common law. Under that practice the power was discretionary.

Pennsylvania:

In Pennsylvania the statutes provide for defaults in the absence of an affidavit of defense. Some courts provide for such practice by rule. These all seem to apply only in cases on contract, and not where tort or negligence enters into the cause of action. This practice has been held to be no invasion of any constitutional right to trial by jury. The questions arising on the right to default judgment for want of an 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

affidavit of defense are not within the scope of this note. They can be found in the notes in Purdon's Digest of Statutes, 13th ed. subject, "Practice."

Act March 21, 1806, provides for judgment by default on failure to file an affidavit of defense in actions for any debt founded on a verbal promise, book account, note, bond, penal or single bill. Act May 25, 1887, provides for statement of claim in assumpsit and trespass. Act March 28, 1835, § 2, provides for default in actions in district courts of Philadelphia on bills, notes, bonds, or other instruments of writing for the payment of money, and for the recovery of book debts, and in all actions of scire facias on judgments and on liens of mechanics on failure to file an affidavit of defense; and provides that each of the judges of said court may render judgments by default. Act April 22, 1899, provides that the courts of the state may, by rule, authorize the prothonotary to enter judgment for want of affidavit of defense.

A rule of court requiring an affidavit of defense in all actions of debt or contract, and providing for judgment for want of affidavit, was held not to be contrary to the Constitution providing that the trial by jury shall be as heretofore. It was held that the rule made no alteration in the trial by jury, but only provided that, previous to the trial, the defendant shall swear or affirm that to the best of his knowledge and belief he has a just cause of defense. Vanatta v. Anderson, 3 Binn. 417.

And the affidavit-of-defense law of Pennsylvania was held not to infringe any constitutional right to a trial by jury. Lawrance v. Borm, 86 Pa. 225. The court said: "Clearly, if a defendant in an action presents no defense to be tried by a jury, he cannot claim that his privilege is denied him. . . . And when, on a statement of all the facts a defendant can conscientiously swear to, the court finds that the law upon these facts is against him, clearly, he has no right to go before a jury."

And, in an action on a note where no affidavit of defense was filed, the defendant had a reference to arbitrators. This was set aside and judgment was rendered for plaintiff, under Pa. act April 21, 1852, relating to Berks and Tioga counties, requiring affidavits of defense. This act was held to be constitutional, the court saying: "You cannot try your defense either by arbitration, or by jury, unless you have one, and, under the act of 1852, you are conclusively presumed not to have any until you swear to it, and put your oath on record." Taggart v. Fox, 1 Grant. Cas. 190.

And in Bishop v. Denormandie, 1 Pittsb. 145, where the affidavit of defense was held insufficient, it was held that Pa. act April 21, 1851, authorizing judgments of default in actions on bills, notes, bonds, or other instruments of writing for the payment of money, and contracts for the loan or advance of money, whether in writing or not, was constitutional.

In Lawrance v. Smedley, 6 W. N. C. 42, where, in an action on a note, the trial court entered judgment for the plaintiff for want of sufficient affidavit of defense, on error, it was urged that the affidavit-of-defense law was unconstitutional as it was in violation of the right of trial by jury. It was held that the affidavit of defense was sufficient allegation of a set-off. The court did not discuss the constitutional question.

In Hoffman v. Locke, 19 Pa. 57, a defendant entered a rule to choose arbitrators in an action on a note, and the plaintiff thereafter asked judgment, under Pa. act April 3, 1851, authorizing judgment to be entered in certain cases for want of an affidavit of defense, and the court ordered the rule to arbitrate stricken out and gave judgment for plaintiff. On appeal it was said: "This judgment was pronounced by the court for want of an affidavit of defense, and in accordance with an act of the legislature. But it is said the legislature had no power under the Constitution to pass such a law. The clause of the Constitution which forbids it is not pointed out; and I am ignorant of any provision which secures to the good people of this commonwealth the privilege of making false defenses against honest claims. The law is not only constitutional, but eminently wise, just, and necessary. It is no tyranny to require that a good defense shall be fully and fairly stated on the record and no hardship to verify it on oath. Still less is it a subject of reasonable complaint that a judgment may be rendered against a party who, upon his own showing, has no legal or equitable ground upon which he can resist it. . . . How such men can demand a jury trial without doing violence to their principles is not easy to see, unless they forget that jurors are always sworn."

In Lynch v. Kerns, 10 Phila. 335, it was said: "The affidavit-of-defense law is a just and necessary one, and its influence on the administration of justice has been most salutary; but it is a departure from the course of the common law, as a mode of obtaining judgment."

In Wall v. Dovey, 60 Pa. 213, where the plaintiff did not comply with the act of March 25, 1835, in regard to filing "book entries," the judgment rendered on account of insufficient affidavit of defense was set aside. Referring to Hamill v. O'Donnell, 2 Miles (Pa.) 101, the court said: "In that case judgment had been entered, but, on a rule to show cause why it should not be set aside, as it appeared on examination that the copy filed was a copy of ledger entries, the rule was made absolute. This is the only safe principle on which the act can be administered. It confers a special power to enter a compulsory judgment against a defendant, and is in derogation of his right to a trial by jury."

In an action on a note it was held that on default the court could render judgment and assess damages without a writ of inquiry. Bank of United States v. Thayer, 2 Watts & S. 443. The Pennsylvania act of 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

March 28, 1835, gives the court power to enter judgment by default in all cases, without exception, when the suit is on a bill, a note, or other instrument for the payment of money. It was held that, under the charter of the Bank of the United States providing the rate of interest on failure to pay its notes, the interest was fixed.

In Yates v. Meadville, 56 Pa. 21, where it was held that a rule of the common pleas court requiring the filing of an affidavit of defense in all cases of scire facias upon a mechanic's claim did not extend to municipal claims, it was said: "Now, though the affidavit rule has been found convenient in practice, and is therefore to be commended, yet it is in derogation of the right of trial by jury, and cannot therefore be extended by construction beyond its terms. The practice in Philadelphia, or in other places where the district-court law is extended, furnishes no guide."

In Church v. Given, 15 Phila. 188, a judgment was entered on a warrant of attorney attached to a bond of indemnity, and the damages were assessed by the prothonotary ex parte. An averment of default had been filed, and the assessment showed the amount of the liens with interest and costs. On a rule to strike off the assessment of damages on the grounds that they were not liquidated and there was nothing to show the exact amount, that they could not be assessed in the office, and that there should be a writ of inquiry, the rule was made absolute without opinion.

In Corry v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 194 Pa. 516, 45 Atl. 341, it was held that the act of May 25, 1887, providing for default judgments in the absence of an affidavit of defense, did not apply to causes of actions which were ex delicto or of a mixed character containing an element of contract and an element of tort. The court said: "Where the element of negligence enters into the relation of the parties, indefinite and uncertain damages, depending not on any stipulations of the parties, whether express or implied, but on the uncertain verdicts of juries, become substituted as the foundation of the right of recovery." Rhode Island:

In Rhode Island the statutory provision is that in default judgments damages shall be assessed by the court, or, at the discretion of the court, by a jury, in all cases except where otherwise provided.

R. I. Gen. Laws, 1896, chap. 243, § 5, provides that in all cases, except where otherwise provided, if judgment be rendered on default, damages shall be assessed by the court, with or without a jury, at the discretion of the court. It was held that excessive damages on default could not be reviewed on appeal. King v. Rhode Island Co. 27 R. I. 112, 60 Atl. 837.

On error to the circuit court for the district of Rhode Island, in an action on bills of exchange, on default, judgment was entered and damages and protest. The Rhode Island acts provided that in all cases where judgment shall pass by default it shall be inquired into and assessed by the court, or otherwise by a writ of inquiry, at the discretion of the court. It was held that the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed. Brown v. VanBraam, 3 Dall. 344, 1 L. ed. 629. South Carolina:

In South Carolina the early statutes provided for reference to the clerk in actions on liquidated demands on default. This was held not to apply where such judgments were final and needed no verdict before the act. An inquisition was held proper to ascertain the "interest" due on a judgment. But a judgment was held to be a liquidated demand. The later Code provides for default without a jury in cases of liquidated demands and verified accounts; in all other cases by the verdict of a jury.

On an assessment of damages by the clerk on default, under act 1809, 1 Brev. Dig. 39, § 32, providing for reference to the clerk in actions on liquidated demands on default, it was held that in an action on a note, the clerk could make his assessment on the copy of the note and file his declaration; but he should have required the original. Bank of State v. Vaughan, 2 Hill, L. 556.

In Dinkins v. Vaughan, 1 M'Cord, L. 554, it was held that the act of 1809 which refers the sum actually due on any liquidated demand to be assessed by the clerk, could not have intended to include such cases wherein the judgments were final and required no verdict even before the act, as, for instance, a debt on a bond or judgment. In such cases the remedy was perfect before the act, and required no alteration. This case was an action of debt on a judgment which was referred to the clerk to assess damages, and the motion to set aside the judgment and execution was sustained.

And, in an action on a judgment, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to a writ of inquiry, after judgment by default, to recover interest in the way of damages. Smith v. Vanderhorst, 1 M'Cord, L. 328, 10 Am. Dec. 674. The court said: "Where an inquisition is taken, it is to inform the conscience of the court merely in cases of interlocutory judgments, where, from the particular circumstances of the case, it is doubtful whether any, and, if any, what, damages should be given. In cases of this description, it should be left to a jury to consider of the damages."

A judgment was held to be a liquidated demand under the act of 1809, providing that in actions on liquidated demands it shall not be necessary for the plaintiff to execute a writ of inquiry. Crowther v. Sawyer, 2 Speers, L. 573.

Act 1809, 7 Stat. at L. 308, provides that in all actions on any liquidated demand, where the defendant suffers an order for judgment to be entered, it shall not be necessary for the plaintiff to prove his demand, or execute a writ of inquiry, but the same shall be referred to the clerk to ascertain the sum due. It was held that, in an action of assumpsit against the drawee, where there had been no acceptance, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the action was not on a liquidated demand, as it was not in writing and the only exception to this was an action on a judgment which was held to be a writing of the defendant. Wilkie v. Walton, 2 Speers, L. 473. The court said: "But there is no other case of which I am aware where a demand in writing, to which the defendant is not a party by his signature, can be called a liquidated demand."

Under Code, § 267, providing that, where the action is for the recovery of money only, default judgment may be given if the demand is liquidated; and, if unliquidated, and the plaintiff itemizes his account and attaches an affidavit that it is true and correct, judgment may be rendered as in the case of the liquidated demand; and in all other cases relief shall be ascertained either by the verdict of a jury, or, in cases of chancery, by the judge, with or without a reference,—it was held that, where the itemized account attached to the complaint was unverified, and a summons served only on one of the defendants, no judgment by default could be rendered against either of the defendants. Roberts v. Pawley, 50 S. C. 491, 27 S. E. 913.

In Marion v. Charleston, 72 S. C. 576, 52 S. E. 418, it was said that, under art. 267 of the Code, in case of default the relief shall be ascertained by a verdict of the jury, or, in case of chancery, by the judges, with or without a reference. This was an action to cancel a deed for fraud and for damages where an answer had been filed. South Dakota:

The present Code of Civil Procedure, § 237, provides for judgments on default by the court in actions on contracts for the recovery of money only, and in other actions, if the taking of an account or proof of fact is necessary, the court may hear proof or order a reference. Where the action is for the recovery of money only, or of specific real or personal property, with damages for withholding, the court may order the damages to be assessed by a jury.

In Searles v. Lawrence, 8 S. D. 11, 65 N. W. 34, where the question was as to the notice to be given the defendant of the assessment, it was held that, under Comp. Laws, § 5025, providing that judgment may be had where the defendant fails to answer the complaint in an action on contract for the recovery of money only, and the court shall enter judgment for the amount; but, if the complaint is not sworn to, the court shall ascertain the amount which the plaintiff is entitled to recover and enter the judgment as assessed,—no notice of the assessment was required. This was an action on a note.

Tennessee:

Under the Code of Tennessee, if the amount due is one of simple calculation from the papers in the case, a jury is held not necessary; but it is required in other cases. The plaintiff may waive the right to a jury if the defendant does not object.

In STATE EX REL. SPATLIN v. THOMPSON, which was an action on an insurance policy which was not filed in the cause, it was held that there were no papers from which calculation could be made on default, and a jury was necessary, under Code, 4679 (2952, 3668), providing that in all cases where a default is taken, if the amount can be ascertained by simple calculation from the papers, judgment by default may be taken without the intervention of a jury; but in all other cases a jury is required.

And, under a similar statute (Code, § 2952), it was held that a jury was necessary in an action of debt for work and labor preformed, goods sold, and money paid. Masonic Educational Asso. v. Cook, 3 Head, 313. Referring to this section, the court said: "The term 'papers,' here refers to the writing or other evidence upon which the action is founded, and not to the pleadings in the cause. It was doubtless intended to apply to suits instituted upon bonds, bills of exchange, promissory notes, liquidated and signed accounts, and the like, from which the amount due the plaintiff could be readily ascertained by simple calculation. In all other cases the intervention of a jury is necessary to ascertain the sum due the plaintiff."

So, under Code, § 2952, a final judgment by default rendered upon an account, without a jury, was held erroneous, in Beeler v. Huddleston, 3 Coldw. 201.

In Williams v. Bank of Tennessee, 1 Coldw. 43, where the question was one of damages, being left blank in the declaration, it was said that, under Code, § 2957, it is provided that, if the defendant fails to appear and defend, judgment by default may be taken against him; and, by § 2952, a judgment is final if the amount of plaintiff's claim can be ascertained by simple calculation from the papers. "If the amount cannot be readily ascertained the damages will be ascertained by a jury impaneled at the same term for the purpose." In this case it was held that the court was authorized to give judgment as the amount of plaintiff's claim was susceptible of ascertainment from the note and protest.

In an action on a contract in writing for the payment of money where the amount due could be readily ascertained by calculation, it was held that a jury was not necessary. Williams v. Inman, 5 Coldw. 267. This was under Tenn. Code, § 2952.

And, in an action for damages, against a landlord for a falling building, where the plaintiff, on default, waived a jury, it was held that the judge could fix the amount where the defendant did not object. Taylor v. Sledge, 108 Tenn. 719, 69 S. W. 266.

But, in a judgment by default on an action of debt in detinue, it was held that a writ of inquiry was necessary, under act 1801, chap. 5, § 62, providing that if, in detinue, the verdict shall omit the price or value, the court may, at any time award a writ of inquiry to ascertain the same. Studdert v. Hassell, 6 Humph. 137.

default, which in an action of debt shall be final unless where damages are suggested on the roll; and in that case and others not specially provided for, when the recovery shall be in damages, a writ of inquiry shall be executed at the next term,—it was held, in an action of debt on a guardian's bond, that the statute should be followed; and a writ of inquiry was had at the term after that in which judgment by default was taken. Perry v. Starke, 10 Humph. 574.

And in an action to recover on a written contract to pay on demand a specific sum in gold, silver, confederate notes, or current bank notes, a judgment by default was held to entitle the plaintiff to the value of current bank notes at the time of the demand. It was held that a jury was necessary. Mississippi & T. R. Co. v. Green, 9 Heisk. 588.

Texas:

In Texas, under the statutes, in cases of liquidated demands, a jury is not required on default; but for unliquidated damages a jury is required. This latter right is held preserved by the Constitution.

So, under Hart's Dig. art. 812, providing that, if the cause of action is liquidated and proved by an instrument in writing, the clerk shall, unless a jury is asked for by either party, assess the damages, it was held that errors of the clerk in failing to credit payments indorsed on the note would be material error. Holland v. Cook, 10 Tex. 244.

And, in an action on a note drawing interest by the laws of another state, it was held not necessary to call a jury to ascertain the law of such state as to the rate of interest. It was held that the cause of action was liquidated by the writing as to the principal sum due, and the law ascertained the rate of interest, and the court could hear proof without a jury. Willard v. Conduit, 10 Tex. 213.

And, where the amount sued for was evidenced by writing, it was held that there was no necessity for a jury on a judgment by default, as nothing remained but to assess the damages. Tarrant Co. v. Lively, 25 Tex. Supp. 399.

And, in an action on a note for a liquidated sum, it was held that judgment by default could be rendered without a jury. Swift v. Faris, 11 Tex. 18.

In an action on a note after default it was held that nothing remained but for the clerk to assess the damages, under Hart's Dig. art. 812. Guest v. Rhine, 16 Tex. 549.

And in a suit on a liquidated demand on a note it was held that the damages were to be assessed by the clerk, who should allow the credits indorsed on the note in making his calculation. Harland v. Hendricks, 19 Tex. 292.

And in an action on a note it was held that the assessment should be made by the clerk, under the Texas statute which provided that, if the cause of action is liquidated and proved by any instrument in writing, the clerk shall, unless the party asks for a jury, assess the damages of the plaintiff. Trabue v. Stonum, 20 Tex. 453; Graves v. Farquhar, 20 Tex. 455. (The statute is not cited, but is believed to be Hart's Dig. art. 812.)

So, in an action to foreclose a mortgage note, it was held that, where the damages were liquidated, a jury was not necessary, under Tex. Stat. art. 812. Ricks v. Pinson, 21 Tex. 507.

In Roy v. Bremond, 22 Tex. 626, which was an action on a note and mortgage, there was judgment by default, a writ of inquiry was awarded, and the verdict of the jury establishing the liability of the defendants.

In Morrison v. Van Bibber, 25 Tex. Sup. 153, which was a default in an action on a mortgage, it was held that there was no necessity for a writ of inquiry as there were no unliquidated damages. This case does not refer to Roy v. Bremond, 22 Tex. 626; but in that case there was no question made as to the right to a writ of inquiry, and there Roberts, J., dissenting, said that a writ of inquiry was not necessary under Hart's Dig. art. 812.

An action on a note payable in current bank notes was held to be for a liquidated sum, and a jury was not necessary on default. It was held that the court could take judicial notice of the signification of the term. Fleming v. Nall, 1 Tex. 246.

And, in an action against an indorser of a note on a certain liquidated demand, where there were no damages to be assessed by the jury, it was held that final judgment on default could be rendered without the intervention of a jury. Cartwright v. Roff, 1 Tex. 78.

On a scire facias on a bond to keep the peace, on a default judgment a jury was not called, and judgment was rendered for the penalty. Lawton v. State, 5 Tex. 272.

In a suit on a note to enforce a vendor's lien, it was held that, plaintiff's cause of action being liquidated, it was not necessary to call a jury to assess the damages. Niblett v. Shelton, 28 Tex. 548. Oldham & W. Dig. art. 486, provides that, if the cause of action is liquidated and proved by a writing, the clerk shall, unless a jury is asked for, assess the damages.

And, in an action on a purchase-money note and to foreclose a vendor's lien, where the petition described the land, it was held that a judgment on default could be rendered without a jury. Bridges v. Reynolds, 40 Tex. 208.

And, in an action on a note and to foreclose a lien, it was held that, on judgment by default, the assessment of damages by the court without a jury was proper; and, if a jury was desired, it should have been demanded and a jury fee deposited. Bumpass v. Morrison, 70 Tex. 756, 8 S. W. 596.

But in Johnson v. Dowling, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 615, it was held that a judgment by default would be set aside if the petition was not sufficient to enable the court to render accurate judgment.

a jury should be sworn to assess the damages, it was held that, in an action of trespass for cutting timber, the province of the jury was simply to ascertain the amount of damages, and the plaintiff was not required to prove that the defendant was guilty of the trespass. Clark v. Compton, 15 Tex. 32.

And, in an action on an unliquidated demand, it was held that a final judgment on default could not be rendered without a jury, under Stat. vol. 4, p. 89, providing that, in suits upon unliquidated demands, the intervention of a jury must be had to ascertain the amount of indebtedness before the judgment by default can be made final. Cummings v. Butler, Dallam (Tex.) 531.

And, in an action for hiring slaves, where there was no written evidence of the indebtedness, it was held error to render judgment by default without a jury, under Oldham & W. Dig. art. 496, as the cause of action was not liquidated. Freeman v. Jordan, 33 Tex. 428.

And, where uncertain credits were indorsed on a note, it was held error to render judgment by default without the intervention of a jury, in Mills v. Stuhl, 37 Tex. 312.

In an action on a bond to keep the peace, it was held erroneous to render judgment on default without a jury, under Paschall's Dig. art. 2555, requiring proof in actions on such bonds. Brumme v. State, 30 Tex. 538. A breach of the bond was a question of fact to be ascertained by the jury.

In an action against the sureties on a sheriff's bond for nonfeasance in office, it was held that a jury was necessary on a default. Hurlock v. Reinhardt, 41 Tex. 580. The court said: "But the amount which he was entitled to recover from the sheriff was undoubtedly to be ascertained, not by the amount of his demand, but by the value of the attached property, of which he had failed to get the benefit by reason of the default of the sheriff, as alleged in the petition."

And, under Paschall's Dig. art. 1508, requiring a jury on an unliquidated demand, it was held that the failure to call a jury was error, as the statute applied at the time of this trial. Cross v. Huffaker, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 53.

In a suit for conversion of property it was held necessary for a jury to ascertain the amount of damages on default, where no question was propounded to the defendant, in the interrogatories filed, as to the extent of the damages. Mississippi Mills v. Bauman, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 312, 34 S. W. 681.

Where the defendant did not demand a jury or deposit a jury fee, in an action for unliquidated damages, it was held that the damages were properly assessed by the court. Bumpass v. Morrison, 70 Tex. 756, 8 S. W. 596.

In Mississippi Mills v. Bauman, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 312, 34 S. W. 681, where the action was for conversion, it was held that plaintiff was not entitled to a judgment by default, as it was necessary for the jury to ascertain the amount of damages. The court said: "No judgment by default was taken, and no request was made to have the jury find on this particular matter."

Rev. Stat. arts. 1284-1286, provide for a jury for defendants in case judgment is rendered by default, but do not expressly give this privilege to the plaintiffs. Where the plaintiffs had demanded a jury and paid a fee therefor, it was held that they were entitled to have the damages assessed by a jury, and the court did not err in giving them this privilege. This was an action for damages for failure to transport lumber. It was said that at common law, where the damages were not liquidated in default, a jury was always called, and this right was preserved by Bill of Rights, § 15, and could not be infringed by the act of legislation. Central & M. R. Co. v. Morris, 68 Tex. 61, 3 S. W. 457.

Vermont.

In Vermont, where the damages were uncertain, the assessment by jury was provided for by statute. A later statute provides for assessment by the court or jury, or a reference.

In Benham v. Sage, 1 D. Chip. (Vt.) 247, a jury was held necessary in an action on a recognizance on an appeal. Judiciary act, § 75, provides that in actions to recover forfeiture annexed to any articles of agreement, covenant, bond of recognizance with the condition annexed, contract, charter party, or specialty, where the forfeiture or nonperformance is found by a jury, or by default, the court may render judgment; and when the sum for which judgment ought to be rendered is uncertain, the same shall, on request of either party, be assessed by a jury.

In Webb v. Webb, 16 Vt. 636, it was said: "In this state it is not common to execute a writ of inquiry,—the damages, in cases of default, judgment upon demurrer, and by nil dicit, being usually assessed by the court, or by some person by them appointed for that purpose. This practice we have taken, I presume, mainly from Connecticut, for I do not find that the same practice obtains so generally elsewhere. But the course of trial and the necessity of proof are the same everywhere, and under all forms of procedure. And in this state, by statute, either party is entitled to have the damages assessed by the jury,—which would be a privilege of very little import if the judgment had already established conclusively the rule, or the quantum of damages. 1 Sw. Dig. 784, 785."

Rev. Laws 1880, § 1178, Vt. Stat. 1411, provides that, where judgment is rendered otherwise than on a verdict of a jury, the judges may, by themselves, by the jury in court, by the report of the clerk, or by a person appointed, ascertain the sum due. It was held in this case, where the court directed an assessment by the clerk, and ordered the cause continued for assessment, that, as regards the damages, they should be ascertained by the clerk at the term to which the case was continued. After the damages were so assessed, it then devolved upon the court to give final judgment, and such judicial action was necessary before final judgment could be entered. Leonard v. Sibley, 76 Vt. 254, 56 Atl. 1015. Virginia:

The Virginia statute provides for writ of inquiry; but this is not necessary in cases of liquidated demands. The statute which dispensed with a jury in actions on liquidated demands was held constitutional. In cases requiring evidence to establish plaintiff's demand a jury was held necessary.

Code, chap. 171, § 42, provides that, on default, judgment shall be entered with an order for damages to be inquired into when such inquiry is proper. Section 43 provides that there need be no inquiry in an action of debt on any bond or writing for the payment of money, or against the drawer or indorser of a bill of exchange or negotiable note, or scire facias upon a judgment or recognizance. It was held that, in an action of ejectment, there should be an order for an inquiry of damages. James River & K. Co. v. Lee, 16 Gratt. 424.

But, in an action of ejectment where no statement of damages was filed, it was held that there was no reason for an inquiry of damages, either by the court or jury, under Code 1887, § 2752 (Va. Code 1904, p. 1413). King v. Davis, 137 Fed. 198.

In an action on an insurance policy providing for an adjustment among several insurers, it was held that a writ of inquiry was necessary, under Code, § 3284, providing for a judgment by default, with an order for the damages to be inquired into when such inquiry was proper. It was held that § 3285, providing that, in an action on a writing for the payment of money, there need be no such inquiry, did not apply, as that statute meant writings like a bond for the payment of a certain sum. Commercial Union Assur. Co. v. Everhart, 88 Va. 962, 14 S. E. 836.

In an action of debt on a judgment, it was held that a writ of inquiry ought to have been awarded, under 1 Rev. Code, chap. 128, § 79, p. 508, providing for a default judgment on a specialty, bill, or note in writing. Sheiton v. Welsh, 7 Leigh. 175.

In an action of indebitatus assumpsit against the acceptor for nonpayment of a bill of exchange, a writ of inquiry was awarded, and the defendant acknowledged the plaintiff's action but did not confess judgment for any sum. It was held that the court was not authorized to render judgment for plaintiff, but should have caused a writ of inquiry. Dunbar v. Lindenberger, 3 Munf. 169. This judgment was not said to be in default, but it was discussed as though it was a confession of judgment.

In an action of debt for money loaned, but not founded on any specialty, or a note in writing, it was held that a writ of inquiry was necessary. Hunt v. M'Rea, 6 Munf. 454.

And, in an action on a note having credits indorsed, it was held that a writ of inquiry was necessary unless the plaintiff took the judgment subject to such credits, when a final judgment could be rendered in the office at rules for principal and interest. Rees v. Conococheague Bank, 5 Rand. (Va.) 326, 16 Am. Dec. 755.

And, in an action of debt against the makers and indorsers of a note, it was held that an office judgment could not be entered without a writ of inquiry. Hatcher v. Lewis, 4 Rand. (Va.) 152. In this case demand, protest, and notice would have to be proved. The court said: "In a suit against the drawer alone, a judgment might be rendered against him without a writ of inquiry; but, when he is sued with the indorser, no judgment can properly be given finally against him until a final judgment is also given against all the defendants."

And a writ of inquiry was held necessary in an action on a note against an indorser, as it was not, as against him, an action for the payment of money under act 1804, but a collateral contract to pay under certain circumstances. Metcalf v. Battaile, Gilmer (Va.) 191.

In James River & K. Co. v. Lee, 16 Gratt. 424, it was said that the prior cases in Gilmer, Randolph, and Leigh were under the Code of 1819, and a writ of inquiry was necessary in every case except in an action of debt upon an instrument of writing for the payment of an ascertained sum. The court said: "The present Code, chap. 171, § 43, seems to have made no other change in this respect than to extend the exception to an action of debt against indorsers, as well as the drawer, of a bill of exchange or negotiable note; and to an action of debt or scire facias upon a judgment or recognizance; in which cases it had been held, as we have seen, that a writ of inquiry was necessary, under the Code of 1819."

In an action on a note where the defendant declined to plead, but demanded a jury, it was held that he was not entitled to a jury, and that no constitutional right was denied. It was contended that Code, § 3211, giving a remedy by a motion for judgment on fifteen days' notice was a summary proceeding, and abrogated the rule of pleading; but it was held that defendant would be required to make an issue before he could demand a jury. Preston v. Salem Improv. Co. 91 Va. 583, 22 S. E. 486.

Washington:

Under Washington Codes the reference to a jury seems to be discretionary with the court.

In an action for forcible detainer it was held that the damages on default must be made by proof, under Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 5090, providing that, in an action on contract for the recovery of money only, the court may enter judgment, and in other actions for damages the court may order the damages to be assessed by a jury or by a reference. The amount of the damages was held not confessed by default. Ferguson v. Hoshi, 25 Wash. 664, 66 Pac. 105.

West Virginia:

In West Virginia the statute seems to provide for dispensing with a jury in actions on notes and the like. Where the amount recoverable is not ascertainable from the contract sued upon, it is held that the right to a jury is a constitutional one.

In an action of debt on a note, where the clerk entered office judgment and made an order for an inquiry of damages, it was held that the order was a nullity, and void. Code 1899, chap. 125, § 46, provides that every judgment entered in the clerk's office, in an action wherein there is no order for an inquiry of damages, shall become final on the last day of the next succeeding term. Bradley v. Long, 57 W. Va. 599, 50 S. E. 746.

Under Const. art. 3, § 13, providing that in suits at common law where the value in controversy exceeds $20, exclusive of interest and costs, the right of trial by jury, if required by either party, shall be preserved, it was held that there could be no final judgment by default without a writ of inquiry in any action of law where the value in controversy exceeds $20, where the action was for damages, or where the sum which the plaintiff was entitled to recover was not definitely ascertainable from the contract. Hickman v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 30 W. Va. 296, 4 S. E. 654, 7 S. E. 455. The court in this case having allowed a jury on the demand of plaintiff, it was held that the proceedings were regular. This case was an action for assault and battery.

Wisconsin:

A jury does not seem to be required in this state, but is within the discretion of the court, in actions not arising on contract for the recovery of money only. In such a case the assessment is made by the clerk, under the statutes. This provision is held not to be unconstitutional, as it does not confer judicial powers.

So, in Wells v. Morton, 10 Wis. 473, Rev. Stat. 1858, chap. 132, authorizing clerks of courts in default cases to enter up judgment in certain cases, was held not to conflict with Const. art. 7, § 2, vesting judicial power in the "courts" therein provided for.

In an action on a fire-insurance policy, it was held that the clerk had jurisdiction to enter up judgment, under Rev. Stat. § 2891, subdiv. 1, providing that judgment on default may be had in an action arising on contract for the recovery of money only, and, if the complaint is duly verified, the clerk shall enter judgment; but, if the complaint is not verified, the clerk shall assess the amount which the plaintiff is entitled to recover from examination of plaintiff under oath or other proof, and enter judgment. Schobacher v. Germantown Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co. 59 Wis. 86, 17 N. W. 969. This case holds that the clerk may enter judgment on a claim for unliquidated damages arising on contract.

Stat. 1898, § 2891, subdiv. 2, provides that, in actions other than those on contracts for the recovery of money only, if the taking an account or proof of any fact is necessary an order of reference may be made; and, when the action is for the recovery of money only, or of real or personal property, with damages, the court may order the damages to be assessed by a jury. It was held that the court, in an action of replevin, could refuse to give plaintiff judgment on default without evidence. Sibley v. Weinberg, 116 Wis. 1, 92 N. W. 427.

Rev. Stat. chap. 101, § 3, provides that, when a suit is brought on a written contract, and the same is set forth in the declaration, if interlocutory judgment is rendered by default the court shall direct the clerk to assess the damages. Section 8 provides that the clerk shall report to the court the sum ascertained to be due. Section 9 provides that the court shall give judgment. It was held that a judgment entered by the clerk in vacation, on a note, was erroneous. Holmes v. Lewis, 2 Wis. 83.

And, under Rev. Stat. chap. 132, § 27, in an action to recover the contract price of an article sold, where the complaint was not verified, it was held that, on default, the clerk should assess the amount from examination of plaintiff under oath, or other proof. Gorman v. Ball, 18 Wis. 25.

In an action on a note the verification of plaintiff's attorney was defective. It was held that the clerk should have made the assessment, under Rev. Stat. chap. 132, § 27, but the assessment should be made on the note without other evidence, and it might be presumed that it was made from the fact of his signing the judgment. Bonnell v. Gray, 36 Wis. 574.

II. English cases.

The practice in England, in actions for a liquidated sum resting in computation only, was to dispense with a writ of inquiry; but in other cases the reference was to a jury. This has changed in a degree,—some courts holding that the writ of inquiry is only to inform the conscience of the court, and that the courts might render judgment themselves. 1 Sellon's Practice, p. 347, says: "But a writ of inquiry is a mere inquest of office to inform the conscience of the court, who, if they please, may themselves assess the damages. . . . Thus, of late years, in certain cases, they have assessed damages which were formerly assessed by a jury on writ of inquiry." The same rule is stated in Bingham on Judgments, p. 3.

On judgment by default in an action of covenant for arrears of an annuity, it was held that the court would grant a rule for a reference to the master to compute the amount. Allwovey v. Hill, 2 Chitty, 32.

And, in an action of covenant on a mortgage, a reference was had to the master to compute what was due for principal and interest. Berthen v. Street, 8 T. R. 326.

And, in an action for rent on a covenant in a lease, it was held that it was proper to refer to a master to compute arrears, without executing a writ of inquiry. Hoard v. Hunt, 3 Jur. 24; Wingfield v. Cleverley, 13 Price, 53.

And, in an action of covenant for nonpayment of rent, a reference was made to the master to compute the amount due. Byrom v. Johnson, 8 T. R. 410.

In an action of covenant on an indenture of demise, where the breaches assigned were for nonpayment of rent and land tax, a rule to compute was denied. Park, J., said: "The only judge in court said he had never heard of a rule to compute in an action for breaches of covenant, and was unwilling to make a precedent for it." Morris v. Thompson, 4 Scott, 295.

In an action for rent where it did not appear whether it was an action of debt or covenant, the court refused to grant a rule to refer on default to the prothonotary, unless it appeared that it was an action on a lease under seal. Affidavit to that effect was produced by the court, and the rule was granted. Campion v. Crawshaw, 6 Taunt. 356.

In an action of assumpsit on a bill of exchange, on default, it was held that there should be a reference to a prothonotary to ascertain the damages and interest, without a writ of inquiry. Andrews v. Blake, 1 H. Bl. 529.

And, in an action on a bill of exchange, on default, a rule was granted to refer the same to the master to calculate principal and interest. Kenyon, Ch. J., said: "In such cases as the present it is extremely convenient to do what was done in the court of common pleas; as the quantum of damages depends on figures, they may be ascertained as well before the master as a jury." Shepherd v. Charter, 4 T. R. 275.

And, in an action on a bill of exchange, it was held that the court could assess the damages on an interlocutory judgment without a jury, where the plaintiff assented. Gould v. Hammersley, 4 Taunt. 148.

And, on a judgment by default on a promissory note, it was held that it should be referred to a prothonotary to ascertain the amount without a writ of inquiry. Longman v. Fenn, 1 H. Bl. 541. The court said "that, as the practice was clear in actions of debt, there seemed to be no good reason why it should not also prevail in those actions of assumpsit where the demand was precisely ascertained. In Bruce v. Rawlins, 3 Wils. 62, on a judgment by default in trespass, Wilmot, Ch. J., had gone so far as to hold that the court might, if they pleased, themselves assess damages. In the present case, if there were any fact which it was necessary for a jury to determine, it ought to have been stated by affidavit. But, as no such fact appeared, as the sum was defined on the face of the note, and as the interest was capable of exact computation by the prothonotary, it was highly reasonable to save the parties the expense of a writ of inquiry."

And, in an action on a note, on default, it was held that a reference to one of the prothonotaries to ascertain the damages and costs, without a writ of inquiry, was proper. Rashleigh v. Salmon, 1 H. Bl. 252.

In Moody v. Pheasant, 2 Bos. & P. 446, Bayley, Serjeant, applied to the court for leave to enter up final judgment upon a bail bond without executing a writ of inquiry, observing that, although the practice had been otherwise, the court of King's bench had of late decided that a writ of inquiry was unnecessary in such cases. The court (consisting of Heath, Rooke, and Chambre, JJ.), being of the same opinion, gave leave to enter up final judgment accordingly.

A final judgment by default in an action of debt, where no writ of inquiry was executed, was held valid, where the record did not show that the debt was of such a nature as to require a writ of inquiry to ascertain its precise amount. Weald v. Brown, 2 Crompt. & J. 672. The court said: "There is no doubt that, in certain cases of actions of debt, some of which are referred to by my brother Holroyd in Brill v. Neele, 1 Chitty, 619, and Arden v. Connell, 5 Barn. & Ald. 885, a writ of inquiry is requisite. If, from the nature of the contract, the amount must of necessity be uncertain, then, in an action of debt, as well as in other actions, there must be a writ of inquiry to reduce it to certainty. An apposite case is an action of debt for not setting out tithe, where the jury must ascertain the single value, before the court can give to the defendant the treble value of the tithes. But this is an exception to the general rule that, in actions of debt, the plaintiff is entitled to consider the amount specified as the real debt, and that there is no reason for a writ of inquiry to inform the conscience of the court."

In Taylor v. Capper, 14 East, 442, it was held that, after default judgment in an action of debt, the court would not direct a writ of inquiry to be executed, but referred it to a master to ascertain what was due, upon the application of defendant after an execution had been executed.

In Whitaker v. Harrold, 12 Jur. 395, it was said: "It may be that, on this supposition, the court of Queen's bench, which may assess damages on a demurrer, or judgment by default, without the intervention of a jury, have awarded too much damages; but, this being a matter in the discretion of the court, it cannot be inquired into on a writ of error."

In Thellusson v. Fletcher, 1 Dougl. K. B. 315, which was an action on a policy of insurance, on default a jury on a writ of inquiry assessed the damages at the sum underwritten, without any proof of the amount or value, or any evidence, except of the defendant's handwriting to the policy. On a rule to show cause why the inquisition should not be set aside, the rule was discharged. Buller, J., said "that writs of inquiry are often sued out in cases where they are not necessary. . . . It does not follow, because a writ of inquiry has been awarded, that the amount of the demand is uncertain. In actions upon a bill of exchange, or a promissory note, nothing but the instrument is to be proved before the jury, the sum being thereby ascertained. Though, even in cases where there is no necessity for a writ of inquiry, that proceeding is of use when the plaintiff goes for interest, which the jury assesses in the name of damages."

In an action of debt on an obligation, it was held that the court was able to tax the damages without a writ of inquiry. Roo v. Apsley, 1 Sid. pt. 1, p. 442.

In an action of debt for use and occupation, where the prothonotary would only permit interlocutory judgment to be signel, on an application for mandamus it was held that it was not clear that in actions of debt a writ of inquiry was not necessary, and a mandamus was refused. Arden v. Connell, supra.

And, in an action of debt on a judgment which has been obtained on a bill of exchange, a default was rendered. It was held that a reference to the master to ascertain the damages should be refused, as it should be left to a jury to consider whether any and what damages should be given. Nelson v. Sheridan, 8 T. R. 395. In this case Lawrence, J., distinguishing cases cited, said: "In some of the cases cited interest was to be given by the very terms of the contract between the parties."

And, in an action of assumpsit on a foreign judgment, on a rule being taken to show cause why it should not be referred to the master without executing a writ of inquiry, it was held that the rule should be discharged, as this was an attempt to carry the rule further than has yet been done, and the defendant may go into the consideration of a foreign judgment. Messin v. Massareene, 4 T. R. 493.

And, in a default on a bill of exchange for £200, Irish money, the plaintiff moved for a rule to refer it to the master to ascertain the amount; but the rule was discharged on the ground that the same reason applied as in the case of Messin v. Massareene, supra; Maunsell v. Massareene, 5 T. R. 87.

In an action of debt for use and occupation, on default the prothonotary refused to allow plaintiff's attorney to sign final judgment, but suggested signing interlocutory judgment. On mandamus proceedings it was held that the judgment in an action of debt was final in the first instance, and the plaintiff ought to have proposed to sue out a writ of inquiry. R. v. Conyngham, 1 Dowl. & R. 529.

In Holdipp v. Otway, 2 Wms' Saund. 106, in an action of debt on a bill obligatory, on default it was held that the course of King's bench was to tax the damages for the detention of the debt as well as the cost, if the plaintiff will assent; but, if he will not, he will be entitled to a writ of inquiry for the damages; but this was at the election of the plaintiff.

In Brill v. Neele, 1 Chitty, 619, where it was held that there was a misjoinder, the court said: "There are several cases of actions of debt in which a writ of inquiry would be requisite where there is judgment by default, as in debt for foreign money. Then there must be a writ of inquiry to ascertain the value of the money in English money. Many other instances may be put in which, though by letting judgment go by default the defendant may admit a contract in substance, as stated, yet he does not necessarily admit that the exact sum of money is due."

In Bruce v. Rawlins, 3 Wils. 61, which was an action of trespass against revenue officers, on a motion to set aside an inquisition as excessive, Wilmot, Ch. J., said: "This is an inquest of office to inform the conscience of the court, who, if they please, may themselves assess the damages; but I am of opinion we ought not to interpose in this case, which differs widely from the case of stopping the wagon" (referring to a case where a wagon was stopped and searched, and the award of £100 was set aside).

In an action of debt on a judgment of seventeen years' standing the plaintiff sued out a writ of inquiry on default. On application made, it was held that, if the plaintiff would not consent to refer to the prothonotary, it was at his election, and, having sued out a writ of inquiry, he had made his election; and the court refused to stay the same. Blackmore v. Flemming, 7 T. R. 446.

III. Summary.

The common-law rule that, in actions for a liquidated sum resting in computation, a jury is not required, is substantially the rule in Louisiana, Nebraska, New Jersey, New York, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, West Virginia, Maryland (and on verified accounts), Mississippi (and on open accounts filed), and North Carolina (and on a verified claim).

A jury is not necessary in California in actions on contracts; nor in Minnesota, Washington, and Wisconsin in actions on contracts for the payment of money only; nor in Illinois on such contracts in writing; nor in Pennsylvania in actions on contracts where no affidavit of defense is made; nor in Florida in actions on open accounts or contracts for money; nor in Nevada or Oregon in actions for money or damages only.

In some states where the amount is shown by a contract in writing a jury is not necessary, as in Alabama, Arkansas, Colorado, Georgia, since the Constitution of 1877, Tennessee, when the amount may be ascertained from the papers, and in Missouri in actions on notes payable in money. The converse of the above is generally true,—that in other cases a jury is necessary. This is subject to the exceptions given below.

Where the amount is not liquidated as described above, the question as to the necessity for a jury seems to rest in the discretion of the court in some states under the statute, as in California, Colorado (a late act), Nevada, New Hampshire, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Washington, and Wisconsin.

But in other states it seems that the right to a jury is optional with either party who may demand the same, as in Illinois, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Ohio, Missouri, except in actions on notes, and in Vermont, in actions for uncertain damages. In Kentucky a jury may be waived by the parties in actions on contracts, and with the assent of the court in other cases.

In some states it seems to be optional with the plaintiff, as in Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, and Nebraska.

In New York the Code provides that a jury is necessary in actions for injuries to persons and property.

In Connecticut the right to a jury is not recognized on default; but the statute of 1899 gives a right to a jury in actions for torts.

The rendition of a default judgment without a jury is held not to invade any constitutional right, in Connecticut, Illinois, Iowa, New Mexico, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Wisconsin, and Georgia. In the last state the Constitution gives the right to the court in cases of unconditional contracts in writing; but in Texas and West Virginia, the right to a trial by jury, when demanded, is recognized as a constitutional right. MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

FRANKLIN H. HAZELTON

v.

SPERRY H. LOCKE.

(— Me. —, 71 Atl. 661.)

Trover — money.

1. Trover will lie to recover money so long as it is capable of being identified.

Assumpsit — agent.

2. A state manager of an insurance company may maintain an action to recover from an agent, whom he has appointed to canvass for applications and collect premiums and pay them over to himself or the company, money so collected in payment of a premium.

Trover — collections.

3. Trover will not lie by a state manager of an insurance company, who has appointed an agent to secure applications and collect premiums, to recover a premium which the agent has collected, and which he refuses to pay over, where the contract does not require him to keep the money collected intact, and he is entitled to commissions on premiums collected and paid over.

Case Note. — Right of principal to maintain trover or case for money collected by agent or attorney.

This note is limited strictly to those cases dealing with the right of a principal to maintain trover or case for money collected by an agent, and does not purport to include those cases where any other kind of property was misappropriated, or even those cases where money came into the hands of the agent by means other than collection for his principal.

Mr. Llewellyn F. Hobbs for defendant.

Peabody, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of trover for the conversion of $51.13 in the money of the United States. The writ was dated July 8, 1905.

In accordance with the holding of HAZELTON v. LOCKE, it seems to be the general rule that an action for conversion cannot be maintained against an agent who receives money for his principal in a fiduciary capacity, unless he is bound to turn over the identical money. Walter v. Bennett, 16 N. Y. 250; Wright v. Duffie, 23 Misc. 338. 51 N. Y. Supp. 255; Rothchild v. Schwarz, 28 Misc. 521, 59 N. Y. Supp. 527; Herrmann Furniture & Plumbers' Cabinet Works v. Hyman, 28 Misc. 567, 59 N. Y. Supp. 526; Vandelle v. Rohan, 36 Misc. 239, 73 N. Y. Supp. 285.

This was also recognized in Greentree v. Rosenstock, 61 N. Y. 583, and Hartman v. Hlicks, 28 Misc. 527, 59 N. Y. Supp. 529.

In Royce v. Oakes, 20 R. I. 418, 39 L.R.A. 845, 39 Atl. 758, it was held that the failure of a servant or agent to pay over on demand money which he has collected for his principal will not sustain an action of trespass on the case, but the only remedy is by assumpsit or debt.

In Tinkham v. Heyworth, 31 Ill. 519, it was held that an action on the case will not lie against a banker for failing to pay over money collected by him in that capacity for another. In distinguishing such actions against bankers from an action against attorneys, the court said: "Were this action against an attorney, for not paying over money collected, we should not hesitate to hold that case would lie. We think it is different in the case of a bank. Different duties and different rights arise in the two cases. The bank receives no fee for its services, but only the use of the money until it shall be called for by the creditor; while the attorney is entitled to a direct reward, and has no right to use the money at all, but must pay it over to his client immediately without demand. Money thus collected never becomes the attorney's money; he has no right to make himself the debtor of the client by crediting him with the amount, while the bank may place the money in its vaults as its own, and credit the customer with the amount, and thereby become the debtor of the customer, the same as in case of an ordinary depositor; and this, whether the customer keeps an ordinary account with the bank or not."

In Jackson v. Moore, 72 App. Div. 217, 76 N. Y. Supp. 164, it was held that an attorney who collects money for a client, and deposits the same to his own credit, and fails to pay it over on demand, is not liable to trover as for a conversion of such money, the court saying: "When an attorney collects a debt due to his client, he does not convert the money received by placing it in bank to his own credit and mixing it with his own funds. The money so received is not the client's property, and the attorney's obligation regarding the same is one resting on contract, merely, to account for it and pay over such sum as, upon an accounting, shall be found to be due from him thereon. And even if he neglects to so account and pay after a demand made, he is not liable to trover as for a conversion of such amount."

After a new trial the question came again before the court, and, in 94 App. Div. 504, 87 N. Y. Supp. 1101, it was said: "There was a difference of opinion in this court on the former appeal as to whether the plaintiff, in any event, could recover of the defendant in an action for conversion. Since the decision on the last appeal, the court of appeals, in Britton v. Ferrin, 171 N. Y. 235, 63 N. E. 954, have held that, after a demand and refusal to pay, an action for conversion will lie against a person who has received money in a fiduciary capacity." The Britton Case involved the question whether a factor can defeat a recovery in an action of tort by his principal of the proceeds of a sale which he, the factor, on demand, refused to pay over, by purchasing the claim of a third person against the principal, and interposing it as a counterclaim; the court taking occasion to say: "Whatever may have been the rule as to the liability of factors upon their refusal to surrender to their principal the avails of property consigned to them for sale an-

The defendant's plea was the general issue, and a brief statement setting out his discharge in bankruptcy under the bankruptcy act of 1898, and that the claim, demand, debt, or action declared on was provable against his estate, from which he is discharged, not being excepted by said act.

The case was tried before the justice of the superior court for Cumberland county without the intervention of a jury.

At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, upon motion of the defendant's attorney, the presiding justice ordered a nonsuit, to which ruling and action the plaintiff excepts, and the case is before this court upon the exceptions.

The following is a summary of the facts upon which the nonsuit was ordered:

terior to the amendment of § 549 in 1886, we think that amendment plainly evinces an intent by the legislature to place an action to recover money received by a factor, agent, broker, or other person in a fiduciary capacity within the category of torts, and to secure to a principal the same rights and remedies that exist as to other wrongs of a similar character. In such an action, under the provisions of that section, the important and controlling issue is as to the tort or wrongdoing of the defendant. If it is established, then the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment in tort, and the added remedy of an execution against the person of the defendant is given. If the tort be not proved, then the plaintiff cannot recover in such an action, but it is not a bar to an action on contract to recover the money due thereon. Thus it seems clear that the legislature regarded an action brought to recover money received by an agent or factor in a fiduciary capacity, which he refuses to deliver to his principal, to whom it belongs, as one of tort, and to secure to a plaintiff the same remedies as in actions for fraud, conversion, or other similar misconduct."

However, in Cotton v. Sharpstein, 14 Wis. 226, 80 Am. Dec. 774, where an attorney at law was guilty of appropriating to his own use money collected by him for his client, it was held that it is the duty of an agent to keep money collected by him, for the principal, to whom it belongs; and if, in the absence of any authority, express or implied, to treat it as his own, and himself as a mere debtor, he wrongfully converts it to his own use, he is liable to an action of trover, and to all the legal consequences of such an action. The court in this case recognized the difficulty of applying the rule in case the money was mingled with other money, and said that where, by the course of dealing between the parties, the agent had been accustomed to treat the money collected as his own, and to consider himself the absolute debtor of the principal for the amount, which practice had been recognized by the principal, an authority for that purpose might be fairly implied, which would 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract dated February 2, 1904, for transacting the business of canvassing for applications for life insurance in the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States, of which the plaintiff was manager for the state of Maine, upon certain specific terms and conditions, among which that the defendant was to receive commissions on the premiums under various forms of policies, which were to accrue only as the premiums were paid to the plaintiff or the society in cash.

On January 10, 1905, the defendant received of George C. Fuller $51.13 in currency, consisting of bills and silver, which was for the premium on a policy of insurance issued on the life of his wife by the protect the agent from liability for converting the money of his principal to his own use. The court took occasion to say further: "But, in the absence of any such, I am unable to discover any reasoning which should shield an agent from liability in trover for converting the money of his principal to his own use. For if right in saying that when the money he has received is in a distinct parcel, and is demanded by the owner, and he refuses to deliver, he would be liable in trover, could he, by mingling the money with his own, without any authority, and then refusing to pay it over, place himself in any better position? It would seem difficult to support such a proposition by any satisfactory reasoning. In cases where the agent so mingles the money of his principal with his own, yet, on demand, pays the amount due to his principal, the question whether he had technically converted any part of the identical money he had received would be of no practical importance, inasmuch as the principal would get the amount belonging to him. But when he so mingles them without authority, and then refuses to pay, I am unable to see why such refusal should not be just as much evidence of a conversion as though the money were still in a separate parcel. The only difficulty growing out of the nature of money is, as some of the cases have said, a difficulty of fact, and not of law. In law, the rights of the parties in respect to the money are the same as in respect to any other property. The only difference is, that the identity of money is more easily destroyed than that of other property, and where the agent has so destroyed it, it can no longer be specially recovered; not because the right no longer exists, but because of the difficulty in fact. But this difficulty does not exist in respect to the question of the liability of the agent for the conversion. So far as that is concerned, there is no more difficulty in showing its conversion than in showing the conversion of any other property. And that being so, it would follow that the agent should be held liable for converting it, up-

Equitable Life Assurance Society on the 1st day of April, 1905. The attorney for the plaintiff called on the defendant and asked him for this sum of $51.13, also on two other occasions prior to the commencement of the action, and he declined and refused to deliver the same.

As we view the case, it is not necessary to consider the specific defense presented by the brief statement. The general issue raises the following questions:

1. The nature of the property as a proper subject of this form of action, and the sufficiency of its description. As specified in the writ, the property was money in the currency of the United States, and the evidence is that it consisted of bills and silver amounting to $51.13. Legal currency may be the subject of an action of trover. There is nothing in the nature of money making it an improper subject of this form of action so long as it is capable of being identified, as when delivered at one time, by one act, and in one mass (Burn v. Morris, 4 Tyrw. 485; Royce v. Oakes, 20 R. I. 252, 38 Atl. 371; Walter v. Bennett, 10 N. Y. 250; Farrelly v. Hubbard, 148 N. Y. 592, 43 N. E. 65; Conaughty v. Nichols, 42 N. Y. 83; Vandelle v. Rohan, 30 Misc. 239, 73 N. Y. Supp. 285; Reeside v. Reeside, 49 Pa. 322, 88 Am. Dec. 503; Ringo v. Field, 6 Ark. 43; Wood v. Blaney, 107 Cal. 291, 40 Pac. 428; Michigan Carbon Works v. Schad, 17 N. Y. S. R. 505, 1 N. Y. Supp. 490; Wallace v. Castle, 14 Hun, 106; Duguid v. Edwards, 50 Barb. 288; Grand Trunk R. R. Co. v. Edwards, 56 Barb. 408; Graves v. Dudley, 20 N. Y. 76), or when the deposit is special, and the identical money is to be kept for the party making the deposit, or when wrongful possession of such property is obtained (Murphey v. Virgin, 47 Neb. 602, 66 N. W. 632; Donohue v. Henry, 4 E. D. Smith, 162; Coffin v. Anderson, 4 Blackf. 395). In Moody v. Keener, 7 Port. (Ala.) 218, it was held that in actions of tort only the same certainty is required as in indictments; that it was not necessary to set out the money verbatim, that the description in a general manner is sufficient, and is in accordance with the decisions of this state. Stinchfield v. Twaddle, 81 Me. 273, 17 Atl. 66; Eastern Mfg. Co. v. Camden Lumber Co. 96 Me. 537, 53 Atl. 40.

2. The title of the plaintiff. It is contended that the evidence shows that the money belonged to the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States. It appears from the evidence that the plaintiff was the manager of this society in the state of Maine, and that the money in question was a premium due to it on one of its life insurance policies. By the contract the defendant was appointed by the plaintiff to canvass for applications, and to collect the premiums on all policies obtained by him, and to pay over forthwith to the plaintiff or to the assurance society. As between the

on the same principal that he would be for converting any other."

The right to maintain an action of trover against an attorney for money collected by him was also recognized in Pratt v. Brewster, 52 Conn. 65.

Where an agent's contract of employment requires him to turn over to his principal the identical money collected in the course of his employment, trover may be maintained by the principal against him for the conversion of the moneys collected. So holds Salem Traction Co. v. Anson, 41 Or. 502, 67 Pac. 1015, 69 Pac. 675.

In Farrelly v. Hubbard, 148 N. Y. 592, 43 N. E. 65, it was held that one who, in a written assignment of wages, covenants that, if he collects them, he will receive the same "solely as the servant of," and will deliver them to the assignee, is guilty of conversion and liable to imprisonment under the terms of a statute if he does collect the wages, and, upon demand, fails to pay over to the assignee.

So, where money is collected by an agent without the authority of the principal, the latter has a right to insist upon receiving the identical money, and trover will lie for its recovery. Donohue v. Henry, 4 E. D. Smith, 162. The court said: "It is objected that trover will not lie for this item of money. This is true where the money has gone into the defendant's possession with the plaintiff's assent, and permitted to be mixed up with his own money. But, where money is received from a third person, the party to whom the money belonged has a right to insist upon receiving the identical money so collected; and, if not delivered on request, may maintain a possessory action therefor."

In Schanz v. Martin, 37 Misc. 492, 75 N. Y. Supp. 997, it was held that where an agent, without authority from his employers, collected the price of goods sold, he is liable to the latter in an action for conversion. It appeared in this case that the employers first sought to hold the customer liable, and only sought to hold the agent liable upon ascertaining that the latter had received the money. The court took occasion to say: "There might be ground for argument that the plaintiffs' right to the money accrued only when they made their election and demand, and that, if the defendant did not still have it at that time, he could not be said to have converted the money of the plaintiffs, but that of the customer, who alone was entitled to it up to the time the plaintiffs elected to ratify the defendant's act in collecting." This suggestion, however, was finally dismissed on the ground that it rested upon the agent to show that he did not still have the money when it was demanded of him.

parties, the plaintiff, having a special property in the premiums collected, was entitled to receive them. This right gave him a remedy against the defendant upon his refusal to pay over the same as directed. McKenzie v. Nevius, 22 Me. 138, 38 Am. Dec. 291.

3. In determining from the circumstances and relation of the parties whether trover or assumpsit is the proper remedy, it is necessary to consider the distinctive quality of money as differing from other kinds of property, and the character and conduct of the defendant in receiving and retaining the money in question. From its nature the title thereto passes by delivery, and its identity is lost by being changed into other money or its equivalent in the methods ordinarily used in business for its safe-keeping and transmission. An agent, unless restricted by the terms of his contract, would violate no duty assumed by him by adopting these methods in dealing with the money of his principal. Mere failure to deliver such property in specie on demand would not be technical conversion, nor would the refusal to pay over its equivalent be conclusive evidence of conversion in the sense of the law of trover, but might be the ground for an action of assumpsit. Orton v. Butler, 5 Barn. & Ald. 652; Hennequin v. Clews, 111 U. S. 676, 28 L. ed. 565, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576; 30 Stat. at L. 550, 551, chap. 541, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. 578-581 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3428).

The defendant was the agent of the plaintiff for the collection and paying over not of a single premium of insurance, but such as were payable for all policies effected by him in his business of canvassing; and he was entitled to receive as commission a certain percentage of these premiums when paid over. An action of trover by the principal might, under these circumstances, be unjust to the agent by depriving him of his right of set-off and other legal defenses. Orton v. Butler, supra.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

ELI C. BEERS

v.

ISAAC PROUTY & COMPANY.

(200 Mass. 19, 85 N. E. 864.)

Master — incompetent servant — ignorance of language.

1. One sent to help operate a complicated machine may be found incompetent, so as to render the master liable for injury to his superior through his act, where he could not understand the language of his superior, and the operation of the machine required two men and the frequent stopping, cleaning, and starting of it, in the accomplishment of which directions to him from the superior were necessary.

Negligence — cause of accident.

2. The inability of a helper on a complicated machine to understand the language of his superior may be found to be the cause of the latter's loss of fingers, cut off by the machinery, where they were caught in such a way as to be fastened, but not injured, and the superior directed the helper, whose duty it was to do so, to put the power off from the machine, but the latter, not knowing the situation, and not understanding the directions, started the machine, cutting off the fingers.

Case Note. — Liability of master as affected by inability of fellow servant to understand English.

In Date v. New York Glucose Co. 114 App. Div. 789, 100 N. Y. Supp. 171, affirmed in 190 N. Y. 510, 83 N. E. 1124, it appeared that plaintiff was oiling some shafting at the top of a ladder, the foot of which was on a tramway, over which a car was pushed by fellow servants, knocking down the ladder. The court said: "The only negligence claimed against the defendant is that the three men were not competent or fit servants for the work, for the reason that they were foreigners, unable to understand any English. Even so, it was not negligence or breach of duty to the plaintiff for the defendant to employ them to do such simple work as pushing a car. They could see and hear, and I do not see how it could occur to anyone that the fact that they could not understand English would make it dangerous to others for them to push the car along the track through the rooms. If they had understood all languages, they could have neglected, just as they did, to look ahead along each side of their loaded car, assuming they could not see the plaintiff or his ladder by looking over the load, which it does not seem could have been the case. The fact that they did not know the meaning of the words 'stop,' 'look out,' and 'ladder,' which were called to them, and therefore did not heed them and stop, may or may not have caused the accident. But the defendant could not have anticipated such an accident from such a cause, and that is the test of its negligence or breach of duty in putting them at such work."

In B. Lantry Sons v. Lowrie (Tex. Civ. App.) 58 S. W. 837, it was held that where the negligence specifically relied upon by plaintiff in his declaration was that his master had put him to work with a Mexican who could not understand the English language, and that, for this reason, he was incompetent to engage in work with plaintiff as a collaborer, it was error to so charge EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Worcester County, made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible, which resulted in a verdict in defendant's favor. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Marvin M. Taylor, for plaintiff:

Incompetency of a fellow servant may consist in physical or mental defects; and the inability to understand a strange language, as it may not indicate the slightest mental weakness or defect, must be classed as a physical defect.

the jury as to permit plaintiff to recover in the event that the Mexican was not a competent and suitable person to do the work about which he was then engaged with the plaintiff, since the charge was too broad, and went beyond the pleadings, and submitted issues of negligence not relied upon.

Where the case made by the averments of plaintiff's petition is that his injury was due to his coservant's inability to understand the English language, the fellow-servant doctrine has no application. Ibid.

If the plaintiff knew that his fellow servant could not understand the English language, he assumed the risks resulting from engaging in the same work with him, in so far as the injuries resulted from such inability to understand English. Ibid.

Mass. 170, 45 N. E. 83; McPhee v. Scully, supra.

Messrs. Parker & Milton, Charles C. Milton, and Daniel F. Gay for defendant.

Rugg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was at work, as an employee of the defendant, upon a somewhat complicated machine for the manufacture of paper or pasteboard boxes. In its ordinary and economical operation the labor of two men was required. A common occurrence was for the paper or pasteboard to clog in process of manufacture, rendering it necessary to stop the machine and clean off the paper and paste which had stuck to it. The work of the plaintiff was "feeder," and he was the superior of the two men, and in authority in running the machine. The other person working upon the machine was called "catcher." It was the ordinary course of employment for both men to work in cleaning when necessary. The plaintiff had been at work upon the machine for several weeks. About half an hour before the accident occurred, one St. Hilliare was for the first time sent by the boss of the defendant to work upon the machine as catcher. The plaintiff knew St. Hilliare only casually, and was not aware of the fact that he could not speak or understand the English language. After they had thus been at work together less than an hour, the machine, having become clogged with the pasteboard and paste, was stopped by St. Hilliare, and both men began cleaning. Then St. Hilliare started the machine a bit, whereby the plaintiff's fingers were caught just hard enough so that they could not be pulled out, although "it was not exactly painful as they were held there." Thereafter the plaintiff, in English, which was the only language he knew, directed St. Hilliare to put off the power. Instead of following this direction, St. Hilliare

In the absence of actual knowledge, plaintiff will not be put upon inquiry to ascertain if his Mexican coservant can understand the English language, but he may assume that the master has exercised reasonable discretion in selecting the servant with whom he must labor. Ibid.

Where plaintiff, to show incompetency of his fellow servant, confined his evidence to facts establishing inability to understand the English language, and defendant's evidence tended to show that such servant could understand the language, it was for the jury to say whether or not he understood orders given in English, or whether his failure or refusal to obey the orders was caused by his wilfulness and carelessness. Ibid.

started the power up, and the plaintiff's fingers were cut off. It might have been inferred that it was necessary, in the natural and proper operation of the machine, for the two men at work upon it to communicate with each other through the medium of speech. The question raised is whether, under these circumstances, the defendant might have been found to have furnished an incompetent fellow servant from the fact that it put a man at work on the machine who could not speak the English language, or the language of the man in charge of the machine. The charge of the trial judge must have left the clear impression upon the minds of the jury that mere inability to speak the English language on the part of St. Hilliare could not be found to be sufficient evidence of incompetency.

The duty of the employer is to exercise ordinary prudence in the selection of his servants, in order to ascertain that they are competent to perform the work to which they are to be assigned. If he employs an incompetent servant, having reason to know or opportunity to discover his want of capacity, then he is liable to any other employee, himself in the exercise of due care, who receives injury as a proximate result of some act of the incompetent servant, growing out of his want of capacity. The employee has a right to rely upon the assumption that, in this respect, the master will perform his duty, and that the fellow servants employed to work with him will not be lacking in the possession of those usual attributes which would make them ordinarily safe coworkers. He may with propriety act on the theory that he will, in the performance of his own duties, be free from danger of want of capacity in his fellow laborers to perform their duties. What constitutes incompetency of an employee varies with the nature of the duties he is called upon to perform, and their relation to other human beings. Where mere manual labor is required, and there is no occasion for the exercise of discretion, and no expectation of co-operation with other laborers, it may be that servants of diverse tongues may, with propriety, be put to work in the same company. Color blindness or extraordinary nearsightedness might render one incompetent to act as a locomotive engineer, while these same deficiencies might not impair the usefulness of a watchmaker. Deafness might make one useless as a telegraph operator or on a telephone exchange, but be no serious difficulty in a boiler maker. Ignorance respecting the duties one is called upon to perform would generally be incapacity.

of mechanical processes or linguistic acquirements, provided the knowledge of the subject-matter is essential in the performance of the required duty. Ignorance of the English language in an experimental chemist working by himself for a steel manufacturer might not render him incompetent, but it could not be contended that one unfamiliar with that language would be a suitable teacher for the public schools. The plaintiff was a superior artisan, and had been at work upon the machine which caused his injury, for a considerable period of time. He had a right to assume that the defendant would not send an incompetent workman to assist him. From the photograph used in argument and the description given by witness, it is apparent that the box machine upon which these two men were at work was of considerable size, complicated in its design, and intricate in its mechanism. In its ordinary use, frequent stopping, cleaning, and starting were necessary, and co-operation between the workmen was required. There was evidence sufficient to justify a conclusion by the jury that it was necessary for the plaintiff to give directions by word of mouth from time to time to the catcher. Under these circumstances the jury should have been permitted to find that the placing a man upon this machine, who was unable, by reason of ignorance of the English language, to understand and act upon directions received from the plaintiff, was, in and of itself, sufficient evidence of the employment of an incompetent servant. It was as if a man absolutely deaf had been sent. This want of knowledge, resulting in an inability to obey orders, was as much incompetency as nervousness or lack of judgment on the part of a stationary engineer (Olsen v. Andrews, 168 Mass. 261, 47 N. E. 90), or weakness, infirmity, and excitability in an elevator man (Ledwidge v. Hathaway, 170 Mass. 348, 49 N. E. 656).

Nor can it be said that the plaintiff was not injured by this error. It is not open to argument that the defendant did not, or might not, in the exercise of reasonable care, know of the inability of St. Hilliare to speak the English language, and that English was the vernacular of the plaintiff. The very act of hiring must have furnished this information. There was also ground for the view that the plaintiff's injury resulted directly from the inability of St. Hilliare to understand his orders. St. Hilliare was the one whose position for work at the machine made him naturally the one to put the power on and off. His posture was not such as to give him necessarily the knowledge that the plaintiff's fingers were caught, and he testified that he did not know they were caught until he saw they were cut off. That he threw the power on instead of off may have been found to be the direct result of his inability to understand the direction given him in English by the plaintiff.

Statement by Davis, J.:

Mirick, who is a nonresident owner of land situate in Scioto county, and who alleges that he has continuously resided in Washington, District of Columbia, ever since he acquired title to such land, brought suit in the court of common pleas of Scioto county to enjoin the collection of a tax assessed against his real estate for three dogs charged against him upon the tax duplicate. He averred that he was not the owner of any dogs in Scioto county, did not harbor any dogs on his said real estate, did not permit or suffer anyone else to do so, and did not know of any dogs being kept on said premises until his tax bill was presented, and denied that any dogs were kept on his premises. He averred that, when said tax was assessed upon his real estate, the said premises were in possession and under the control of one McCall, his lessee, and that he did not make or change the lease of said land since the passage of the statute under which said tax was assessed. A demurrer to the petition was overruled, and, after an answer by defendant, alleging that the tax was levied upon a certain three dogs kept and harbored on the estate, a trial was had in the court of common pleas, and that court owner to be heard upon an application for a remission of such tax, is within the legislative power of a state, and does not deprive one of his property without due process of law. Hodge v. Muscatine County, 196 U. S. 270, 49 L. ed. 477, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 237, affirming 121 Iowa, 482, 67 L.R.A. 624, 104 Am. St. Rep. 304, 96 N. W. 968. The court said: "It is difficult to see why a tax upon the business carried on upon such property may not be made a lien as well as a claim against the owner. The owner is not only chargeable with a knowledge of the law in respect thereto, but he is presumed to know the business there carried on, and to have let the property with knowledge that it might become encumbered by a tax imposed upon such business."

And the property owner is not entitled to relief because he had no knowledge that his property was being used for the sale dismissed the plaintiff's petition, and rendered judgment against him for costs. This judgment was subsequently affirmed by the circuit court. The Sunday Creek Company, which is a corporation engaged in the business of mining, shipping, and selling coal, filed its petition in the court of common pleas of Athens county to restrain the collection of a tax for dogs assessed upon its lands and amounting to $336. It alleged that such tax was assessed under and by virtue of § 2833, Ohio Rev. Stat.; that it is the owner of about 300 dwellings on its premises, which are rented to miners and others in its employ and with express notice and orders that no dogs shall be kept or harbored thereon, or on the close adjacent thereto, or elsewhere on plaintiff's premises; and that, if any dogs have been kept or harbored on said premises by any of its tenants, the same has been done without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, and against its orders and protest. It alleged that it was not the owner of any dogs listed for taxation, nor that it had ever had any interest in any of them. A demurrer to the petition was sustained and, the plaintiff not electing to plead further, the petition was dismissed at plaintiff's costs. On appeal to the circuit court the demurrer was sustained, and the same judgment rendered.

These cases are alike in the particular that in both the landowner claims to have had no knowledge of the fact that dogs were kept or harbored on his premises; and they challenge the validity of the statute which charges the tax upon the land notwithstanding the owner may not have had such knowledge. They differ somewhat in the claim that in the one case the real estate was

But it was held in Gudger v. Bates, 52 Ga. 287, that a lien could not be obtained for a distiller's tax upon the land where the business was carried on, as provided by the act of Congress of 1867, where the landowner had no knowledge of such use of his land, and such act required that such lien should be created only with his consent.

So, a statute making a street or other railway company which leases or sells the right to display advertising matter in its cars or stations liable for the payment of a privilege tax imposed upon those to whom such right has been granted, deprives the railway company of its property without due process of law. leased before the enactment of the present statute, and that the land has never since been within the possession or control of the owner, and that, in the other case, if dogs were kept and harbored on the land, it was done contrary to the express orders of the owner. It may be, and is, conceded, at least for the purposes of this case, that a tax on dogs, having for its object the protection of the sheep industry, is within the legitimate exercise of the police power. Holst v. Roe, 39 Ohio St. 340, 48 Am. Rep. 459. The question which is raised in these cases is a narrower one. Here it is not whether dogs may be taxed for such a purpose, but whether the tax may be made a charge on the land where the dogs are kept, when they are kept there without the knowledge or consent of the landowner.

There is no express limitation in the Constitution of this state upon that branch of legislative power which is commonly called "police power." Such limitations as are recognized arise by construction from the nature of the power itself, and from the Declaration of Rights contained in article 1, as well as the limitation contained in § 28 of article 2; and in considering these the 1st clause of § 20, art. 1, must not be overlooked, viz.: "This enumeration of rights shall not be construed to impair or deny others retained by the people." The police power is an attribute of sovereignty, and has its origin, purpose, and scope in the general welfare, or, as it is often expressed, the public safety, public health, and public morals. These terms indicate its field, yet its boundaries are necessarily vague and indefinite. The broad discretion thus vested in the state is fraught with dangers to the personal and property rights of private persons; and therefore the courts have always asserted the right to restrain the exercise of the power to the extent that private rights may not be arbitrarily or unreasonably infringed. Such cases are within the rights reserved by the Bill of Rights, and are therefore the unconstitutional, or rather extra-constitutional, exercise of police power, and void.

Section 2833, Rev. Stat., was amended into its present form and took effect from April 4, 1906 (98 Ohio Laws, p. 87). Here for the first time appears in our statutes a provision that a "per capita tax on dogs" shall be collected, not from the owner or the keeper and harbored of the dogs, but from the owner of the land on which they are kept or harbored. The statute provides: "Which per capita tax shall be levied upon and entered against the real estate upon which said dog is kept or harbored and collected as are other taxes upon real estate." etc. There does not appear to be any way of avoiding, by construction, the conclusion that by this enactment the landowner, and the landowner alone, must bear the penalty, although he may not be the owner, or keeper or harbored of the dogs and may be ignorant of their existence, and even though he may have done all in his power to prevent the occurrence of such an offense; yet the real offender is subjected to no penalty at all, unless the payment of a trifling property tax, measured by the value of the dogs, is a penalty. Thus, the property of an innocent person may be taken without notice and without due process of law to recompense an injury to another, committed by a third person who holds no relation to the landowner except that of tenant under a lease. While we recognize and approve the doctrine that every man holds his property subject to the condition that he must so use it as not to injure others, we are not persuaded to accept the view that the general welfare, or even the protection, of a favored class of industries, justifies such drastic legislation as this appears to be. To us it seems to be inequitable, arbitrary, and unreasonable, unnecessarily infringing upon the natural and inalienable rights of citizens, and therefore void.

The Case of Mirick might be disposed of on another ground. His land at and before the passage of this act was under lease and in the control of tenants, and has been so ever since. If there were no other sufficient objection to the statute, it could not apply to Mirick's Case without a violation of § 28, art. 2, Const.

The judgments of the Circuit Courts and those of the Courts of Common Pleas are reversed.

Price, Ch. J., and Shauck, Crew, Summers, and Spear, JJ., concur. Summers, J., does not concur in the judgment in the Sunday Creek Case.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Athens County to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas which sustained a demurrer to the answer in an action brought by complainant as administrator to recover upon a paving contract of his testator. Affirmed.

Statement by Spear, J.:

The controversy between the parties in the courts below was determined upon a demurrer filed by the plaintiff in error, administrator, to the answer of the defendant in error George H. Harper, and like demurrer to the answer of defendants in error Rumer & Blyth. Those demurrers were sustained by the common pleas, and judgment entered against the answering defendants, and that judgment was reversed by the circuit court. This court is asked to reverse this latter judgment and affirm that of the common pleas. The pleadings present this question: Can a materialman (a subcontractor) who, under a contract with the principal contractor, has furnished material for the completion of the principal contractor's contract for the paving of a village street, obtain a lien on the fund which has accrued by virtue of the contract between the village and the principal contractor, the latter having died during the progress of the work, Case Note.—Effect of death of principal contractor on rights of subcontractor or materialman to a lien, or to payment by owner.

Mechanics' liens were unknown at common law, and consequently it has sometimes been held that statutes giving such liens are to be strictly construed. On the other hand, it has frequently been said that the statutes are highly remedial, and are to be construed liberally in favor of those for whose benefit they were enacted. Some of this conflict is undoubtedly due to differences existing in the various lien laws; but it is pointed out in Cary Hardware Co. v. McCarty, 10 Colo. App. 200, 50 Pac. 744, that this apparent antagonism between the cases is more apparent than real; the statute both creates a right and gives a remedy, and to lay the foundation for this relief there must be a substantial compliance with the material requirements of the statute, but the law will be liberally construed so far as the enforcement thereof is concerned.

It would appear that, in this view, the decision in VERNON v. HARPER is correct. The subcontractor was unable to serve a copy of his notice of claim upon the original contractor because he was dead, but a copy was served upon his administrator, who completed the contract. This certainly was a substantial compliance with the statute. To hold otherwise would deprive the subcontractor of the lien which the legislature clearly intended to grant him.

The question does not seem to have arisen before, under exactly the same statutory provisions. There are several other cases, however, which involve the right of a subcontractor or materialman to a lien after the death of the principal contractor; and in each of these it was held that the death of the principal contractor would not affect the right of a subcontractor or materialman to a lien.

Thus, in Telfer v. Kiersted, 9 Abb. Pr. 418, the principal contractor died after he had completed his contract, but before the plaintiff's lien was filed; the defendants insisted that the lien law was a special statute, to be strictly construed, that it contemplated the existence of the contracting parties, and that the death of the contractor in effect repealed or abrogated the statute and deprived the laborer or materialman of his lien. The court said: "The answer to this argument is that the primary object of the legislature was to create in favor of the laborer and materialman a lien upon the fund in the owner's hands, due to the contractor; and, as to that fund, to give him priority over every general creditor of the contractor, imposing only as a condition that, within the time prescribed therefor, he should file and serve the notice required by the statute. That condition has been performed, and the plaintiff's right thereupon became absolute. The contractor having finished the building, there was a balance due to him which was subject to the plaintiff's inchoate right, and that right could be defeated only by the payment to the contractor of the balance prior to notice of the lien."

And in Watrous v. Wilson, 55 How. Pr. 461, the court, after citing with approval Telfer v. Kiersted, supra, held that the death of a contractor did not deprive a materialman of the right thereafter to file a notice of claim and acquire a lien for materials furnished at the request of the contractor.

So, too, in Bambrick v. Webster Groves Presby. Church Asso. 53 Mo. App. 225, it was held that a materialman might include in one claim or account materials furnished to the original contractor, with materials furnished to his executor, who completed the contract after the former's death.

In Miller v. Whitelaw, 28 Mo. App. 639, the facts that the principal contractors were partners, and that the partnership was dissolved before all of the materials had been furnished, were held to affect in no wise the rights of the materialman to a lien.

Messrs. L. A. Koons and Grosvenor, Jones, & Worstell, for plaintiff in error: Assuming a lien on the fund in the hands of the village, the money should be paid into the hands of the administrator, and be, by him, paid out to the ones legally entitled.

Spear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question is answered when proper construction is given to certain sections of our statute relating to liens, being §§ 3193, 3194, 3198, 3200, 3203, Rev. Stat. These sections, so far as pertinent to this case, provide that any subcontractor who has furnished material for the construction of a street, provided for in the contract between any public authority and a principal contractor, and under a contract between such subcontractor and the principal contractor, may at any time thereafter, not to exceed four months from the delivery of such material, file with the board or officer a sworn and itemized statement of the amount and value of such material furnished. Thereupon such board or officer shall retain subsequent payments from the principal to secure such claims. The board or officer shall, or the lien claimant may, furnish the principal contractor with a copy thereof within five days, and, if such principal contractor shall fail within five days to notify in writing the board or officer of his intention to dispute the claim, he shall be considered as assenting to its correctness, and thereupon subsequent payments shall be applied pro rata upon such claim. If the head contractor shall neglect or refuse to pay, within five days after his assent to or adjustment of the claim, the amount thereof and costs incurred to the subcontractor, the board or officer shall pay, when due, the whole or pro rata amount thereof out of payments subsequently falling due, and, on failure within ten days, the subcontractor furnishing material may recover, in an action for money had and received, the whole or pro rata amount of his claim, not exceeding the balance due the principal contractor. If, by collusion or fraud, the board or officer pay in advance the payments due under the contract, he shall be liable to the subcontractor for the amount due on such contract on the date of filing of the sworn account, the same as if no payment had been made.

It is not claimed that there was a literal compliance with the requirements of the statute with respect to furnishing the original contractor with a copy of the verified account of the subcontractors. There could not have been. The original principal contractor was dead. The claim is, and the record shows, that the uncompleted contract between the original contractor and the village was completed by the administrator, the plaintiff, and that the material furnished by the subcontractors was furnished in pursuance of their agreement with the principal contractor, and was accepted by the administrator, and went into the completion of the job thus being conducted to a successful termination by the administrator. And the notice, with copy of the sworn account, was in due time served on the administrator, having first been served on the village authorities, and the amount or justice of the accounts has never been, and is not now, disputed. This, it is claimed, was a sufficient compliance with the statute to entitle the subcontractors to the benefit of the statutory lien, and it was so held by the circuit court. We are of opinion that this claim is well founded. The policy of the state with respect to the claims of laborers and materialmen to be compensated for their work and material out of the structure to which their work and material have contributed is indicated by the statute as to liens, and has been clearly defined in a number of decisions in this and other courts. The statute should be liberally construed in order to carry out the purpose of the general assembly in its enactment, the legislation being highly remedial in character. This policy is fully elaborated in Bullock v. Horn, 44 Ohio St. 420, 7 N. E. 737, and need not be enlarged upon here. In an earlier case, Williams v. Webb, 2 Disney (Ohio) 430, it is held that "the death of the owner of property before a lien has been taken does not interfere with the rights of, or prevent the necessary steps to secure, a lien by the person performing labor or furnishing materials." It is further held that, although the statute in terms provides that the account shall be verified by the person performing the labor or furnishing the material, yet that the oath may be made by an agent of the party entitled to the lien, Gholson, J., observing in the opinion that, "while we might be disposed to accede to the general proposition that such statutes should not be extended beyond what their terms clearly import, yet this does not require us to stick to the letter." See also Foster v. Stone, 20 Pick. 542, and Bergin v. Braun, 15 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 382. So, in the case at bar, we are not required to stick to the letter. The contract was an executory one, which the administrator might properly complete. Gray v. Hawkins, 8 Ohio St. 450, 72 Am. Dec. 600. In doing so he acted as principal contractor, stepping into the shoes, for all practical purposes, of his decedent. And, as such principal contractor, he did finish the work with the aid of these men who furnished the material, they acting in good faith in compliance with their contract with the deceased. Their contribution to the work, thus accepted by the administrator, enabled him to complete his decedent's agreement with the village. To all intents and purposes they complied with the spirit and purpose of the statute. To deny them the advantage of their outlay would be to stick in the bark, to permit the mere letter to override and defeat the plain spirit and purpose of the statute.

The second question seems to present no difficulties. The fund arising from the completion of the paving contract should not be paid to the administrator. It was brought within the jurisdiction of the court of common pleas by the answer of the village in the nature of an interpleader. That court has all the parties before it, with full jurisdiction to determine all their rights and render final judgment, and there is no reason for paying money over to the administrator which belongs to the subcontractors, and which they have a right to receive undiminished by any fees or cost of any kind on the part of the administrator.

The judgment of the Circuit Court will be affirmed, and the cause remanded to the Court of Common Pleas of Athens County to carry into effect the judgment of the Circuit Court and this judgment, and the cause to be there proceeded in conformably to the 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) said judgment of the Circuit Court and of this opinion.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

W. O. HERR, Plff. in Err.,

v.

J. H. HERRINGTON et al.

(— Okla. —, 98 Pac. 443.)

Mortgage — foreclosure — junior mortgagee — rights.

1. A junior mortgagee, not being made a party to a suit to foreclose a first mortgage, is not affected by a judgment and decree foreclosing it. The foreclosure is effectual against those persons who were made parties, and a sale would vest the estate in the purchaser, subject to the rights therein of the subsequent lienholder.

Liens — inferior holder — rights.

2. One who has a lien inferior to another upon the same property has a right: First, to redeem the property, in the same manner

Headnotes by KANE, J.

Case Note. — Right of junior mortgagee as to surplus upon a foreclosure sale under a senior mortgage, in a proceeding to which he was not a party.

Although there are many cases on the general question of the right of a junior mortgagee to the surplus at a foreclosure sale under a senior mortgage, very few cases have been found where, as in Herr v. Herrington, it appeared that the junior mortgagee was not a party to the proceeding under the foreclosure sale. And none has been found where it appeared that the junior mortgagee himself was the purchaser at a sale under the senior mortgage.

It will be noticed that the decision in Herr v. Herrington seems to rest mainly upon the fact that at the foreclosure sale the bids were made with full knowledge of the condition of the title, and subject to the right of the junior mortgagee to redeem, and that, at least so far as the record was concerned, the junior mortgagee, at the time of his purchase, must have taken into consideration his own interest in the property, for the court expressly took occasion to say that, if the junior mortgagee had alleged that the land sold for its full value notwithstanding the outstanding right to redeem, or such other facts as would appeal to the conscience of a court of equity, he would possibly be entitled to the relief prayed for.

It was on this ground that it was held in Milmo Nat. Bank v. Rich, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 363, 40 S. W. 1032, that a junior mortgagee cannot elect to transfer his lien after as its owner might, from the superior lien; and, second, to be subrogated to all the benefits of the superior lien when necessary for the protection of his interests, upon satisfying the claim secured thereby.

Mortgage foreclosure — redemption — waiver.

3. If the holder of a junior encumbrance on land, not being made a party to a suit to foreclose a senior mortgage, becomes the purchaser of said premises at the foreclosure sale, he thereby waives his right to redeem.

Same — operation and effect.

4. The necessary consequence of a decree of foreclosure of mortgaged premises is to merge the interests of the parties to the suit in the decree, and to transfer and vest them in the purchaser at the sale.

Same — surplus — junior mortgagee.

5. A junior mortgagee has no claim, by a sale under the first mortgage, to which he was not made a party, to the surplus derived at such sale, but must resort to the land; the court saying: "If we bear in mind that the sale as made in this case is irrespective of his rights, and that the purchaser paid the amount of his bid for the property subject to his rights, it seems perfectly clear that what the purchaser obtained and paid his money for was the title of the mortgagor in the land and a subrogation to the rights of the first mortgagee. For these rights he was willing to pay, and did pay, the sum of $8,000, and assumed toward the second mortgagee in respect to the land the attitude previously sustained by the first lien holder and the mortgagor. Therefore the surplus, after paying the amount of the first mortgage, should go to the mortgagor." And see Winslow v. McCall, 32 Barb. 241, sufficiently set out in Horr v. Herrington.

However, in Milligan v. Gallen, 64 Neb. 501, 90 N. W. 541, the syllabus by the court is to the effect that a junior mortgagee who has not been made a party to a suit to foreclose a first mortgage is entitled to claim and receive any money resulting from the foreclosure sale and remaining in the sheriff's hands after the first mortgage had been satisfied. In this case, however, the question was not whether a junior mortgagee was entitled to the surplus, but whether the purchaser under the foreclosure suit had the right to the surplus, the assignee of the junior mortgage having elected to redeem. Besides, it also appeared that the junior mortgagee was made a party in the foreclosure suit, but that his assignee, who had failed to record the assignment, was not made a party.

In Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Truchtnicht, 3 Abb. N. C. 135, it was held that, if a person who holds several mortgages on certain property sells free from his junior encumbrances not mentioned in the complaint, and thus practically releases to the purchaser on the foreclosure sale all claim to the equity of redemption, he may ask to have virtue of his mortgage, upon the surplus money arising from a sale under a suit to foreclose a senior mortgage to which he was not made a party.

Junior mortgagee — redemption.

8. If a junior mortgagee has been duly recorded, a purchaser of the mortgaged premises on a foreclosure rendered on a senior mortgage will be presumed to have bid and purchased with reference to the junior mortgage, and with knowledge of the right of the holder of that mortgage to redeem.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

the surplus on the sale applied to the payment of such encumbrances.

A case somewhat similar to Horr v. Herrington is Hooper v. Castetter, 45 Neb. 67, 63 N. W. 135. In this case certain real estate was also encumbered by two mortgages; the holder of the second mortgage brought a suit in equity to foreclose, obtained a decree, and at a sale thereunder purchased the property, the holder of the first mortgage not being made a party to the foreclosure suit; after obtaining his decree, but before the sale, the holder of the second mortgage purchased and took an assignment to himself of the first mortgage; under an agreement, as he alleged, with the mortgagor that the amount due on the first mortgage should be applied on whatever bid he might make for the property at the sale thereof; as to this agreement, however, the trial court found against him. It was held that the ownership of the first mortgage did not of itself entitle him, as against the mortgagor or judgment creditors, to a decree applying the surplus proceeds of the sale towards the liquidation of the mortgage purchased. The court said: "Keeping in view the finding of fact made by the district court, Castetter has no more right to have the surplus proceeds of the sale applied to the liquidation of the Scottish-American mortgage than would a stranger to the proceedings have, had such stranger purchased this Scottish-American mortgage and taken an assignment of it after a decree rendered against the Remingtons and in favor of Castetter; and it will scarcely be contended that, had a stranger purchased this mortgage at the time Castetter did, his ownership of the mortgage would have entitled him to have the surplus proceeds arising from the foreclosure sale applied to its discharge; or that the Scottish-American Mortgage Company would have such right."

There are many cases in which it did not appear whether or not the junior mortgagee was a party to the foreclosure proceedings under the senior mortgage, but these have been expressly excluded from this note.

Messrs. J. I. Howard and Massingale & Duff, for plaintiff in error:

The judgment was not binding upon the junior mortgagee for the reason that he was not a party to the suit and had no notice of the proceedings.

Kane, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a controversy between W. O. Horr, the plaintiff in error, and J. M. Beal, one of the defendants in error, over the surplus accruing from the foreclosure sale of a certain tract of land. On the 19th day of January, 1903, the defendants in error, J. H. Herrington and F. C. Herrington, husband and wife, executed and delivered to one Lydia May Field, a promissory note for the sum of $1,000, and, to secure payment of the same, executed and delivered a mortgage upon certain real estate situated in Washita county, Oklahoma. On the 1st day of December, 1903, the same parties executed to the plaintiff in error a note for $1,000, and executed a mortgage upon the same real estate to secure payment thereof. On the 4th day of February thereafter they made, executed, and delivered to the defendant in error J. M. Beal a warranty deed to said premises, all of which instruments were duly recorded. On the 9th day of September, 1904, Lydia May Field instituted foreclosure proceedings upon the first mortgage, making the Herringtons and J. M. Beal parties defendant, the plaintiff in error herein, the second mortgagee, not being made a party. On the 31st day of October, 1905, a trial was had between the parties to the suit, and a judgment was rendered in favor of Lydia May Field and against the Herringtons for the sum of $938.37, together with interest and attorneys' fees; and a decree of foreclosure was entered against all of the parties defendant, whereby it was decreed that the land be sold in the manner prescribed by law, and the proceeds of said sale applied: (1) In payment of costs of said sale and action; (2) in payment of said judgment; and (3) that the residue, if any, be paid to said defendant J. M. Beal. About thirty days after the judgment and decree were entered the plaintiff in error, by leave of court, intervened in said action, setting up his note and mortgage. After stating facts sufficient to entitle him to a foreclosure of his second mortgage, he further alleged, in substance that, by reason of the execution and delivery of the note and mortgage by John H. Herrington and F. C. Herrington to the intervenor, said intervenor has a lien on the premises therein described, and that intervenor is entitled to a judgment against said John H. Herrington and F. C. Herrington in the sum of $753.37 and interest thereon at the rate of 12 per cent per annum from February 1, 1904, and reasonable attorneys' fees and all costs of suit. That the note from John H. Herrington and F. C. Herrington, his wife, to Lydia May Field, was a prior and first lien on said tract of land, and that the note and mortgage of intervenor was a secondary and inferior lien thereon. Then follows the prayer, which is in words and figures as follows: "Wherefore, your intervenor prays that said plaintiff herein, Lydia May Field, make strict proof of her claim against said defendants; and that a strict accounting thereof be made and of all the costs therein expended and all claims arising against said tract of land by reason of her mortgage thereon; and that, when said tract of land is sold, as provided by law, that the proceeds thereof be applied, first, to the payment of the amount found to be due Lydia May Field under her first and prior lien and all costs therein expended; and that her mortgage and note be canceled; and that the proceeds of said sale, after being so applied, shall next be applied to the payment of the said note of this intervenor, amounting to $753.37 principal and interest from February 1, 1904, at the rate of 12 per cent per annum and a reasonable attorney's fee as therein provided, and all costs of said suit herein expended; and that the remainder thereof be paid to said defendants as their interests may appear; and that the note and mortgage of intervenor be canceled and held for naught." On the 5th day of July, 1906, the land was sold under the decree, and was purchased by the intervenor for the sum of $1,765, the same being more than two thirds of the appraised value of the land; and the sale was afterwards, upon this motion, confirmed, and a sheriff's deed thereto made, executed, and delivered, the amount of the bid being paid to the sheriff, and, by him, turned into court. In November, 1906, Beal was served with summons in the proceedings in intervention, and on the 19th day of March, 1907, he appeared and filed his separate answer to the petition, setting up the facts of the suit on the first mortgage, it having proceeded to judgment and sale, and that the intervenor was the purchaser, that the mortgage of intervenor was of record at the time said sale of land was made, and praying that the surplus in the sum of $600 over and above the amount necessary to pay the first mortgage and costs should be ordered turned over to him because of his ownership of the equity of redemption and legal title at the time of the sale. To this answer the intervenor demurred, which demurrer was overruled by the court and judgment entered in favor of Beal.

That the plaintiff in error, not being a party to the proceedings, was not affected by the judgment and decree foreclosing the first mortgage, is now too well settled to need argument or authorities to support it. When a party in interest other than the owner of the equity of redemption is not made a party to a bill for the foreclosure of a mortgage, the foreclosure is effectual as against those persons interested in the equity who were made parties. A sale would vest the estate in the purchaser, subject to redemption by the person interested in it who was not made a party to the proceedings. *Story, Eq. Pl. § 193; Matcain v. Smith, 6 McLean, 416, Fed. Cas. No. 9,272; Kelgour v. Wood, 64 Ill. 345; Ohling v. Luitjens, 32 Ill. 23; Georgia P. R. Co. v. Walker, 61 Miss. 481; Frische v. Kramer, 16 Ohio, 125, 47 Am. In this state the statutory rule is to the same effect. Section 3456, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. 1903, provides that "one who has a lien, inferior to another, upon the same property, has a right: First, to redeem the property in the same manner as its owner might, from the superior lien; and, second, to be subrogated to all the benefits of the superior lien when necessary for the protection of his interests, upon satisfying the claim secured thereby." Section 3457 defines "redemption" as follows: "Redemption from a lien is made by performing, or offering to perform, the act for the performance of which it is a security, and paying, or offering to pay, the damages, if any, to which the holder of the lien is entitled for delay."

It is clear that the plaintiff in error did not attempt to exercise either of his statutory rights. That he was entitled to do so up to the time the land was sold and he became a purchaser thereof, there can be no doubt. And that his right to redeem would continue if anyone but himself had been the purchaser at that sale seems equally clear.

The sale would vest the estate in the purchaser, subject to redemption by the holder of the junior encumbrance, who was not made a party to the proceedings. This doctrine is amply sustained by the authorities heretofore cited. The sale, though it failed to be effectual as against the holder of the second mortgage, would operate as an assignment of the first mortgage and all the mortgagee's rights thereunder to the purchaser, who might proceed de novo to foreclose as against the parties who had been omitted. But, if the holder of a junior encumbrance, who had not been made a party to the suit, becomes the purchaser, it obviously follows that his right to redeem is lost or waived. He could not redeem from himself, and he could not foreclose his mortgage against himself, for no one may be plaintiff and defendant in the same cause. The rule that the purchase of the land by the junior mortgagee merges his lien in the superior title is founded upon the reason that there could generally be no advantage to him in keeping on foot his own mortgage against his own estate. 1 Jones, Mortg. § 869. But, of course, whenever an advantage could accrue to the mortgagee by preserving his lien for the purpose of using it as a screen to protect him from an intermediate title, such as a junior mortgage or other subsequent lien, the purchaser is entitled to keep his lien alive for such purpose. But there is no reason for the invocation of this rule in the case at bar. This controversy does not affect the title to the land; it is admitted by all parties that the plaintiff in error is the owner of it in fee simple, and, as far as the record shows, there were no liens subsequent to his mortgage.

Under our laws a mortgage conveys no title to the mortgagee, and, there being no provision for redemption after the foreclosure sale, it follows that all the right, title, and interest of all the defendants who were made parties to the suit merged in the decree and was vested in the plaintiff in error by virtue of his purchase at the sale and the issuance of the sheriff's deed to him, as he was the only person remaining who had any interest in the land. He intended, no doubt, to effect a merger of his mortgage lien into his paramount title thus acquired. "The necessary consequence of a decree of foreclosure and sale of mortgaged premises is to merge the interests of the parties to the suit in the decree and to transfer and vest them in the purchaser at the sale." Tallman v. Ely, 6 Wis. 244.

to attach his lien to the surplus arising from the sale. There are no reasons that we know of why this could not be done, provided there were sufficient equities to warrant a court of equity in granting such relief; but he was not entitled to it merely as a holder of a junior encumbrance, for the statute, which seems to be in harmony with the general rule, fixes his rights under the contract, "The only right of a junior mortgagee who has not been made a party to the foreclosure of a prior mortgage is to redeem the property from that mortgage. It does not matter that, on the sale of the property under the foreclosure of the prior mortgage there was a surplus which, with the consent of the mortgagor, was paid to a third mortgagee who was made a party to the suit, and the property subsequently depreciated so that there was no value above the first mortgage. The middle mortgagee has no claim upon the surplus. Whether the property has increased or depreciated in value since the sale under the first mortgage does not affect his right to redeem, which is the only right he has in the matter." 2 Jones, Mortg. §1431; McKernan v. Neff, 43 Ind. 503; Spurgin v. Adamson, 62 Iowa, 661, 18 N. W. 293; Gault v. Equitable Trust Co. 100 Ky. 578, 38 S. W. 1065; Sanger v. Nightingale, 122 U. S. 176, 30 L. ed. 1105, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1109. "A subsequent encumbrancer has no claim upon the surplus moneys arising from a sale under a statute foreclosure of which he has no notice; his lien not being affected by the proceedings. The land, therefore, will not be discharged from the lien of his encumbrance and transferred to such surplus moneys." Winslow v. McCall, 32 Barb. 241.

Whether the surplus be the whole sum bid for the property, less the amount of the mortgage with the costs and expenses, depends upon the terms of sale. If the title put up and sold be the entire estate, without deducting prior encumbrances, the proceeds are primarily applicable to the payment of such prior encumbrances so far as needed for that purpose. But, if only the mortgage title be sold, or if that title be sold expressly subject to prior encumbrances, the purchaser must account to the mortgagor for the surplus of the purchase money, deducting only the amount of the mortgage with costs and expenses. Morton v. Hall, 118 Mass. 511; Alden v. Wilkins, 117 Mass. 216; O'Connell v. Kelly, 114 Mass. 97.

In the case at bar the records of the register of deeds disclosed that there were two mortgages on the land at the time the suit to foreclose the first one was commenced; and it must be presumed that all persons interested had notice of the condition of the title, and that all proceedings were had subject to the right of the junior mortgagee to redeem. The appraisers, whose duty it was to appraise the land before the sale, must have made their appraisal with notice of the existing right to redeem, and presumably fixed the value thereof at its value subject to such right of redemption; and, of course, the bidders at the sale must be charged with like notice and must be presumed to have bid such sum as the land was worth, subject to the right to redeem. The rule is stated in Belleville Sav. Bank v. Reis, 136 Ill. 242, 26 N. E. 640, as follows: "When one who is absolutely entitled in his own right to a charge or encumbrance upon land becomes the owner in fee of the same land, with no intervening interest or lien, the charge will, at law, merge in the ownership and cease to exist. . . . The premises, in such case, become the primary fund for the payment of the mortgage, and whoever acquires that fund and the mortgage also must be regarded as having applied the fund to the payment of the mortgage. . . . The indebtedness will be presumed to have been discharged so soon as the holder of it becomes invested with the title to the land upon which it is charged, 'on the principle that a party may not sue himself at law or in equity.' The purchaser is presumed to have bought the land at its value, less the amount of indebtedness secured thereon, and equity will not permit him to hold the land and still collect the debt from the mortgagor."

The case of McKernan v. Neff, 43 Ind. 503, was, in principle, similar to the case at bar. In that case A mortgaged certain real estate to B. Afterwards he made a second mortgage on the same real estate to C, and after that a third mortgage to D. C assigned his note and mortgage to E. B foreclosed his mortgage, and D was a party to the proceeding and filed his cross bill against the mortgagor, but he was not served with process, nor did he appear to the cross bill. Neither C nor E was made a party, nor had they notice of the proceeding. The decree ordered the sale of the real estate and directed the proceeds to be first applied to the payment of B's mortgage, second, to the payment of D's mortgage, and the overplus, if any, to be paid to the mortgagor. The real estate was sold on the decree, and D became the purchaser. B's mortgage was paid out of the proceeds, and the residue, with the consent of the mortgagor, was paid to D. After the sheriff's sale the mortgagor conveyed the real estate by warranty deed to D, and D afterwards sold and conveyed to F, and, after the expiration of one year, he also received a deed from the sheriff. A, at the time of the decree, was insolvent, and so continued to be, and the real estate became so depreciated in value that it was not worth more than the amount of the mortgage of B. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Held, that the decree of foreclosure and the sale of the real estate did not affect the rights of E. Held, also, that the equity of the mortgagor, and all other parties to the action were barred by the decree and sale; but, as to E, the proceedings only had the effect of transferring to the purchaser the interest of the mortgagee in the mortgage foreclosed, and he occupied the position of an assignee. Held, also, that E could foreclose his mortgage, and redeem the mortgaged premises by paying the amount of B's mortgage, as if there had been no foreclosure. Held, also, that E, having lost no rights by the foreclosure, had no right to any avails of a sale, or any equity that authorized a marshaling of the surplus according to priorities. Held, also, that a depreciation in the value of the real estate since the sheriff's sale could not affect the rights of the parties. It was further held that, if a junior mortgage has been duly recorded, a purchaser of the mortgaged premises on a foreclosure rendered on a senior mortgage will be presumed to have bid and purchased with reference to the junior mortgage, and with knowledge of the right of the holder of that mortgage to redeem. And a middle mortgagee who was not a party to proceedings of foreclosure on the senior mortgage cannot elect to affirm a sale made to the junior mortgagee, on a decree rendered upon the senior mortgage in such proceedings, and recover of the junior mortgagee the surplus after paying the senior mortgagee.

In the case of Greensburg Fuel Co. v. Irwin Natural Gas Co. 162 Pa. 78, 29 Atl. 274, certain property was sold; it was agreed that the sale did not affect a mortgage of a large amount held by the Southwest Natural Gas Company; at the sale this company holding the lien purchased the property, and thereafter claimed that it was entitled to share pro rata with the other creditors in the distribution of the proceeds. In the opinion, Mr. Justice McCollum says: "The property levied on in this case was sold subject to any mortgage or mortgages legally existing thereon, and the only mortgage upon it was held by the Southwest company. It was so sold on writs evidently controlled by the mortgagee and purchaser at the sheriff's sale. A mortgage, the lien of which is not discharged by a sheriff's sale, cannot share in the proceeds of the sale. In such case all that the purchaser takes by the sale is the equity of redemption, and his bid is for such sum as he is willing to pay for the property above the amount of the mortgage debt. If the purchaser is the mortgagee, his mortgage is, in equity, satisfied; his claim is paid in the purchase of the property sold subject to it."

The same principle was involved in the case of Trimmier v. Vise, 17 S. C. 499, 43 Am. Rep. 624, where Mr. Chief Justice Simpson, who delivered the opinion of the court, says: "The purchase of the equity of redemption unites the equitable title under the mortgage and the right to redeem in the same person; and, where there is no intervening claim, merger is the result, and the mortgagee becomes the owner in fee, with nothing left for the mortgage to operate upon. . . . In addition to this, the right of the mortgagor to redeem being the only interest that can be sold by a judgment junior to the mortgage, the purchaser at such sale, whether he be the mortgagee or a stranger, is supposed to give the amount of his bid for that interest, over and above the mortgage debt, leaving the land, when purchased by a stranger, still subject to be sold for the mortgage debt, and, when purchased by the mortgagee, to be applied in satisfaction of his debt, which, by operation of law, is thereby extinguished. As we have already said, this is the admitted doctrine where the entire property has been purchased by the mortgagee."

Further discussing the same proposition, the learned chief justice continues: "In the case of Moss v. Bratton, 5 Rich. E. 3, the court held that Bratton, who bought at sheriff's sale under an execution junior to the mortgage, obtained his title encumbered with the lien; and, though he did not become personally liable for the mortgage debt, yet the land in his hands was specifically bound, so far as it might suffice for the payment of the debt. The only interest sold was the right of the mortgagor to redeem. No doubt Bratton supposed that the land was worth the amount he bid for this interest and the mortgage debt besides. If it turned out upon a resale for foreclosure that he was mistaken, this was an error of judgment on his part, and his misfortune, to which all men are liable."

The reasoning in the foregoing cases is applicable to the case at bar. All of the bidders at the foreclosure sale—and the record shows there were others besides the plaintiff in error—must have been bidding with full knowledge of the condition of the title, and that they would take the land offered for sale subject to the right of plaintiff in error to redeem, and no doubt governed their bids accordingly. At least, this is the presumption that, from the record before us, must prevail. The plaintiff in error bases his right to the surplus solely upon the proposition that he is entitled to it by reason of his junior mortgage. This position we believe to be untenable. His plea of intervention was filed shortly after the decree was rendered and before the sale, but summons was not issued thereon until after 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the sale. Under such circumstances the mere filing of the petition, without issuance or service of summons, would not constitute notice to the bidders or anyone interested in the land that the plaintiff in error had abandoned his right to redeem. The land would proceed to sale entirely unaffected by the petition, and the sale must have been subject to the right of redemption by the plaintiff in error. Of course, at the time the petition was filed there was no means of telling whether there would be a surplus or not, and so at that time plaintiff in error really had no cause of action in the form in which he brought it. The relief he seeks is purely equitable. If he had alleged in his petition that the land sold for its full value notwithstanding the outstanding right to redeem, or such other facts as would appeal to the conscience of a court of equity, he would possibly be entitled to the relief prayed for. Having failed to do this, and there appearing to be no equity supporting his right to a lien on the surplus, the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

PEPAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Baker County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover the purchase price of certain hay. Affirmed.

Statement by Bean, Ch. J.:

This is an action to recover the purchase price of two car loads of hay. The defense is that the hay which plaintiff agreed to sell and deliver to defendants was to be "good, number one, merchantable hay," and that furnished was not of this quality, for which reason it was rejected. The defendants are commission merchants, residing and doing business in Baker City. Plaintiff resides in Union county, some miles distant from Baker. In March, 1906, he contracted and agreed to sell to defendants five car loads of hay, for use in their business, at $11.50 per ton, f. o. b. cars, Nodine Spur, Union county. The contract was made at Baker City, and defendants were to pay the freight from place of shipment to that point; but nothing was said about the time or place of payment, or the inspection or acceptance of the hay. Shortly after making the contract, plaintiff loaded two cars with hay at Nodine Spur, and the same were carried by the railroad company to Baker, reaching there Sunday morning, March 25th. On the following day defendants, before they had examined or inspected the hay, made some effort to sell it, but were unable to do so. On the morning of the 27th, in company with Abercrombie, — a prospective purchaser. — Mr. Breck, one of the defendants, opened the cars, in which the hay had been shipped, and examined it, but Abercrombie was unwilling to purchase. In the afternoon of the same day they made a further and more careful examination, and Breck, claiming that the hay was not of the kind and quality contracted for, refused to accept it, and so notified plaintiff and the railroad company on the following morning. At the time Breck and Abercrombie were examining the hay on the afternoon of the 27th, two bales were taken out of one of the cars for inspection, and on the same afternoon one of defendants' employees, without their knowledge or authority, sold one of such bales to a shipper of stock passing through Baker City, and paid the money over to defendants. As soon as they learned of the sale they repudiated the act of their employee, and directed him to return to the car another bale equally as good, or better, than the one sold by him. At the time of the trial it was contended by plaintiff that, under the contract between him and defendants, it was the duty of defendants to inspect and accept or reject the hay at Nodine Spur, where it was to be loaded on the cars; and, if they neglected to do so, they were bound to receive such hay as was actually shipped, and rely upon a claim of damages for breach of contract, if it was of inferior kind and quality; but, if this was not so, defendants' conduct after the hay reached Baker City was such as to amount, in law, to an acceptance thereof. The court instructed the jury that, if the hay, delivered on the cars by plaintiff at Nodine Spur, was substantially the kind and quality called for by the contract, it would amount to a full and complete performance, and enable him to recover the contract price, whether the hay was subsequently accepted by defendants or not; and, if the hay was different or inferior to that which plaintiff agreed to sell, notwithstanding which the defendants accepted it, or did something amounting to an acceptance, they could not thereafter repudiate their liability by returning or tendering a return of the hay, but that defendants had a reasonable time in which to inspect the hay after it reached Baker City, and if it was, in fact, of an inferior quality, and not according to the contract, they could reject it, and refuse to accept or pay for it, and, if they did so, plaintiff could not recover in this action. The court also held that the question as to whether defendants accepted the hay after it reached Baker was one of fact, to be determined by the jury under proper instructions from the court, which were given accordingly. The cause was tried before a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of defendants. From the judgment subsequently rendered thereon, this appeal is taken. The errors assigned are in the giving and refusing of certain instructions and admission of testimony.

The mere delivery to a common carrier at the place agreed upon and an acceptance by it do not constitute an acceptance on the part of the buyer, nor pass title to the buyer, nor preclude him from rescinding the contract upon delivery by the common carrier at their place of destination, if the goods shipped are not of the kind, character, and quality contracted for.

To constitute an acceptance by the buyer, there must be both a physical and mental acceptance. It means more than merely the receipt of goods.

Where the buyer necessarily relies upon the vendor's description, and has no opportunity to inspect the goods prior to shipment, he cannot be compelled to accept them until he has a reasonable opportunity to inspect them.

2 Mechem, Sales, §§ 1375, 1376; Brigham v. Hibbard, supra.

Bean, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal point relied upon by plaintiff for a reversal of the judgment is the ruling of the court that, under the contract for the sale of hay in question, defendants had a right to inspect it after it reached Baker City, and, if it did not conform to the contract, to refuse to accept or pay for it. The argument is that the place of inspection and acceptance or rejection was at Nodine Spur, where the hay was to be delivered by the plaintiff f. o. b. cars; and, if defendants neglected to exercise the right of inspection at that time and place, they were liable for the value of the hay so delivered. But we do not so find the law. No place or time of payment or of inspection or acceptance was stipulated in the contract. All parties concur in this point. The contract was made between plaintiff and defendant Breck. These gentlemen both say that Breck met plaintiff at the depot at Baker City, and inquired of him if he had any hay for sale, and that he (plaintiff) said he had; that the price was $11.50 per ton, f. o. b. cars at Nodine Spur, and that Breck said he would take five car loads at that price, and under the conditions named. The only difference between the witnesses is in reference to the terms of the contract regarding the kind and quality of hay to be delivered, and that matter is concluded by the verdict of the jury. Some stress is laid by counsel for plaintiff upon a statement by Mr. Breck, on cross-examination, that he would have had the privilege of examining the hay if he had gone down to Nodine Spur, but this was merely the opinion of the witness, and was not part of the contract. Indeed, when asked as to whether he was to be present at Nodine Spur to receive the hay for shipment, he replied: "Mr. Eaton knew it was impossible for me to be there. There was no understanding of that kind at all." So that it is manifest from the testimony that there was no time or place of inspection or acceptance agreed upon by the parties, or for the payment of the purchase price. The payment, therefore, became due and payable on a complete delivery, and there could be no such delivery without an opportunity for inspection. Under an executory contract for the future sale and delivery of goods of a specified quality, the quality is a part of the description, and the seller is bound to furnish goods actually complying with such description. If he tenders articles of inferior quality, the vendee is not bound to accept them; and, unless he does so, he is not liable therefor. This necessarily gives to the vendee the right, and imposes upon him the duty, of inspection, and he must therefore be given an opportunity to make such inspection before becoming liable for the purchase price, unless the contract otherwise provides; and, where articles are to be delivered to a common carrier by the vendor, to be forwarded to the vendee at a distant point, and no provision is made for inspection and acceptance before or at the time of shipment, the vendee is entitled, under the law, to a reasonable time, after the goods arrive at their destination, in which to exercise the right of inspection, and to accept or reject them if they do not comply with the contract. Brigham v. Hibbard, 28 Or. 386, 43 Pac. 383; Johnson v. Hibbard, 29 Or. 186, 54 Am. St. Rep. 787, 44 Pac. 287; Steiger v. Fronhofer, 43 Or. 178, 72 Pac. 693; Puritan Mfg. Co. v. Westermire, 47 Or. 557, 84 Pac. 797.

Pierson v. Crooks, 115 N. Y. 539, 12 Am. St. Rep. 831, 22 N. E. 349, is much in point. That case construed a contract between a New York importer and a London dealer, for the sale of iron by the latter to the former. The iron was to be delivered f. o. b. at Liverpool, and paid for by bills of exchange at sixty days, on delivery of the shipping documents at New York. The iron shipped by the London dealer was not in compliance with the contract, and the New York merchant refused to accept it, and brought an action against the vendor to recover money paid for duties and expenses at the port of New York. The seller contended that the buyer was bound to inspect the iron and ascertain its quality at Liverpool, and, not having done so, it was in law an acceptance, which precluded him from subsequently questioning the quality or returning the goods. But the court refused to concur in this view, and Mr. Justice Andrews says: "When and at what place the right of inspection was to be exercised was not definitely fixed by the contract. The intention of the parties, when ascertained, is to govern. They might have provided that the inspection should be made either at Liverpool or at New York. The contract is silent on this point; and the defendants insist that, in the absence of express words, the law ascertains and fixes the intention 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) that examination should be made at the place where the defendants were to deliver the iron, to wit, at Liverpool. We are, however, of opinion that, where goods are ordered of a specific quality, which the vendor undertakes to deliver to a carrier, to be forwarded to the vendee at a distant place, to be paid for on arrival, the right of inspection, in the absence of any specific provision in the contract, continues until the goods are received and accepted at their ultimate destination, and that the carrier is not the agent of the vendee to accept the goods as corresponding with the contract, although he may be his agent to receive and transport them." In answer to the argument made there, as here, that the title vested in the vendee upon the delivery of the goods to the common carrier, and that the vesting of such title implies an acceptance, and is inconsistent with the alleged right of inspection and rejection of the goods on their arrival at the place of destination, the learned justice says: "But, assuming that the title to the iron, for some purposes, vested in the plaintiffs on delivery to the steamers, it was, as between the vendors and vendees, a conditional title, subject to the right of inspection and rejection for inferior quality on arrival at New York.

The ordering of goods of a specific quality by a distant purchaser of a manufacturer or dealer, with directions to ship them by a carrier, is one of the most frequent commercial transactions. It would be a most embarrassing and inconvenient rule—more injurious even to the dealer or manufacturer than to purchasers—if delivery to the carrier was held to conclude the party giving the order from rejecting the goods on arrival, if found not to be of the quality ordered." The same doctrine was applied by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Alden v. Hart, 161 Mass. 576, 37 N. E. 742. In that case the defendants, residing at New Bedford, ordered a quantity of coal to be shipped from Weehawken, New Jersey, by certain line of barges, defendants to pay the freight. The coal shipped was not of the kind and quality ordered, and the court held that the defendants had the right to reject it on its arrival at New Bedford, Mr. Chief Justice Field remarking: "Whether in such a case as this the title to the property passes to the vendee when the coal is delivered on board the barge is not free from doubt, and we have not found it necessary to decide the question. . . . If it be assumed, in favor of the plaintiffs, that the title to this coal passed to the defendants when it was selected by the plaintiffs, and laden free on board upon the barge at Weehawken, and when bills of lading were given to the plaintiffs, under which the cargo was to be delivered to the defendants or their assigns at the port of New Bedford, they paying the freight, we are yet of opinion that the rulings at the trial were correct. If the title passed to the defendants, it was a conditional title, and the condition was that the coal should be found to be of the quality purchased, and the defendants could reject the coal if, upon examination, it did not conform to the implied warranty that it should be merchantable." To the same purport, see Morse v. Moore, 83 Me. 473, 13 L.R.A. 224, 23 Am. St. Rep. 783, 22 Atl. 362; Holt v. Pie, 120 Pa. 425, 14 Atl. 389; Fogel v. Brubaker, 122 Pa. 7, 15 Atl. 692.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that no error was committed by the court below in its ruling on this phase of the case. In Samuel M. Lawder & Sons Co. v. Albert Mackie Grocery Co. 97 Md. 1, 62 L.R.A. 795, 54 Atl. 634, cited by plaintiff, the contract required payment to be made for the goods at the place of shipment, which the court held was necessarily inconsistent with a right of inspection at another place. But here, as we have seen, no time or place of payment was specified, and therefore it did not become due until the goods were delivered. The cases of Barr v. Borthwick, 19 Or. 578, 25 Pac. 360, and Meyer v. Thompson, 16 Or. 194, 18 Pac. 16, have no particular bearing here. The question in the former case was one of title, and in the latter whether there had been a sufficient delivery to take a parol contract, for the sale of personal property, out of the statute of fraud.

It is also insisted that defendants waived the right to reject the hay for defective quality, by their action and conduct in relation thereto after it reached Baker City. But this question was for the jury, and, we think, was fairly submitted to them. The defendants were not precluded from rejecting the hay by merely receiving it. They still had a reasonable time in which to inspect and reject it if not according to the contract. Nor did their offer to sell and dispose of the hay before they had examined it amount to an acceptance. This was before they ascertained that it was of an inferior quality, and was on the assumption that plaintiff had complied with his contract, and shipped hay of the kind and quality agreed upon. It was therefore not conclusive in law of an intent to accept the hay in performance of the contract (Benjamin, Sales, § 703). Nor, again, was the unauthorized sale of one bale by an employee of defendants conclusive of the acceptance by them of the entire shipment. The evidence shows, or tends to show, that the employee had no authority, either express or implied, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) to make such sale, and that it was promptly repudiated by the defendants as soon as they learned of it. The question of the acceptance of goods is ordinarily for the jury (Benjamin, Sales, § 895), and there is nothing in this record to take this case out of the operation of the rule.

After the defendant Breck had testified on the trial that, in company with Abercrombie, he examined the hay on the morning of the 27th of March, and found that it was not of the kind and quality called for by the contract between his firm and the plaintiff, he was asked by his counsel the question: "Did Mr. Abercrombie take it?" and was permitted, over the objection and exception of plaintiff, to answer, "No, sir." It is claimed that the admission of this testimony was error, and calculated to mislead the jury. It was probably admitted as tending to show the hay was not merchantable, because Abercrombie, after examining it, refused to purchase it. But, as he was subsequently called as a witness by defendants, and testified fully as to the quality of the hay, it is not apparent how the ruling assigned could have been prejudicial to the plaintiff even if erroneous.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Bean, Ch. J., on October 6, 1908, handed down the following additional opinion:

The court instructed the jury, in substance, that, if the plaintiff agreed to sell and deliver to defendants 50 tons of good, merchantable hay, and failed to do so, the defendants would be entitled to a verdict for the market value of such hay at the place of delivery, less the contract price, with freight added. The jury found a verdict in favor of defendants, and assessed their damages at $10.

The attention of the court is called to the fact, by a petition for rehearing, that the instruction was erroneous, because it is admitted that the failure of the plaintiff to deliver the hay, except the car load in dispute, was by the consent and at the request of defendants, and therefore they are not entitled to recover damages for such failure. The error in giving the instruction referred to, however, did not affect the real controversy between the parties, and, as the amount of damages allowed by the jury can be segregated from the rest of the verdict, the error does not call for a reversal of the case, if the defendants will, within ten days, remit the amount of such damages; otherwise, a new trial will be ordered. Mackey v. Olssen, 12 Or. 429, 8 Pac. 357; Cochran v. Baker, 34 Or. 555, 52 Pac. 520, 56 Pac. 641.

The other points made in the petition were all considered by the court on the former hearing, and need not be further alluded to at this time.

Case Note. — Validity of agreement to indemnify bail in a criminal case.

The earlier cases on this question have been gathered in a subject note to United States v. Simmons, 14 L.R.A. 78; nearly all of them being also reviewed or cited in the prevailing or dissenting opinion of CARR v. DAVIS. The cases gathered here, therefore, are only those found decided since the date of that note, and not found in CARR v. DAVIS.

As will be noted from the above-indicated authorities, the cases are not at one on this question, and a similar conflict characterizes the later cases.

In Stevens v. Hay, 61 Ill. 399, it was held that a mortgage executed by parties living in Illinois, to be used in Ohio, to indemnify any person who might become bail for a person who had been indicted in the latter state for a criminal offense, was valid in the hands of a person to whom it had been assigned for such purpose, and might be enforced to the extent of the loss suffered by the bail on the recognizance.

In Harp v. Osgood, 2 Hill, 216, the bail for the appearance of a party indicted, who had gone into another state, employed a constable to arrest him, with a view to his surrender; the constable went, but, in consequence of sickness in the accused's family, and important business relations, allowed him to go at large on receiving from a third person a writing promising to pay the constable a certain sum as indemnity if the accused did not appear in due time. It was held that such a writing was not void as against public policy, and that, upon default of the accused's appearance, the bail might recover upon it, in the name of the 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

constable, the damages which he had sustained.

It was held in People v. Ingersoll, 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. 23, that the fact that persons offered as bail have received transfers of property without consideration, from friends of the accused, to enable them to qualify as bail, is not an objection to them, the court saying that, if the property conveyed to the bail had belonged to the accused, and he had so conveyed it, the case probably would have been different.

In Ellis v. Norman, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1798, 44 S. W. 429, it was held that the surety in a forfeited bail bond is entitled to reimbursement out of indemnity given him by the principal to the extent of attorney's fees and other expenses incurred by him in good faith, in obtaining a remission from the governor, whereby the judgment on the forfeiture has been materially reduced, the case not being one of pardon brokerage.

In Mayne v. Fidelity & D. Co. 8 Pa. Dist. R. 711, it was held that a prosecutor of an accused, who also became his bail, cannot, upon forfeiture of the recognizance, recover from a third person who indemnifies him as bail. The court saying: "Under act of April 22, 1846, P. L. 477, this plaintiff will, on distribution of the moneys collected from him on the commonwealth's judgment, be entitled to receive out of what remains after payment of the costs of prosecution, collection, and audit, so much as will satisfy the amount of damage he has sustained by reason of the commission of the alleged forgeries. If now this action be sustained, the plaintiff, as obligee in the indemnity bond, will collect from the defendant the money which, as bail, he is called on to pay to the commonwealth, and which he will at APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Harrison County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought upon an indemnity bond and to set aside alleged fraudulent conveyances of real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. G. Smith for appellant.

Mr. W. Scott, for appellees:

The indemnifying bond is contrary to public policy, and void.

Herman v. Jeuchner, L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 361; United States v. Ryder, 110 U. S. 729, 28 L. ed. 308, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 196; United States v. Simmons, 14 L.R.A. 78, 47 Fed. 575; Davis, Crim. Law, p. 412; 5 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 127; Re Von Der Ahe, 85 Fed. 959; Morgan v. Hale, 12 W. Va. 713.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Sutton was under charge of felony. He gave a recognizance to answer the charge. Carr acknowledged the recognizance as bail for Sutton. Carr took from Sutton, Davis, and others a bond of indemnity to indemnify Carr against loss by reason of such recog-once receive back again as prosecutor; with the practical result that the defendant here is held to make good the loss occasioned by Avirett's forgeries,—a thing which it never undertook or contemplated. Here we have presented the spectacle of one accused of a most serious crime, delivered for safe keeping into the hands of the person wronged, who, having compounded the offense, and received back part of the money out of which he has been defrauded, suffers the accused to escape, and now proceeds to collect the residue of his loss from the party that agreed to indemnify him, not against that loss, but against the very act which he has permitted and even assisted in. Such a use by prosecutor and defendant of the means devised by the law to save those awaiting trial from the inconvenience of imprisonment is novel and ingenious, but contrary to public policy, and one which the courts cannot countenance." This case, however, was reversed in 198 Pa. 490, 48 Atl. 469, the court saying, in regard to the question here annotated: "The decision of the question of law reserved in this case is without precedent in this state, and it does not seem to be in harmony with the trend of decision on the same or similar questions in other states."

In Dunkin v. Hodge, 46 Ala. 523, it was held that an agreement by which a person receives a sum of money from another in consideration of his becoming bail for the latter's son, who is accused of felony, in order that such son may get out of jail and run away and thus escape trial, is void as obstructing or interfering with the administration of public justice; and money paid under such an agreement, if not used, cannot be recovered back.

nizance. Sutton failed to appear. An execution was awarded by the circuit court against Carr alone upon said recognizance. Carr brought this chancery suit against Davis, upon said indemnity bond, to set aside a conveyance of real estate by Davis as made to defraud creditors, among them Carr. The circuit court dismissed the bill on demurrer.

The question is, Is the bond of indemnity valid so as to create an enforceable demand in favor of Carr? It is said that the bond is void as against public policy in this: That it tends to make the bail less watchful to prevent the escape of the accused from trial than he would be if not indemnified; that, if not indemnified, the bail would keep strict watch on the accused, and, on suspicion of escape, to save himself from loss, would arrest the accused, and return him to prison to stand trial; but, being indemnified, he does not care. The authorities are divided upon the question. None are binding upon us. No West Virginia or Virginia case sets the rule for us. We must choose between conflict among cases not binding us, and adopt the rule we think most reason-

In J. G. Hutchinson & Co. v. Morris Bros. 86 Mo. App. 40, it was suggested that, if the bail put up a cash deposit for the principal, which the latter accepts by going at liberty thereunder, and afterwards forfeits the same, causing loss to the bail, the latter is a valid debt against the principal unless it was understood at the time of the deposit that the money should be forfeited by nonappearance, the court saying that such case is not like that of a contract of indemnity executed to one to secure him against loss if he will execute bail for the appearance of one accused of crime.

In a number of cases involving an agreement to indemnify another from liability as bail, the validity of the agreement, as being against public policy, was not questioned; the only question raised being whether or not an oral agreement of such nature was within the statute of frauds. Although these cases apparently assume that such an agreement is not against public policy, the question not being before the court, they are not of much value here, and thus no effort has been made to exhaust this class of cases.

One of these cases is Aldrich v. Ames, 9 Gray, 76, where it was held that an oral promise, for a valuable consideration, to indemnify another for his liability as bail for a third person, is not within the statute of frauds. Other cases holding to the same effect are Anderson v. Spence, 72 Ind. 315, 37 Am. Rep. 162; Holmes v. Knights, 10 N. H. 175; Harrison v. Sawtel, 10 Johns. 242, 6 Am. Dec. 337.

In People v. Skidmore, 17 Cal. 260, a person was held to answer by a justice on a criminal charge; he, with his sureties, entered into a recognizance or instrument in able and useful. Force there is, we must say, in the argument above stated, that indemnity tends to make the secured bail indifferent; but that rule would make it sometimes out of the power of the accused, innocent or guilty, to give bail, and require him to languish, perhaps die, in prison. It is settled, it seems, that when the bail pays a recognizance, the law does not imply a promise by the accused to reimburse the bail; otherwise in South Carolina. Reynolds v. Harral, 2 Strobb. L. 87. The books say that this is because there is no debt. Sometimes, often, indeed, the very purpose on the part of prisoner and bail in seeking bail is to give the prisoner chance to escape. If the law would raise a promise by the accused to repay the bail, it would do so in all cases, as well where there was such intent to secure bail to enable escape, as where there was not. Thus the law would aid the bad purpose to the defeat of public justice. So with subrogation. It does by no means follow from the fact that the law raises no promise to pay, that neither will it allow an express contract of indemnity; for, in case of an express contract, if such corrupt purpose were proven, it would avoid the contract. It is also settled that, though a criminal recognizance is a lien for the state on land, yet the bail surety cannot be substituted to the lien, and this for like reasons against raising an implied promise of repayment to the bail.

But though there is no such implied promise to sustain an action by the bail against the principal in the recognizance, and no subrogation in equity to the lien, can the accused make an express contract by bond, deed of trust, or oral promise to indemnify? This is denied in 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 684, and 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 172. In Simpson v. Robert, 35 Ga.

180, it is held that a mortgage indemnity by the accused is valid. In United States v. Ryder, 110 U. S. 729, 28 L. ed. 308, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 196, the syllabus states that "without an express contract of indemnity, a surety on a recognizance for the appearance of a person charged with committing a criminal offense against the laws of the United States cannot maintain an action against the principal to recover any sums he may have been obliged to pay by reason of forfeiture of the principal, and he is not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the United States, and to enjoy the benefit of the government priority." It is true this precise question was not involved, but it was a question of subrogation. The court held that there is no implied promise or subrogation, but the syllabus imports that there may be an express contract to indemnify. The opinion clearly imports this. It refers approvingly to the Georgia case, and says that it accords with the English case of Cripps v. Hartnoll, 4 Best & S. 414, holding an express contract good. In Maloney v. Nelson, 144 N. Y. 182, 39 N. E. 82, was such a mortgage of indemnity. The syllabus says: "It seems that such a contract of indemnity is not void as against public policy." The opinion by Peckham, now Mr. Justice Peckham, says: "This leaves it unnecessary to consider the other defenses set up in the answer of the defendant Nelson, although we must say that the claim that the defendant's contract was void as against public policy does not impress us as being a good defense, at least in this state." In Moloney v. Nelson, 158 N. Y. 351, 53 N. E. 31, is a point in the syllabus reading thus: "Indemnifying bail in a criminal case is not contrary to the public policy of this state; and the fact that a bond and mortgage were given to indemnify bail does not writing for his appearance before court to answer the charge; subsequently an indictment was found, and the accused failing to appear, his recognizance was forfeited and suit was brought against him and his sureties; the complaint, after setting out the cause of action on the recognizance, contained averments to the effect that the accused had executed a deed of trust to secure his sureties, and prayed that this property might be applied to the debt due by the recognizance; the deed provided that, in case the recognizance should become forfeited, so that the sureties became liable thereon, then the trustee was to apply the property to the payment and extinguishment of the recognizance; and in case the property was not sufficient, then to pay as far as possible. The court, in sustaining a demurrer to this complaint, said: "The matters of this agreement had nothing to do with the liability of these sureties on this recognizance. Nor had the plaintiff any right to proceed in this action to subject this fund. Whether the sureties were liable or not could only be decided—as they contested their liability—by suit; and the deed provides this indemnity to secure them in case they be held liable. It may be that the sureties will not be held liable at all; or it may be, if they are, that they are ready and willing to pay whenever their liability is declared; and, in that case, there would be no necessity of coming upon this fund."

In Slater v. Jacobitz, 3 Colo. App. 127, 32 Pac. 184, a bond delivered to a surety on an appeal bond, given by the accused and another, conditional that "if the said . . . [accused] shall duly appear at the said term of said court, and answer the demand of the law thereat, then this obligation to be null and void, otherwise to remain in full force and effect," was held not to be an indemnifying bond, and a complaint based thereon did not state a cause of action.

render them void." The opinion refers to the claim by some that such a contract is void, and quotes with approval what Judge Peckham had said, above quoted, and went on to disapprove the claim that such a contract is void. When that case was in the appellate division, the court said that, "in view of the fact that contracts for the indemnity of sureties upon bail bonds have been frequently enforced in the courts, the fact that their validity has not been successfully attacked is of itself strong evidence that they have been presumed to be legal. In fact, there is no case holding that a contract made by a third party to indemnify a surety upon a recognizance is illegal, but all such contracts have been sustained. The only case in which there has been a suggestion that such contracts are invalid is where they have been made by the principal himself. It is not perceived that there is any valid distinction in principle between a contract made by the accused and one made by somebody else for his benefit, but nevertheless that distinction seems to exist in the books, and to result in contracts on the one hand being held valid, and on the other hand being disapproved." 12 App. Div. 548, 42 N. Y. Supp. 418. It is suggested that these New York cases are based on statute allowing an accused to deposit money instead of recognizance. How does that affect the question? Where that is the case, there is no surety to be made careless. How does that change the question of public policy in case there is a surety? The books say that whilst an indemnity given by an accused is bad, a friend may indemnify the bail. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 172. It is not easy to see why the bail is not made careless as well where the friend indemnifies as where the accused does. If such be law, this would not relieve Davis. This suit is against Davis. Does it make any difference that Sutton signed the bond? If Davis had given a bond, Sutton not joining, it would be binding according to the rule or exception just stated. I shall not review conflicting authorities. Judge Miller's dissent will well obviate that labor. I will remark, as to United States v. Simmons (C. C.) 14 L.R.A. 78, 47 Fed. 575, that the court had before it the question whether it would accept as surety a person who had taken indemnity. That was a matter within the court's discretion. The law allows bail. We may say that the law favors bail as a relief from prison in cases where bail is grantable, and it would tend to defeat this merciful provision of law if we should adopt the harsh rule that a man, perhaps innocent, cannot use his property to indemnify his friend to relieve him from prison bars. We do not see that the matter is so far against public policy as to impel us to adopt so severe a rule. Pingree on Suretyship and Guaranty (§ 416) says: "In view of the fact that contracts for the indemnity of sureties upon bail bond in criminal cases have been frequently enforced in the courts, it is strong evidence that they have been presumed, by the bar and bench, to be legal." So far as we know, the understanding of our state bar accords with this view. We think such indemnity contracts are often made in West Virginia.

Is it seriously suggested that Carr cannot sue in equity before payment of the recognizance debt by him? The bond of indemnity is a contract liability which would support such suit. But there is the award of execution against Carr on the recognizance. That fixes a debt and liability. In case of a bond to indemnify, that judgment is conclusive of liability and binding on Davis. See cases as to effect of judgment upon indemnitor in a bond of indemnity to indemnify against a judgment against indemnitee in State use of Beard v. Abbott, 63 W. Va. 189, 61 S. E. 369. This bond was to indemnify Carr against a judgment or award of execution on the recognizance. It could have no other meaning, and in such case the cases say that the judgment or award of execution fixes the debt. State v. Nutter, 44 W. Va. 388, 30 S. E. 67; 7 Rob. Pr. 150; Robinson v. Baskins, 53 Ark. 330, 22 Am. St. Rep. 203, 14 S. W. 93. "A bond to save harmless against judgment is broken the moment a judgment is recorded against the obligee" (16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 177), even though by default; payment not necessary (4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 695). Having thus a demand, Carr can go into equity to set aside a fraudulent conveyance. Our fraudulent conveyance statute (Code 1899, chap. 74, § 9 [Code 1906, § 3107]) says that anyone is a "creditor" under it who, but for the bad deed, would have right to subject the property. The statute "embraces all who have a valid cause of action." 1 Moore, Fraudulent Conveyances, p. 198. "Under this statute any creditor at large of the fraudulent debtor, without respect to the form or character of the debt, may maintain a suit to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent as to him, even though the claim be an unliquidated one, founded upon no certainty as to the amount of the damages claimed; as, for instance, damages for a breach of promise to marry." Hogg, Equity Principles, § 183. We find in 20 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 421, this: "Existing creditors are, as the words imply, persons having subsisting obligations against the debtor at the time the fraudulent alienation was made or the secret trust created, although their claims may not have matured or been reduced to judgment until after such conveyance. A contingent liability is as fully protected against fraudulent and voluntary conveyances as a claim certain and absolute; and whoever has a claim or demand arising out of a pre-existing contract, although it may be contingent, is a creditor whose rights are affected by such conveyances, and can avoid them when the contingency happens upon which the claim depends." "If A. gives a mortgage to C. to indemnify C. against his indorsement for A., a bill of quia timet may be brought by C. against A.'s representatives for a decree that they shall pay B. and indemnify C. against his indorsement." Call v. Scott, 4 Call, 402, cited in Bird v. Stout, 40 W. Va. 47, 20 S. E. 852. A principal undertakes to indemnify his surety by payment. So does one who undertakes to indemnify a bail in a recognizance. Both stand alike as to the right to call on the principal or indemnitor to pay to the relief of the surety and indemnitee. It is thoroughly settled that a surety may, before payment, in equity compel the principal to pay in exoneration. It is believed that the law cited in Neal v. Buffington, 42 W. Va. 327, 26 S. E. 172, will verify the above proposition. Such is the general law. 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 475. It is also clear that equity will place a liability where it ultimately rests.

We reverse the decree, overrule the demurrer, and remand the case.

Miller, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the opinion of the majority. The grounds of demurrer relied on are that the bond of indemnity is void: First, because against public policy; second, want of consideration and want of mutuality; third, because the plaintiff's bill fails to show plaintiff has been unable, by the use of the means prescribed, to procure the appearance of the prisoner in court in discharge of his recognizance, or that he, being solvent, is able to pay, or has paid, the execution awarded against him, and thereby sustained any actual loss or damages; and, fourth, because the liability, if any, of R. C. Davis, on said bond, is not a debt within the meaning of §§ 3099 and 3100, Code 1906.

Is the bond void on grounds of public policy, or want of consideration? If it is, it will not be necessary to consider any other questions argued, for then the entire foundation for the suit fails, and the other questions cannot be said to fairly arise. The question has never been decided by this court, and but few cases have been cited or found by us from other courts in which the question has arisen and been passed upon. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

It is conceded that the effect of a bail bond is to transfer the legal custody of the prisoner from the state to the bail, with power to arrest, or cause his arrest and delivery to the lawful authorities at any time, whether within or without the jurisdiction of the court, in discharge of his recognizance. Chapter 156, Code 1906, particularly § 8 thereof; 5 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 126-128; Re Von Der Ahe (C. C.) 85 Fed. 959. The primary object of a bail bond in a criminal case is not to secure to the state the payment of the penalty in the bond, but the presence of the prisoner, that he may receive the judgment of the court on his guilt or innocence, and, if guilty, the punishment which the law imposes. The obligation of the bail is to accomplish this, and to this end he will be subrogated to the rights of the state to take out all proper process, but not to any of its rights to recover the penalty of the bond. United States v. Ryder, 110 U. S. 729, 28 L. ed. 308, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 196. In view of this relationship of duty and obligation of bail and principal it has been held that there is no implied promise of principal to bail to answer an action against him to recover the penalty incurred by his default, although such action might be maintained on such implied promise to recover costs incurred by the bail. Highmore, Bail, 204; Fisher v. Fallows, 5 Esp. 171; Jones v. Orchard, 16 C. B. 614; Cripps v. Hartnoll, 4 Best & S. 414,—all cited in United States v. Ryder, supra.

There is no doubt, however, that, as a general rule, a principal may lawfully indemnify his surety against loss by the conveyance of property except in cases of criminal arrest. 1 Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 240. But when we come to the question of the legality of a bond or other contract of indemnity given by principal to bail on a criminal case, a different question is presented. In 2 Brandt on Suretyship & Guaranty, § 610, it is said: "If a party accused of crime, in order to induce another to become his bail, gives such other a mortgage for his indemnity, the mortgage will be valid for that purpose." But, as this writer acknowledges, this doctrine is based principally on Simpson v. Robert, 35 Ga. 180, in which case the court replied to the argument based on public policy: "We are not prepared to sustain this doctrine. That a principal should, in case of default, not indemnify his bail against the effects of his forfeiture or failure to attend and answer for the crime, has never been doubted by anybody, and no authority is offered to support the position." Mr. Brandt says, however, in the same connection: "While the foregoing is fully borne out by the Georgia case cited, decided in 1866, the editor of this edition considers it more than doubtful, in view of later decisions that are also referred to in the note." And this case, he says in the note, "cites no authority." In Ratcliffe v. Smith, 13 Bush. 172, the principal was indicted for horse stealing, and, to obtain bail and his release, conveyed land to his bail absolutely, in consideration that he might leave the state, and fail to answer the charge against him; and, in a suit to have the deed declared a mortgage, the court dismissed the bill on the ground that the contract was illegal and against public policy. Herman v. Jeuchner, L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 561, decided in 1885, involving a deposit of money with the surety, holds the same doctrine, overruling Wilson v. Strugnell, L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 548. In the earlier case of Jones v. Orchard, 16 C. B. 614, 623, decided in 1855, this doctrine is practically affirmed, for the English court there says: "It is unnecessary to decide that point on the present occasion, although we are inclined to think the objection well founded, and that such a contract would be contrary to public policy." The point actually ruled in that case was that an action by bail against principal in an estreated recognizance, for the payment of the prosecutor's costs, would lie upon an implied indemnity. In Cripps v. Hartnoll, supra, the plaintiff, at the request of defendant, and on his promise of indemnity, became bail for the appearance of his daughter, charged with crime, and, on her default, sued defendant on his promise. The precise point decided was that such a promise of indemnity was not a "special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriages of another person," and therefore not within § 4 of the statute of frauds, 29 Car. II. chap. 3. The court below had decided this case on the authority of Green v. Cresswell, 10 Ad. & El. 453, holding in effect that, in order to bring a case within said provision of the statute, "the debt or default in respect of which the promise is made must be towards the promisee." "But," says the court, by Pollock, C. B., "there is a great distinction between that case and the present. Here the bail was given in a criminal proceeding; and, where bail is given in such a proceeding, there is no contract on the part of the person bailed to indemnify the person who became bail for him. There is no debt, and, with respect to the person who bails, there is hardly a duty; and it may very well be that the promise to indemnify the bail in a criminal matter should be considered purely as an indemnity, which it has been decided to be. . . . A mere promise of indemnity is not within the statute of frauds." And, in the same 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) case, Williams, J., says: "Whether, in a case where the plaintiff becomes bail for a stranger in a civil suit, there is a duty, as between the defendant in the action and the surety, that he will render or pay the debt, so as to reconcile the case of Green v. Cresswell with the doctrine that the statute applies only to promises made to a person for whom another is answerable, I think that, where bail is given in a criminal suit, there is certainly no debt or duty which can be considered as due to the surety from the party on whose behalf the recognizance is given." This decision is applicable, it is true, to the case where the bail was procured on the promise of a third person, and not by the principal himself. But, in a note to this case, Mr. Parsons, editor, by reference to several decisions of the courts of this country, regards it as having gone too far in holding there is no privity of contract of indemnity, primary, and not collateral to the principal undertaking, with respect, at least, to the application of the statute of frauds thereto.

But to return to the particular question, viz., the invalidity of an express contract of indemnity. It is argued that, whatever may be the law of the contract as between principal and bail, in a criminal case, where there is no express contract, the liability is complete where there is such express contract, as held in the Georgia case. It is claimed that United States v. Ryder, supra, recognizes this to be the law, unaffected by any considerations of public policy; it being there held that, without such express contract, the surety cannot maintain an action against his principal to recover money which he has been obliged to pay by reason of the forfeiture of the principal, thereby holding, it is argued, by implication, that, where there is such express contract, the converse of the proposition would be equally true. That was a case in which the bail, under the provisions of a Federal statute, sought to be subrogated to the right of the government to enforce payment of the penalty out of the estate of the principal in the hands of a third person; and it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to such relief. The court, denying the relief, says: "The object of bail in civil cases is, either directly or indirectly, to secure the payment of a debt or other civil duty; whilst the object of bail in criminal cases is to secure the appearance of the principal before the court for the purposes of public justice. Payment by the bail in a civil case discharges the obligation of the principal to his creditor, and is only required to the extent of that obligation, whatever may be the penalty of the bond or recognizance; whilst payment by the bail of their recognizance in criminal cases, though it discharges the bail, does not discharge the obligation of the principal to appear in court. That obligation still remains, and the principal may, at any time, be retaken and brought into court. To enable the bail, however, to escape the payment of their recognizance by performing that which the recognizance bound them to do, the government will lend them its aid in every proper way, by process and without process, to seize the person of the principal and compel his appearance. This is the kind of subrogation which exists in criminal cases, namely, subrogation to the means of enforcing the performance of the thing which the recognizance of bail is intended to secure the performance of, and not subrogation to the peculiar remedies which the government may have for collecting the penalty; for this would be to aid the bail to get rid of their obligation, and to relieve them from the motives to exert themselves in securing the appearance of the principal. Subrogation to the latter remedies would clearly be against public policy, by subverting, as far as it might prove effectual, the very object and purpose of the recognizance. It would be as though the government should say to the bail, 'We will aid you to get the amount of your recognizance from the principal, so that you may be relieved from your obligation to surrender him to justice.' In this case, as said in 2 Brandt on Suretyship & Guaranty, § 610, note 9, "the court . . . relied upon the English case of Cripps v. Hartnoll, . . . in which A.'s express promise to indemnify B. against loss through B.'s becoming surety on the criminal bail bond of C. was enforced, and seemed to take it for granted that an express promise to indemnify criminal bail was not against public policy. The question of public policy does not seem to have been fully argued,"—which is true. If the right of subrogation, claimed in United States v. Ryder, was properly denied on principles of public policy,—the real point adjudicated in that case,—we do not perceive why the court, on like principle, should not also deny any relief for the enforcement of an express contract of indemnity, designed, or the effect of which would be, to relieve the bail from the performance of the principal obligation of his recognizance. Such relief was denied, on this ground, in the English case of Herman v. Jeuchner and Ratcliffe v. Smith, supra; and, while Jones v. Orchard sustained a right of action for costs incurred on an implied indemnity, the case otherwise sustains the doctrine of Herman v. Jeuchner. Nor do I think Cripps v. Hartnoll, relied on by the Supreme Court in United States 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Ryder, opposed to this view, for the point, not having been presented, was not directly adjudicated in that case. Moreover, in the case of United States v. Simmons (C. C.) 14 L.R.A. 78, 47 Fed. 575, Benedict, circuit judge, after a review of Herman v. Jeuchner, and some of the cases just referred to, declined, on grounds of public policy, to accept as bail persons indemnified beforehand by the principal.

United States v. Greene (C. C. W. D. Va.) 163 Fed. 442, decided in July last, involved the exact point presented here. The court says: "The reason why there is no implied obligation on the part of a principal in a bail bond in a criminal case to indemnify his surety is that such a contract is against public policy in that it 'gives the public the security of one person only instead of two.' As applied to an express contract by the principal to indemnify his surety (and as distinguished from a contract by a third person to indemnify the surety), it seems to me that the reason for the rule operates quite as strongly to invalidate such express contract as it does to deny the existence of an implied contract. An express contract by the principal in a bail bond in a criminal case, to indemnify his surety, at least as certainly gives the public the security of only one person, instead of two, as would an implied contract to such effect." The court, in that case, besides some of the cases already referred to by us, cites 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 172, and 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 684. In § 684 this authority says: "For obvious reasons of public policy the law will not imply an obligation, nor will it enforce an express agreement, on the part of the principal, to indemnify his bail against the amount of the penalty incurred by his default." If because the public will be deprived of two sureties instead of one be the correct reason for the rule that the law will not imply an obligation on the part of principal to bail, and will hold his express contract of indemnity void, as held in United States v. Greene, will not the state as surely be deprived of such double security where the indemnity is by a third person? It is only because the bail is indemnified, and is no longer bound, for his own protection, to bring in his principal, that it can be said the public has been deprived of one of its sureties; and is he not as surely indemnified where his contract is with a third person as with the principal in the recognizance? What possible difference can it make to the bail how or by whom he is indemnified? The bond in the case at bar is the bond of the principal in the recognizance, and falls directly within the rule stated. True, there are sureties in the bond; but, if void as to the principal, is not the bond void also as to the sureties? If the law will relieve the principal in the bond for reasons rendering it void as to him in its very inception, it will surely not hold the sureties. 1 Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 163. The cases, which recognize this distinction all refer it to Cripps v. Hartnoll, supra, where the question of public policy was not even mooted, certainly not decided. Look at the situation here. The bail is seeking to charge the property of a surety in an indemnifying bond, not binding on the principal, for the amount of the judgment against him on his recognizance of bail. He did not allege or prove that he had been unable, by the use of the means which the law provides for his own protection, to recapture his principal and bring him into court. Can it be law that bail, thus in default, can cast the loss on sureties in an indemnifying bond? Principles of natural justice would seem to forbid it.

My conclusion, based on reason and authority, is that the contract of indemnity involved in this case is illegal and void, and that a court of equity should afford the plaintiff no relief.

I need not respond to any of the other points presented in argument; for, no matter what the rights of the plaintiff therein might be when involved in the enforcement of a legal contract, they cannot avail him in a case of this kind.

I would affirm the decree below.

Robinson, J., dissenting:

Public policy and the law demand a different decision. The poorest man, if honest, can find bail. The richest man, for whom those knowing him would not vouch without indemnity, should not be allowed to furnish bail by virtually purchasing it. The mere fact that indemnity is furnished indicates that confidence is not reposed. Bail is a matter of confidence and personal relation. It should not be made a matter of contract or commercialism. Our statute law does not even imply that one may become surety for himself on recognizance to appear and answer a criminal charge. Upholding indemnity, in any form, under contract, implied or express, in effect allows one to be his own surety for his appearance. Thus, he or his friends may buy his freedom from answering the law. This was never contemplated. And we should not permit it to be contemplated now that the question is one of the first instance here. Why provide for a bail piece, intended to promote justice, and then destroy its 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

effect and utility? Why open the door to barter freedom from the law for money?

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

MARY BEAVER et al., Appts.,
v.

GEORGE ROSS, Sheriff of Dallas County, et al.

(— Iowa, —, 118 N. W. 287.)

Equitable conversion — devise — when effected.

1. A devise of land to testator's wife for life with directions to sell it at her death, and out of the proceeds pay a certain amount to a certain person, and divide the remainder among testator's children, effects a conversion of the property as of the time of the testator's death; and judgments against the child before sale is actually effected will not create a lien on his interest in the property as testator's heir.

Fraud — burden of proof.

2. A judgment creditor of a legatee, who attempts to set aside an assignment of the legacy as in fraud of his rights, has the burden of showing the fraud.

(November 17, 1908.)

Case Note. — As of what time does conversion take place under a direction to sell real property, which postpones the sale to a definitely ascertainable time subsequent to the testator's death.

Although in some jurisdictions—especially in New York—the decisions appear to be in some confusion, the doctrine seems to be generally accepted that, unless to do so will clearly defeat the intention of the testator, or result in the evasion of some rule of law, a gift of the proceeds of a sale directed to be made will be regarded as a gift of personalty, even though the actual conversion of the property into personalty is definitely postponed till some future time.

This rule is, of course, subject to the qualification that the direction to sell must be positive, neither making the sale optional with the parties, nor leaving it to the discretion of those intrusted with its execution. This is apparent in the case of Keller v. Harper, 64 Md. 74, 1 Atl. 65, in which it was held that, where a testator gave his wife all of his estate for life or during widowhood, authorizing a sale of any part thereof during her lifetime with her consent, and finally provided that, after the death or marriage of his wife, his real estate not otherwise disposed of should be sold, and the money or proceeds arising therefrom should form and be a part of his estate generally, for distribution amongst his children, there was no such absolute and imperative order and direction for the conversion of the land into money, the time when, and the conditions or contingencies upon which, the sale or sales may or must be made being so uncertain that the court must have great doubt that the conversion operated from the death of the testator, and must therefore conclude that, as to the property which was sold prior to the decease of the life tenant, the conversion took place at the time of sale, and, as to the property sold after the death of the widow, the conversion was at the time of her decease; and that therefore the interest of one of such children predeceasing the widow must be regarded as realty.

Such of the cases herein included as do not follow the principle above stated either carry their own explanation, or may be regarded as based on a misapprehended precedent, or on some loosely framed statement having reference to an actual, and not an equitable, conversion.

It should be noted that the doctrine of equitable conversion is not a fixed rule of law, but proceeds upon equitable principles, so that its application will be somewhat affected by the connection in which it is invoked. With this in view, as well as for convenience in reference, the following cases have been grouped so far as possible with regard to the ultimate question involved.

In determining rights to testator's realty, as such.

In Massey v. Modawell, 73 Ala. 421, it was held that the equitable conversion of real and personal property effected by a direction that, when the testator's youngest child should become of age, or marry, the entire property, real and personal, should be sold and converted into money, could not and did not take effect until, by the terms of the will, the land could be sold; but till then it was realty, with all the rights and incidents which attach to the lands, and the title was in the heirs by descent; and that therefore such heirs, before the land is sold under the power in the will or claimed for sale, have a remedy at law and no right or 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) pretense for going into equity to recover the possession of lands sold by the executor without authority, before the time fixed by the will.

The force of this decision is, however, carefully limited in Allen v. Watts, 98 Ala. 384, 11 So. 646, where it is said that the expressions used in the opinion in that case which apparently support the proposition that, when land is directed to be sold and converted into money at some future time, there is no equitable conversion until the arrival of the time when the sale and conversion shall actually take place, are to be referred to the matter then in hand; and that the court should be understood as asserting that a conversion of the entire estate in the land could not and did not take effect while a term was outstanding which was not within the influence of the direction to convert; that the character of the interest of the children in the remainder was not determined, but only their equitable right to the present possession of the land was denied.

In Savage v. Burnham, 17 N. Y. 561, an amicable suit brought to obtain a judicial construction of a will, it was said that the doctrine of equitable conversion must be taken with the qualification that the change does not take place in theory until the period arrives or event occurs when the conversion ought to be made; so that, in the present case, the real estate was to be sold and the proceeds to become personalty after the decease of the testator's widow, and not before. The point actually decided, however, is that, during the life of the widow, the trustees to whom the testator had devised his entire estate upon trust to hold during the life of the widow, and apply the rents and profits as directed, and at her death to sell the real estate and apply the proceeds to a fund for the distribution of which among the testator's children and grandchildren provision was made, held the land as land.

In Shumway v. Harmon, 6 Thomp. & C. 626, it was held, in determining the right to the rents and profits of real estate directed to be sold after a year and a half, that such property must be considered as converted into money, and to have become personal estate in the hands of the executors as of the date when the sale was to take place.

In Lydon v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 7 Misc. 25, 27 N. Y. Supp. 311, in denying the right of the persons entitled to the proceeds of a sale directed upon the death of a life tenant to maintain an action to enjoin the maintenance and operation of an elevated railroad in front of the premises, and for damages, it was said that, where there is a direction for a future conversion of real property into personalty, the property is not deemed to be converted until the time of its conversion as indicated by the testator has arrived.

In Eisner v. Curiel, 2 App. Div. 522, 37 N. Y. Supp. 1119, in which the question was as to the proper parties to a partition action, it was held that the interest of the beneficiaries among whom the proceeds of certain premises, which were to be sold upon the death of the survivor of certain persons to whom they were devised during their joint lives and during the lifetime of the survivor, were to be distributed, was not in the realty, but in the personalty resulting from the equitable conversion; and that it made no difference that the conversion was deferred until the determination of the life estates.

In Hodges's Estate, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 283, where a testator gave a life estate to his wife, and, after her death, authorized the sale of all his estate, it was held, in determining the disposition to be made of a void bequest, that the conversion would be held to take place as of the death of testator.

In Leiper v. Thomson, 60 Pa. 177, in which the question was as to the validity of the title acquired by a purchaser at sheriff's sale on a judgment obtained against the administrator c. t. a. without joining the widow and heirs, it was held that, where a testator devised his real estate to trustees to sell when all his children became of age, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) and to divide the proceeds among his wife and children, such direction to sell operated as an equitable conversion of the realty into personalty; and any delay or postponement of the period of actual conversion would not change the principle.

So, also, in Ramsey v. Hanlon, 33 Fed. 425, where a testator, after devising his real estate to his wife for life, directed a sale and distribution of the proceeds, it was held that the principle of equitable conversion applied, notwithstanding the period of sale was remote; and that therefore a valid title was acquired by the purchaser at sheriff's sale under a judgment against the executrix, without joining the heirs or devisees or warning them by scire facias.

In determining capacity of beneficiaries.

In Iglehart v. Iglehart, 26 App. D. C. 209, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 732, affirmed in 204 U. S. 478, 51 L. ed. 575, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 329, where the validity of a devise to a cemetery corporation for the care of a burial lot was under consideration, it was held that such devise, which was of real property directed to be sold upon the death of the life tenants, was to be considered as one of personalty; the court saying that the authorities are quite well agreed that such express direction of sale, though the time of sale is not immediate, operates to convert the property into personalty from the death of the testator.

In Meakings v. Cromwell, 5 N. Y. 136, it was held that, where a testator gave his wife the rents of certain lands for life, directing that after her death they should be sold, and the proceeds divided among certain persons, the latter gift was one of money, and not of land, and therefore valid though the beneficiaries were aliens.

In determining validity of testamentary disposition.

The cases are unanimous in declaring that realty will not be regarded as converted into personalty before the time appointed for its

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In November of the year 1898 F. E. Collins and S. M. Leach obtained judgments against Jacob H. Beaver, and in January of the year 1899 the Dallas County Savings Bank also obtained a judgment against him. These judgments were rendered by the Dallas county district court, and were properly made of record and duly indexed. In July of the year 1899 Israel Beaver died seized of the real estate in controversy, and, by his will, devised a life estate in the property to his wife, Elizabeth, and then provided that, "at the death of my wife, Elizabeth Beaver, the real estate and all the personal property still remaining shall be sold. Of the proceeds of the sale the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars shall be set aside and reasonably invested, the income derived from the same to be devoted to the support and maintenance of my son James M. Beaver for his life. At his death the said twenty-five hundred dollars and any accrued interest to be equally divided among the

In Williams v. Conrad, 30 Barb. 524, where the validity of a trust involving a suspension of the power of alienation was in question, the testator directed the sale of all his property after his children should be of full age and after the death of his wife, and a division of the proceeds among the children; and it was said: "There is no ground upon which the real estate can be considered as converted into money from the death of the testator. Such conversion is not called for by the will, and would be inconsistent with the plain intention of the testator. He did not desire or intend his property to be sold until after the death of his widow, and after his children were all of full age."

In Gano v. McCunn, 56 How. Pr. 337, it was held that the provision of a will directing a sale and devise of testator's estate at the end of six years could not be upheld, as against the statute in relation to the suspension of the power of alienation, by a resort to the doctrine of equitable conversion, as the rule of equitable conversion of real into personal, or personal into real, estate, does not operate until the time arises when the conversion is directed to take place.

In Trowbridge v. Metcalf, 5 App. Div. 318, 39 N. Y. Supp. 241, affirmed without opinion in 158 N. Y. 682, 52 N. E. 1126, in which the doctrine of equitable conversion was invoked to protect a provision directing the sale of lands five years after testator's death from the operation of the rule limiting the suspension of the power of alienation, it was held that as, by the express provisions of the will, such sales could not be made until after the expiration of five years, during those five years there is no equitable conversion, and the property remains real estate; and the devise must be considered as a devise of real estate, and not of personal property.

In DeWolf v. Lawson, 61 Wis. 469, 50 Am. Rep. 148, 21 N. W. 615, it was held that, where a testator directed his executor to rent certain real estate and divide the net 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) income therefrom between two religious societies each and every year for twenty years, and, at the expiration of twenty years, to sell such real estate and pay the proceeds to the then living children of testator's daughter, such provision could not be sustained, as against the statute relating to the suspension of the power of alienation, upon the theory that the real estate of the testator must be deemed as equitably converted into personalty at his death, as the testator clearly did not contemplate a conversion before the time directed.

In determining quantum of interest taken.

In Vogt v. Vogt, 26 App. D. C. 46, where the question was as to whether a beneficiary under the residuary clause of the will took an absolute estate by virtue of the rule in Shelley's Case, it was said that, where the will directed a sale of the residuary estate when testator's youngest surviving child should attain the age of twenty-one years, or one year thereafter, the real estate, having been directed to be converted into money, is to be regarded as if it were money at the time of the testator's death.

In determining mode of transfer of legatee's interest.

In Miller v. Payne, 28 App. D. C. 396, in determining the effect of the conveyance by a beneficiary before actual conversion, it was held that the provision of the will that property should be sold one year after the death of the testatrix, and the proceeds divided between her children, operated as an equitable conversion.

In Mellon v. Reed, 123 Pa. 1, 15 Atl. 906, where the question was as to the validity of a parol transfer of a distributee's interest, it was held that, where a direction to sell real estate for the purpose of distribution became absolute at the death of testator's widow, there was an equitable conversion of such realty into personalty.

In Howell v. Mellon, 189 Pa. 169, 42 Atl. 6, it was held that, where a will directed a sale of realty at the death of the widow, and division of the proceeds among the heirs hereinafter named. After setting aside of the said sum of twenty-five hundred dollars, all of the remainder of the proceeds of the said sale shall be equally divided between my children and heirs to wit: Jacob H. Beaver, Willard Beaver, Thomas Beaver and Mary E. Myers or their children. I hereby appoint Jacob H. Beaver, my executor to carry into effect the provisions of this my last will."

The widow died February 28, 1907, and, on June 1, 1907, executions were issued upon the aforesaid judgments, which, on the same day, were levied upon the interest of Jacob H. Beaver in the premises in controversy acquired under the will. On July 1, 1907, Jacob H. Beaver, as executor of the will, was also garnished under these executions.

children, from the date of testator's death, as between the children, it was personalty, and might be conveyed by them with such formalities only as are necessary in passing title to personalty.

But in Bank of Ukiah v. Rice, 143 Cal. 265, 101 Am. St. Rep. 118, 78 Pac. 1020, it is said that the provision of Civil Code, § 1338, that the proceeds of the sale of land directed to be sold must be deemed personal property "from the time of the testator's death," is applicable only when the will merely directs the sale to be made, without limiting or designating the time at which it is to be made; but that, if the will postpones the time of the sale until the happening of some future event or until some fixed date, the conversion is likewise postponed, and there can be no conversion until the executor shall have the power to make the sale. The ultimate decision in the case was that the foreclosure of the mortgage made by one of the beneficiaries of his interest in the land passed his interest therein, and in the proceeds of a sale thereof, in case the power of sale should be subsequently executed; but that the purchaser was not entitled to a partition thereof.

In determining rights of legatee's creditors.

Although they are agreed that a creditor cannot take real estate, as real estate, so as to defeat an execution of the power of sale, the cases seem to be at variance as to whether, with respect to the character of the creditor's remedy, the legatee's interest before the time when actual conversion can take place is to be regarded as realty or personalty. The view that the legatee is to be regarded as having a vested interest in the realty subject to be divested by the execution of the power of sale seems neither to be considered by the courts adopting it as conflicting, nor necessarily to conflict with the application of the doctrine of equitable conversion (which, as hereinbefore noted, is not a rigid rule, but a fiction adopted in the furtherance of justice) in determining the character of the legatee's interest for

To restrain the sale of the land under the executions, and to clear the title of all clouds resulting therefrom, this action was brought by Mary Beaver, the wife of Jacob H., and by Jacob H., as executor, and it is claimed that Mary Beaver took by assignment from Jacob some time in the year 1899 whatever interest he (Jacob) had in or to the lands in controversy or their proceeds; and that this assignment was verbal and made before the levy upon the land, or the garnishment of the executor. In their answer defendants claim that the interest which Jacob H. Beaver took under the will of his father was real property, and that the lien of their judgments attached thereto immediately upon the death of the father; that the real estate has never been converted into other purposes. The question touched upon will not be here treated in detail, and the cases following are not to be taken as exhausting the subject.

In Darst v. Swearingen, 224 Ill. 229, 115 Am. St. Rep. 152, 79 N. E. 635, it was held that, where a testator, after giving his wife a life estate in certain real property, directed it to be sold within two years after her death and the proceeds equally divided among his children, the interest of one of such children during the widow's lifetime is not real estate subject to levy and sale by judgment creditors, but personal property,—citing Baker v. Copenbarger, 15 Ill. 103, 58 Am. Dec. 600; Ebey v. Adams, 135 Ill. 80, 10 L.R.A. 162, 25 N. E. 1013; English v. Cooper, 183 Ill. 203, 55 N. E. 687; Starr v. Willoughby, 218 Ill. 485, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 623, 75 N. E. 1029.

In Morrow v. Brenizer, 2 Rawle, 185, where a testator directed the sale of his property after the decease of his wife and a division of the proceeds among his children, it was held that a sheriff's sale under a judgment against one of the children passed no title.

In Jones v. Caldwell, 97 Pa. 42, it was held that an absolute direction to sell lands after the death of the testator's widow, and to divide the proceeds among his children, effects an equitable conversion thereof into personalty; and the interest of one of the children is not bound, as real estate, by a judgment against him before a sale.

In Rowland v. Miller, 100 Pa. 47, it was held that, where a testatrix did not devise her real estate as realty, but directed the distribution of its proceeds, and prohibited any sales for ten years after her decease, unless the executors should deem it advantageous or advisable, the persons entitled to the proceeds have no interest in the real estate as such, or upon which a judgment would become a lien.

But in Wilson v. Rudd, 19 Ind. 101, and Simonds v. Harris, 92 Ind. 505, it is held that the interest of a child under a will which, after giving lands to the testator's wife for life, directed that at her death they should be sold and the proceeds equally personalty; that, if it had been so converted, their garnishments are superior to the alleged assignment to Mary H. Beaver; and that the assignment, even if one were made, is fraudulent and void, because it was executed with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of Jacob H. Beaver, and especially the defendants, who hold the judgments hitherto mentioned. A demurrer to the answer setting up the facts above recited was overruled, to which ruling exception was taken. These demurrers were bottomed upon the proposition that Jacob H. Beaver had no such interest in the real estate in controversy as was subject to levy or sale. It will be observed that, if Jacob H. Beaver took an interest in real estate under the will of his father, and that this interest was subject to levy and sale, the decree of the trial court is undoubtedly correct, for the lien of the judgments attached immediately upon the death of the father, or, in any event, upon the death of the mother, and the assignment under which plaintiff Mary Beaver claims would be junior and inferior to the levy of the executions. On the other hand, if the interest which Jacob H. took under the will is personal in character, the assignment thereof to Mary H. Beaver would be superior to any lien or interest acquired under the levy of the executions, whether by garnishment or otherwise, unless the sheriff or the plaintiffs in execution show that the assignment was fraudulent as to them.

The first question in the case is the nature divided among the children, was liable before its actual conversion to attachment and to sale under execution; and that the creditor thereby became entitled to the child's share of the proceeds of the sale.

And in Williams v. Lobban, 206 Mo. 399, 104 S. W. 58, it was held that, where a testator devised all his property to his wife during life or widowhood, directing it, upon her death or marriage, to be sold and divided among the children, one of such children had an interest in the real estate which was subject to attachment and sale; and that his interest therein passed by the deed under those proceedings.

So, also, in Sayles v. Best, 140 N. Y. 368, 35 N. E. 636, it was held that, where a testator gave his executors power to sell real estate after the expiration of a life estate, or when the youngest child should become of age, directing the division of the proceeds equally among his legal heirs, a creditor recovering a judgment against one of such heirs before the time arrived when the power might be executed, acquired a lien upon his interest, which followed and attached to his interest in the proceeds. The court said: "It has been urged by the respondents' counsel that, by the execution of the power of sale, the land was converted into personalty, and the legal title of the heir was thereby divested and defeated, and that the legal title and estate of the heir failing, the lien of the judgment must fall with it. That would necessarily be the result where the heir and the distributee of the proceeds under the will are different persons; but, where they are the same person, another rule, we think must prevail. The conversion of the realty into personalty proceeds upon equitable principles. While the change in the quality of the property is made in accordance with the will of the testator, equity requires that the intervening rights of purchasers and lienors shall be protected."

In determining devolution of legatee's interest.

The greater number of decisions involving the point under discussion arise in this connection. (L.R.A. (N.S.)

section, and declare, almost without exception, that the legatee's interest will in such case be regarded as one in personalty, in the absence of any expressed contrary intention on the part of the testator.

In High v. Worley, 33 Ala. 196, in considering the rights of one claiming by devolution through a legatee, it was held that, where a testator had directed that the land should be retained by the executor for the use and support of his wife and children until his daughter should attain the age of sixteen, and that it should then be sold and the proceeds equally divided between his wife and children, share and share alike, the postponement of the sale did not prevent the operation of the principle of equity jurisprudence that the court of chancery will consider land directed to be sold and conveyed into money as money.

In Allen v. Watts, 98 Ala. 384, 11 So. 646, in which the question was as to whether the will of a child who had died before actual conversion was effectual to pass his interest under the will of his father, who had given real estate to his wife for life, to be sold at her death and the proceeds equally divided among the children, it was held that that interest or estate in the land which the father's will required absolutely and without contingency to be sold and converted into money which was to be paid to certain beneficiaries was, for the purpose of that provision, to be considered as money from the date of the testator's death; and that it was none the less a gift of personal property from the beginning because there was a postponement of the time when the legatees would come into the enjoyment of the legacies.

In Re Stevenson, 2 Del. Ch. 197, it was held that, where a will provided for the sale of property after the decease of testator's wife; there was an equitable conversion thereof from the death of the testator, so that the shares of beneficiaries who had died before actual conversion took place would pass as personal estate to their executors or administrators.

In Rumsey v. Durham, 5 Ind. 71, it was held that, where a testator, after giving his of the interest which Jacob H. Beaver took under the will of his father. It will be noticed that no trustees are named in the will in whom the title might rest. A life estate is given the wife, Elizabeth, and it is then provided that the real estate shall be sold, $2,500 of the proceeds set aside for the support and maintenance of one of the children, and the remainder thereof divided among five other children, naming them. Jacob H. Beaver was appointed as executor to carry into effect the provisions of the will. On the one hand, it is contended that Jacob H. Beaver took one fifth in fee of the land, subject to the life estate of the mother and its proportion of the $2,500 which was to be set aside upon the death of Elizabeth for the use and benefit of James H. Beaver; while, on the other, it is contended that, under the doctrine of equitable conversion, the interest which Jacob H. Beaver took under the will was and is personal in character, that this was assigned to Mary H. Beaver before the levies of any of the executions, and that her right thereto is prior and superior to the garnishments. "Equitable conversion" is defined as a constructive alteration in the nature of property by which in equity real estate is regarded as personalty or personal estate as realty. It grows out of the old equitable maxim that "Equity regards that done which ought to be done." It has been adopted for the purpose of executing trusts, and it is essential to the application of the doctrine that the property should be subject to a trust or imperative direction for wife the use and benefit of his entire estate during widowhood, directed that, after her death or marriage, all his property should be sold and equally divided among his children, the direction to sell was; in effect, a conversion of the land into personalty; and the distribution of the testator's gift to his children should be governed by the same rule as if the donation in the first instance had been money.

In Nelson v. Nelson, 36 Ind. App. 331, 75 N. E. 679, in determining the interest of a deceased beneficiary's husband, it was held that, where a testator made it obligatory on his executor at the death of the life tenant to convert all of his estate then remaining into money, an equitable conversion took place at the time of his death, and was not postponed by the fact that the land was not to be sold until after the death of the life tenant.

In Rawlings v. Landes, 2 Bush, 158, it was held that, where a testator devised certain property to his widow for life, and directed it, at her death, to be sold and the proceeds to be divided among his children and grandchildren, the interest taken by a child was to be regarded as a money bequest to which her surviving husband became entitled on her decease.

In Hocker v. Gentry, 3 Met. (Ky.) 463, where a testator directed the sale of slaves when his youngest child should attain the age of twenty-one years, and a division of the proceeds among the children, and the question was whether the right of a child who had died before the time of sale arrived was to be regarded as a right to the slaves or to their proceeds, it was said that it has been frequently decided that, if the direction to sell is positive, the right of the legatee will, in equity, be regarded as a right to money from the time of the testator's death, though the period of sale is remote, and the conversion cannot be made till the time arrives.

In Goldsmith v. Cone, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 520, it was held that, where a testatrix devised her estate to her husband for life, directing a sale thereof for the purpose of distribution after his death, she intended money to be divided; and it was, in equity, a bequest of personalty, and not a devise of land, so that the portion of one of the remaindermen passed upon her death, as personalty.

So, also, in Miller v. Sageser, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 837, 99 S. W. 913, it was held that, where a testator provided that, after the death of his wife, his farm should be sold and the proceeds divided among his children, the interest of a child was to be considered as personalty, so that, upon her death intestate, it passed to her surviving husband and child.

In Fairly v. Kline, 3 N. J. L. 755, 4 Am. Dec. 414, it was held that, where a testator directed all his land to be sold after his wife's death and the proceeds of the sale divided among his children, the interest of a child dying before the time of sale was one transmissible to her representative.

In Bunce v. Vander Griff, 8 Paige, 37, it was held that, where a testator gave his wife the use and income of all his property so long as she remained his widow, and directed its sale after her death or remarriage, the money arising upon the sale to be divided among the children, if the person entitled to the proceeds dies before the execution of the power, such proceeds are to be distributed as personal estate of the decedent, in the same manner as if the property had been sold before his death.

In Fisher v. Banta, 66 N. Y. 468, where the will contained an imperative direction to sell all the testator's real estate, and provided for a division of testator's real estate equally between his two sons after the youngest arrived at the age of twenty-three, it was held that from the moment of testator's death the conversion took place and the land became money for all purposes of administration, the sons taking their interest as legatees, so that upon their death before actual sale it passed to their personal representatives.

In Ross v. Roberts, 2 Hun. 90, affirmed without opinion in 63 N. Y. 652, it was held that, where a testator authorized his executors to sell his real and personal estate, and to convert the same into money for di-conversion. Condit v. Bigalow, 64 N. J. Eq. 504, 54 Atl. 160.

Appellees contend that the doctrine does not apply here for the reasons (1) that no title passed to the executor or other trustees; (2) that the conversion could not take place in any event before the death of the widow; and (3) that no express power of sale is given to the executor. It was quite generally held that there need be no devise in terms to testators, executors, or to trustees in order that the doctrine of equitable conversion may apply. Ebey v. Adams, 135 Ill. 80, 10 L.R.A. 162, 25 N. E. 1013. And the fact that the sale is postponed to a time subsequent to the death of the testator is not controlling. Allen v. Watts, 98 Ala. 384, 11 So. 646; Meakings v. Cromwell, 5 N. Y.

vision within one year after the decease of himself and wife, the character of the estate or interest possessed by a beneficiary under the will, who died before actual conversion, was a money legacy to be distributed as her personal estate in the same manner as if a sale or conversion had taken place before her death.

In Freeman v. Smith, 60 How. Pr. 311, it was held that, where a testator devised real estate to his wife for life, and directed that upon her death it should be sold and the proceeds distributed among his children or their legal representatives, the equitable conversion does not take place until the time arrives when, under the direction in that behalf, the sale should be had; but that the bequest over to the children was a gift of personality, so that the share of a child predeceasing the widow passed as such to her next of kin.

In Smith v. McCrary, 38 N. C. (3 Ired. Eq.) 204, it was held that, where a testator directed his land to be converted into money and mixed with the money arising from the sales of the personal estate for the purpose of division among his children on the death of their mother, the share of one of such children dying during the life tenancy must go to her administrator, equity having impressed on the estate in remainder in the land the character of personal property, which was vested in the children from the death of the testator.

In Collier v. Grimesey, 36 Ohio St. 17, it was held that, where a testator directed the sale of certain real estate when his son should arrive at the age of twenty-one, provided that his wife's widowhood should have ceased before that time, the interest of a distributee of the proceeds, who died before the time arrived for the making of the sale, passed to his personal representatives as personality.

In Parkinson's Appeal, 32 Pa. 455, it was held that, where a testator gave his wife a life estate in certain property, and, after her death, directed it to be sold for the purpose of making a designated distribution, the interest of the persons entitled to the proceeds will be treated, for purposes of the 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

136; Collier v. Grimesey, 36 Ohio St. 17; Mellon v. Reed, 123 Pa. 1, 15 Atl. 906. Where there is a postponement of the sale to a time subsequent to testator's death, the courts are in conflict regarding the time when the conversion takes place; some of them holding that it takes place on the testator's death, and that there is no devise of realty, and others that it does not occur until the time arrives when the change should be made. See High v. Worley, 33 Ala. 196; Rumsey v. Durham, 5 Ind. 71; Cropley v. Cooper, 19 Wall. 167, 22 L. ed. 109; Hocker v. Gentry, 3 Met. (Ky.) 463; Fairly v. Kline, 3 N. J. L. 754, 4 Am. Dec. 414; Underwood v. Curtis, 127 N. Y. 523, 28 N. E. 585; Thomman's Estate, 161 Pa. 444, 29 Atl. 84; Ramsey v. Hanlon (C. C.) 33 will, as if it had been personal estate at the time of the death of the testator.

In Horner's Appeal, 56 Pa. 405, it was held that, where a testator devised land to his wife for life, and directed it, at her death, to be sold and the proceeds divided among his children, his will converted his real estate into personality so far as it related to the interests of his children in the proceeds.

In McClure's Appeal, 72 Pa. 414, in which the question was as to the disposition to be made of the share of a distributee dying before the time appointed for the conversion, it was held that, where the direction to sell is absolute, it is no exception to the rule that land directed to be sold and turned into money is to be considered as money from the death of the testator, for all the purposes of his will, that the period of sale is remote, and the conversion cannot be made until the time arrives.

In Thomman's Estate, 161 Pa. 444, 29 Atl. 84, it was held that, where a testator directed the sale of his farm after his wife's death, and a division of the proceeds thereof among his children, such realty would be treated, in making the distribution, as converted into personality from the testator's death.

In Heberton's Estate, 3 Phila. 436, it was held that a direction to sell testator's real estate when the youngest of his children should attain the age of twenty-one worked a conversion of the estate from the death of the testator, so that the interest of a child dying before actual conversion passed as personality.

In Re Sebastian, 4 Phila. 236, where a testator, after giving his wife a life estate in all his property, directed its sale after her death and the distribution of the proceeds, it was held that conversion took place from the moment of the testator's death, and the interest of a beneficiary would pass as personality.

In Byrne v. Stewart, 3 Desauss. Eq. 135, it was held that, where a testator directed certain real estate to be sold on his youngest son's coming of age, and the money to be divided between his wife and children,

Fed. 425. Contra, Shipman v. Rollins, 98 N. Y. 311; Vincent v. Newhouse, 83 N. Y. 505. Under the doctrine announced by these latter cases, until the time of sale arrives the land is treated as realty; title vesting in the devisees and being subject to any liens which may be created in the interim. See Sayles v. Best, 140 N. Y. 368, 35 N. E. 636; Nelson v. Nelson, 36 Ind. App. 331, 75 N. E. 679. The Indiana court is not consistent in its holdings. In the Ramsey Case it held that the conversion took place at the time of testator's death, while in the Nelson Case it held that during the interim between his death and the time fixed for the sale of the land the residuary beneficiary had a vested interest subject to disposition. And in Simonds v. Har- ris, 92 Ind. 505, it is held that this interest is subject to attachment and sale as real estate. See, as further sustaining this latter doctrine, Eneberg v. Carter, 98 Mo. 647, 14 Am. St. Rep. 664, 12 S. W. 522. The underlying thought in these cases seems to be that the devisee takes a vested interest subject to the life estate and the executor's power of sale. The great weight of authority is in favor of the proposition that the conversion takes place at the instant of testator's death, and that all property rights must be determined as if the conversion had taken place at that time, and the rights of the parties are adjusted as if the property were personalty. In cases where the doctrine applies either by reason of the act of the parties or by operation of law, the the interest of the wife, who died before the time fixed for sale, passed as personalty.

In Green v. Davidson, 4 Baxt. 488, it was held that where a testator directed land to be sold upon the death of his widow and the proceeds divided among his children, the estate passed to the legatees as personalty, so that upon the death of any of the children during the life of the widow, or before the land was to be sold, their shares would vest in their personal representatives.

A similar conclusion is reached in Hardin v. Young (Tenn. Ch. App.) 41 S. W. 1080.

In Harcum v. Hudnall, 14 Gratt. 369, where a will directed, in effect, that a conversion should be made when testator's son arrived at the age of twenty-one years, it was held that equity will consider the property devised as stamped with the character of money from and after that period; and that therefore the interest of the person entitled to a share of the proceeds was not an estate, but a mere chose in action.

So, also, in Effinger v. Hall, 81 Va. 94, where a testator directed a sale of land after the death of his wife and a division of the proceeds, it was held that the interest of the persons entitled to such proceeds would be considered, in equity, as personalty.

In Cropley v. Cooper, 19 Wall. 167, 22 L. ed. 109, affirming 7 D. C. 226, where the rights of the beneficiaries under the will were in question, it was held that, where real estate is directed by will to be converted into money, it is, in equity, regarded as if it were money at the time of the death of the testator; and that it was not to be sold until after the termination of two successive life estates does not affect the application of the principle.

In Handley v. Palmer, 43 C. C. A. 100, 103 Fed. 39, where the testator ordered and directed his executors to sell and convey all his real estate at the end of twenty years, it was held that such direction worked a conversion of his real estate into personalty as of the date of his death.

In Reading v. Blackwell, 166, Fed. Cas. No. 11,612, where a testator devised his real estate to his executors, directing them to apply the rents and profits to certain purposes until his grandnephew should attain, or would, if living, have attained, twenty-one years of age, it was held that the proceeds of such sale are to be considered as personal property at the death of the testator, for all the purposes of the will.

In Rinehart v. Harrison, 177, Fed. Cas. No. 11,840, where the same testamentary provision was in question, it was held that no exception was created to the general rule as to equitable conversion because the testator had postponed the sale of the real estate to the maturity of his grandnephew; and that, therefore, the share of a distributee who had died before there could be any actual conversion of land into money passed to her personal or legal representatives, and not to her heirs.

That equitable conversion will not take place until the time appointed for a sale, where such is the testator's intention, is shown in Richey v. Johnson, 30 Ohio St. 288, where it was said that, although it is true that, where the testator intends the legacy shall vest in interest at the time of his death, though the fund for its payment is to arise from the sale of lands which are directed not to be sold until the happening of a future event which must occur, the conversion will be regarded for all purposes of succession, as made at the testator's death; yet such rule is not applicable where the effect would be to contravene the intention of the testator that the law of succession in respect to the share of a primary legatee dying before actual conversion should be found in the statute of descent, and not of distribution. In this case the testator directed that, after the death of his wife, to whom he devised the use of a farm during her natural life, his executors should sell it and divide the proceeds thereof equally between his brothers and sisters and their heirs; and it was held that, although the gift as to the brothers and sisters was to be regarded as a bequest of personalty, and not a devise of land, yet, so far as the succession of the children of brothers and sisters dying before the time appointed for the sale was concerned, the conversion of proceeds are regarded as personal property. In other words, this interest passes as personalty, and the legatees have no such estate in the land as is subject to a judgment or lien or to an execution for the sale of real estate. Arlington State Bank v. Paulsen, 57 Neb. 717, 78 N. W. 303; Loftis v. Glass, 15 Ark. 680; Hammond v. Putnam, 110 Mass. 232; McClure's Appeal, 72 Pa. 414; Allison v. Wilson, 13 Serg. & R. 333; Morrow v. Brenizer, 2 Rawle, 185; Turner v. Davis, 41 Ark. 270; Paisley v. Holzshu, 83 Md. 325, 34 Atl. 832; Mellon v. Reed, 123 Pa. 17, 15 Atl. 906; Hunter v. Anderson, 152 Pa. 386, 25 Atl. 538; Jones v. Caldwell, 97 Pa. 43; Chick v. Ives, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 879, 90 N. W. 751; Roland v. Miller, 100 Pa. 47; Evans's Appeal, 58 Pa. 238. However, there may be an equitable assignment by the devisee of his interest as by mortgage or otherwise. Walker v. Killian, 62 S. C. 482, 40 S. E. 887; Henderson v. Sherman, 47 Mich. 267, 11 N. W. 153; Snover v. Squire (N. J. Ch.) 24 Atl. 365; Allen v. Watts, supra. Of course, this doctrine cannot be extended so far as to defeat the widow of her rights.

In support of the decree of the trial court, it is argued that, as the lands were not devised to the executor or to other trustees in trust, the legal title to the land until actual sale or conversion was in the heirs, among whom was Jacob H. Beaver, and that his legal interest was subject to execution sale; and some cases are cited in support of this doctrine. Justice Gibson answered this contention in Allison v. Wilson, supra, in his usual strong and forceful manner in this way: "But, even if this were otherwise, it would not vary the result; suppose the legal estate to descend, and remain subject, as it undoubtedly would, to the power to sell, it would, doubtless, be bound in the hands of the heir by a judgment against him; but for how much? Surely for just as much as descended to him, which would be all that was not disposed of by the will. The judgment creditor could sell, and the purchaser could obtain, no more than what vested in the debtor as heir. Then, when the estate of the purchaser comes to be devested by a sale in execution of the power under the will, what right has he, in virtue of having owned the descended part of the estate, to the money arising from that part of it which never descended, but passed under the will as a personal bequest? Neither the judgment creditor, nor the purchaser, in his stead, is the representative of Lewis Lowman to every intent. It is a maxim that, where two rights meet in the same person, they are to be viewed as if they ex-the farm into money would not be regarded as taking place at the death of the testator, or at any time prior to the death of his widow.

A case which clearly shows that the intention of the testator was not to make a gift of personalty, and in which, therefore, equitable conversion was held to date from the happening of the event specified, rather than from the time of the testator's death, is Re Ransom, 30 N. Y. S. R. 737, 10 N. Y. Supp. 16. There a testator gave a farm, together with stock, horses, etc., thereon, to certain persons as joint tenants, directing that the income and profits of said farm be divided in given proportions among them; and, in the event that the farm should not pay expenses and a dividend to the beneficiaries, the executors were given a power of sale and directed to pay over the proceeds to the same persons, and in the same proportions, as the income was directed to be disposed of; and it was held that from the happening of the event specified there vested in the beneficiaries an undivided interest in the property as personalty, so that the representatives of a beneficiary who died after part of the property had been converted into money were entitled to participate in the proceeds from the sale of the entire property.

The two following cases appear to be at variance with the generally prevailing doctrine:

Who was entitled to the share of a beneficiary dying before the termination of a life estate? it was held that, where the testatrix reserved, during the lifetime of the life tenant, the house and lot in question from the operation of a power of sale by which she had directed the conversion of her real estate into money, the equitable conversion, if there be one, must date from the time of the sale, instead of from the death of the testatrix, as would ordinarily be the case were the power to sell imperative and no time for its exercise specified in the instrument by which it is created.

In Liveright v. Sternberger, 115 N. Y. Supp. 349, it was held that, where the will of a testator indicated that it was not his intention that his real property should be converted into personalty immediately upon his death, but rather that it should be postponed until the death of his widow, unless the executors should sooner sell the same under the discretionary power given them to do so, the share of one entitled to participate in the proceeds upon the final distribution, but whose death preceded that of the widow, was to be considered personalty only as to the proceeds from the sale of real property theretofore sold.

Miscellaneous.

Under this heading may be found a few cases which, from the incidental manner in which the question under discussion was involved, do not lend themselves to the foregoing classification.

isted in different persons. Now, if a different person from Lewis Lowman, the heir, were entitled under the will, how could a judgment creditor of Lewis Lowman claim anything under the will? Hence it is evident that, by virtue of a lien on the land of Lewis Lowman, the heir, his judgment creditor will not be entitled to the personal interest of Lewis Lowman, the legatee. The argument attempted to be raised on this ground therefore fails."

This case also answers another suggestion made by appellees, to the effect that there might, perhaps, be a reconversion of the property by agreement, and, in that event, the judgments would be enforceable. The trial court erred in holding that the judgments were liens upon the land devised or any part thereof. The defendants, however, pleaded a garnishment of the executor, and plaintiffs, without objection, proceeded to try the issue tendered by the answer. In this they pleaded a pretended assignment by Jacob H. Beaver to the wife, Mary Beaver, one of the plaintiffs herein, but they averred that this assignment was fraudulent and made with intent to hinder and delay them in the collection of their judgments. This was submitted to the court, and it made the following order with reference thereto: "And the court further finds that, by reason of the garnishment of the said J. H. Beaver as executor of the estate of the said Israel Beaver, the said execution defendants are entitled to have their said judgments satisfied out of the proceeds of the sale of said real estate belonging to the said J. H. Beaver under and by virtue of the provision of the will of the said Israel Beaver, deceased. It is therefore considered and decreed by the court that the said judgments of the said defendants hereinbefore set out be, and the same are hereby, established as liens upon the interest of the said J. H. Beaver in the said described real estate from the date of the death of the said Israel Beaver; and it is further decreed by the court that said judgments be, and the same are hereby, established as liens upon the interest of the said J. H. Beaver in the proceeds of the sale of the said described real estate in the hands of the said executor. And it is further decreed by the court that, upon the sale of the said described real estate, the same be condemned to satisfy the said several judgments, and that they be applied to the payment and discharge of said several judgments, with costs and accruing costs in full or pro rata as hereinbefore found and determined. And it is further decreed that, in the event of the failure of the said J. H. Beaver, executor, to

In Vincent v. Newhouse, 83 N. Y. 505, an action brought to obtain a determination of the rights and interests of all the parties under a will, in deciding the question whether any portion of the remainder provided for in the will giving and devising certain property to testator's wife for life, and directing that at her death such property should be sold by the executor and the proceeds equally divided, vested at the death of the testator, it was said that by such provisions the land was equitably converted into money from the time the sale was directed to be made. It will be perceived that this statement, though correct, does not necessarily imply that equitable conversion may not also date from the testator's death.

In Underwood v. Curtis, 127 N. Y. 523, 28 N. E. 585, in which the validity of the will was in question, it was held that whether the conversion of property directed to be sold should be deemed to take place on the death of a testator or at some later period depends on his intention as manifested by the provisions of the will, the general rule being that real estate should be deemed converted into personalty as of the date of the death of the testator; and that, where the executrices were directed to sell all the real estate, the time of sale resting in their discretion, they not being required to make the sale until ten years after the death of the testator's widow, such provision disclosed no intention to create an exception to the general rule that a conversion must be deemed to take place at the testator's death.

In Snell v. Tuttle, 44 Hun, 324, it is said that, where specific real estate is directed to be converted into money at a future date and the avails divided among legatees, the rules applicable to personal bequests are to control.

In Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Bailey, 19 App. Div. 204, 45 N. Y. Supp. 1069, it is said: "Whether the conversion takes place at the death of the testator, or at some later period, depends upon the intention of the testator. If the will, in terms, provides for a sale at a specified future time, or creates a trust with the discretion to sell only on the happening of a designated event, which might or might not happen, then the conversion takes place on its occurrence. Otherwise the conversion will be deemed to take place as of the date of testator's death,"—citing Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1162. A comparison of the foregoing statement within the authority cited shows, however, an alteration of the sense in adapting the passage referred to. There a direction to sell "at some specified future time," instead of being considered as of the same character as "a trust to sell upon the happening of a specified event, which might or might not happen," seems to be put by way of antithesis.

In Severn's Estate, 211 Pa. 65, 60 Atl. 492, it is said to be settled law that, if the will shows a clear intention that the estate shall be sold, a conversion will take place though there is not to be an immediate sale.

sell the said described real estate within a reasonable time after the date of this decree, that the said defendants, upon filing a motion herein showing such failure, shall be entitled to the issuance of a special execution for the sale of the interest of the said J. H. Beaver in said real estate for the satisfaction of the said judgments as hereinbefore found and determined." Appellants say that this part of the decree is unwarranted, because defendants have failed to establish the fraud pleaded by them. We have gone over the testimony with care, and fail to find any such evidence of fraud as would justify the setting aside of the assignment made by J. H. Beaver to his wife. The burden was upon the defendants to establish this issue, and, instead of introducing any testimony on their own behalf, they relied exclusively upon that given by the plaintiffs. Unless we are to hold that at least three witnesses wilfully committed perjury, we must conclude that an assignment was made by Jacob H. Beaver to his wife of all interest he had under the will in question in and to his father's property, and that this assignment was in good faith.

In view of this conclusion, it is apparent that the decree rendered by the trial court is erroneous, and it must be, and it is, reversed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FIRST CIRCUIT.

RE MAJER APPEL, Bankrupt.

EDWIN K. McPECK, Trustee, Petitioner.

(— C. C. A. —, 163 Fed. 1002.)

Bond — ne exeat — breach.

1. A bond filed by a bankrupt to secure his release from arrest under a writ of ne exeat, and conditioned to be void if he will not go or attempt to go into parts beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and not depart from the district without leave, is not a mere bail bond, but is broken by an attempt to go beyond the jurisdiction without leave.

Bond — breach — release.

2. A bankrupt court may relieve a surety from liability on a bond executed to secure the release of a bankrupt who has been arrested under a writ of ne exeat after it has been broken by the departure of the bankrupt from the jurisdiction, if he has returned and is ready to abide the decrees of the court so that the result sought by the obligation has not failed.

(August 13, 1908.)

PETITION by the trustee in bankruptcy of Majer Appel to revise in matter of law the ruling of the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts to the effect that there had been no breach of a bond given to secure the release of the bankrupt, who had been arrested under a writ of ne exeat. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Colt, Putnam, and Lowell, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Lee M. Friedman and Morse & Friedman, for petitioner:

A ne exeat bond is a general undertaking or guaranty by the surety that, if the defendant is set at liberty generally, he will at all times remain within the jurisdiction.

Case Note. — What constitutes breach of ne exeat bond.

In Musgrave v. Medex, 1 Meriv. 49, cited in the foregoing opinion, one of the defendants entered into the usual ne exeat bond and, after putting in his answer, went abroad without permission; subsequently an application was made on behalf of the plaintiff that the other defendant pay into court the sum for which the writ was marked, he having agreed to be answerable for the first defendant; or, in default thereof, that proceedings should be had upon the bond; and it was so ordered. A motion was subsequently made to discharge the order upon the contention that the money had in fact been already paid by the principal on the bond previous to his going abroad. The Lord Chancellor, however, was of the opinion that that question had nothing to do with the application, and the motion was refused.

In Utten v. Utten, 1 Meriv. 51, also cited in the above opinion, the plaintiff, under similar circumstances to those in the preceding case, moved that the bond be delivered over to him and put in suit by him. It was suggested for the sureties that the money claimed by the plaintiff in the cause was not actually due; and that the defendant had put in an answer which was not excepted to, and that he had gone abroad under a mistake as to the effect of his bond; and it was therefore requested that the sureties be discharged on entering into cognizances to abide the event of Lowell, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Majer Appel was adjudged a bankrupt January 23, 1905, and thereafter McPeck was elected his trustee. On July 26, 1906, McPeck filed a petition in the district court, setting out that the bankrupt had fraudulently concealed from the trustee a considerable sum of money belonging to the bankrupt estate; that the bankrupt was a resident of Adams, within the district of Massachusetts, at the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings; "that thereafter, and while said proceedings were still pending, said Appel removed to the state of New York, and that he has not since been a resident of Adams, but has continued to keep within the said state of New York; . . . that said Majer Appel is now within the jurisdiction of this court, but . . . is about to remove from the jurisdiction of the court, and has no intention of remaining within said jurisdiction, and that his removal from the jurisdiction will endanger the amount due from said Majer Appel to your petitioner. Wherefore your petitioner prays that a writ of ne exeat may issue for the arrest of said Majer Appel." The writ issued on the same day, and the bankrupt was duly arrested thereupon. On July 27th, he obtained his liberty by executing before a commissioner the following instrument:

Recognizance for Appearance.

[Filed July 30, 1906.]

United States of America, District of Massachusetts, ss.—City of Pittsfield.

Be it remembered that on this twenty-seventh day of July, A. D. 1906, before me, a commissioner duly appointed by the district court of the United States for the said district of Massachusetts, personally came Majer Appel, of Brooklyn, in the state of New York, and David Appel, of the city, county, and state of New York, and jointly and severally acknowledged themselves to owe the United States of America the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars, to be levied on their goods and chattels, lands and tenements, if default be made in the condition following, to wit:—

The condition of this recognizance is such that, if the said Majer Appel will not go or attempt to go into parts beyond the jurisdiction of the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts without the leave of said court or until further order of said court, and then and there abide the judgment of the said court, and the cause. The Lord Chancellor, however, ordered the money to be paid into court.

A bond in ne exeat proceedings conditioned for the appearance of the defendant in court whenever he should be directed or required to appear to answer any order that might be made in the cause is not violated by the failure of the defendant to pay the amount ordered by the court's final decree. Wauters v. Van Vorst, 28 N. J. Eq. 103.

The sureties upon a bond executed to secure the discharge of a defendant in ne exeat proceedings were held, in Harris v. Hardy, 3 Hill, 393, for the full amount of the penalty, where there was the usual condition of the bond that the defendant should not depart from the state without leave of court, and a breach had occurred 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by defendant's departing from and remaining out of the state without such leave.

Johnson v. Clendenin, 5 Gill & J. 463, on a question of the extent of the liability of sureties on a bond in ne exeat proceedings with the usual condition as to remaining in the state, holds that they are not responsible on the bond where the defendant in the writ escaped from confinement after having been duly proceeded against and committed for failure to comply with a final decree of the court, their liability having ended with the making of the decree. And see Debazin v. Debazin, 1 Dick. 95, where the sureties were discharged and their bond canceled although the defendant was in contempt and in custody for not performing the decree.

not depart from said district without leave, then this recognizance to be void, otherwise to remain in full force and virtue.

Taken, and acknowledged before me on the day and year first above written.

[Seal.] Arthur H. Wood,

Commissioner of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

United States of America, District of Massachusetts, ss.—

David Appel, a surety on the annexed recognizance, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he resides at 248 East 7th Street, in the city of New York, that he is a freeholder in the city of Brooklyn, New York, that he is worth the sum of three thousand dollars, over and above all his just debts and liabilities, in property subject to execution and sale, and that his property consists of real estate in said Brooklyn. David Appel has deposited with me two thousand five hundred dollars in cash as bail money.

Arthur H. Woods,

Commissioner of the United States for the District of ———.

The deposit of $2,500 was later handed over by the commissioner to the clerk of the district court.

On March 12, 1907, the judge of the district court affirmed the order of the referee directing the bankrupt to turn over to the trustee $6,000. On April 29, 1907, the trustee filed a petition in the district court, alleging the arrest and release of the bankrupt, that the bankrupt had "committed various breaches of said bond," and "that demand had been made upon said surety for the penal sum of said bond, and the money deposited in the clerk's office." The trustee, therefore, prayed that the sum of $2,500 might be ordered to be paid by the clerk of the district court to the petitioner as trustee in bankruptcy. There was a hearing in the district court, at which both the bankrupt and the surety were present. The decree recited "that no breach of the conditions of said bond had been committed, as more fully appears in the opinion of the court," and it denied the petition. On reference to the opinion of the learned judge, we find that he ruled as matter of law that the absence of the bankrupt from the district from time to time after the bond was given did not amount to a breach of the bond. This was the ground upon which the trustee's petition was dismissed. The record, as presented to this court, is informal in several respects, but it appears generally, and both counsel 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

are agreed, that this court must first answer the following question: Was the learned judge of the district court right in ruling that the bond given for the bankrupt's release was in effect a bail bond, binding him only to abide the decrees and orders of the district court when rendered, and in other respects leaving him free to absent himself from the court's jurisdiction? The trustee contended, in accordance with the wording of the bond, that it was conditioned upon his remaining constantly within the jurisdiction.

An examination of the practice of the English court of chancery, as set out in the decided cases and in accepted text-books, leads us to the conclusion that the bond should receive its grammatical construction, and that it binds the bankrupt not to go into parts beyond the jurisdiction without leave of the court of bankruptcy. Musgrave v. Medex, 1 Meriv. 49; Utten v. Utten, 1 Meriv. 51; 2 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 6th Am. ed. p. 1712. This rule has peculiar application to the case of a bankrupt, who is required by the general scheme of the bankruptcy act to be constantly on hand in order that he may assist the trustee in his administration of the estate.

We hold the decree of the district court erroneous and reverse it, because it sets out that the bankrupt's absence from Massachusetts was not a breach of the bond. We hold that this absence was a breach of the bond, but we recognize that weighty courts have held that, while a bond given to procure the release of one arrested under a writ of ne exeat regno differs from an ordinary bail bond in requiring the constant presence of the principal within the jurisdiction, yet the chief object of the two obligations is the same, viz., to obtain security that the principal shall abide (not perform) any decree which the court may render against him. 14 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 320. The penal sum of the bond in the case at bar is already in the disposition of the district court. In Harris v. Hardy, 3 Hill, 393, the supreme court of New York said: "If the defendant leave the state without permission, an order will be granted directing his sureties to pay the money into court, or, in default thereof, that a suit be brought upon the bond. . . . The writ will be discharged, on paying into court the sum for which it is marked, . . . and upon giving security to abide by the decree. . . . The fund is under the control of the court of chancery, and will be disposed of with due regard to the rights of all parties concerned."

The learned district judge seems to have found no evidence that the bankrupt had not always been ready to abide the decrees of the court of bankruptcy, although he had personally departed from the jurisdiction. Acting either upon the analogy of a court of equity or of the power possessed by courts of the United States in actions at law, a court of bankruptcy has power to chancery a bond. Sun Printing & Pub. Asso. v. Moore, 183 U. S. 642, 662, 46 L. ed. 366, 377, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 240; 8 and 9 Wm. III., chap. 11; Rev. Stat. § 961, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 699. It may well be that the district court will refuse to enforce the liability of the surety upon this bond, and will relieve him from that liability, basing its action, not upon the want of a technical breach of the bond, but on the broader ground that the result sought by the obligation has not yet failed. We are not required to pass upon these questions. The record is not full enough. Inasmuch as the decree contains a recital which we deem erroneous in law, we must reverse it; but we do so with leave to the district court to proceed further in the matter in accordance with the rules of equity.

The decree of the District Court is reversed, and the case is remanded to that court, with directions to proceed in accordance with our opinion passed down the 13th day of August, 1908; and the petitioner recovers his costs in this court.

MCNEELY COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

BANK OF NORTH AMERICA.

Bank — forged check — delay in notice — effect.

That a bank which has paid checks upon forged indorsements cannot show that it could have protected itself had it received prompt notice of the forgery will not prevent the failure to give such notice from depriving the depositor of his right to require the bank to make good to his account the amount of payments so made.

Case Note. — Loss or prejudice to bank resulting from negligent failure on part of depositor or correspondent bank to give prompt notice of forgery, as a condition of its right to charge forged checks to latter's account.

This note presupposes that there was an unreasonable delay on the part of the depositor or correspondent bank in reporting the forgery, due either to negligent failure to discover the forgery, or failure to report after discovery, and presents simply APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas No. 4 for Philadelphia County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount represented by forged checks which had been paid by defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. B. F. Pepper and G. W. Pepper, for appellant:

To impute notice to appellant from the date of the return of the canceled checks would be to hold it to the exercise of a degree of diligence which the law declares it is not necessary to exercise.

The statute of limitations does not begin to run against a depositor until demand has been made upon the bank.

The delay beyond a reasonable time in giving notice to the defendant of these forgeries after their discovery, without proof of damage resulting therefrom, does not work an estoppel.

The general questions, therefore, as to the duty of the depositor to give notice, and what is reasonable time for that purpose, are not within the scope of the note, except as the latter questions involve the consideration of the question under annotation.

to that laid down in McNEELY CO. v. BANK OF NORTH AMERICA, that, before a bank is justified in charging the amount paid on forged paper against the account of a depositor or correspondent bank, because of negligence in discovering or reporting the forgery, it must show that, because of such negligence, it was prejudiced, or lost an opportunity to protect itself by action against the forger or other third party.

Thus, in Janin v. London & S. F. Bank, 92 Cal. 14, 14 L.R.A. 320, 27 Am. St. Rep. 82, 27 Pac. 1100, it was held that, although the depositor may have been negligent in not earlier examining the returned checks, and discovering the forgery, and notifying the bank thereof, nevertheless, so long as there was no evidence that, in consequence of the depositor's delay, the bank lost any rights or remedies which it might have resorted to in order to save itself from the loss incurred by its own mistake, such negligence on the part of the depositor was no defense to his right to recover against the bank.

So, in Brixen v. Deseret Nat. Bank, 5 Utah, 504, 18 Pac. 43, it was held that, even though the depositor was negligent in tendering back a check with a forged indorsement (which the court denied), that fact would not justify the bank in refusing to pay the money to the depositor, until it could show some actual damage caused thereby.

In Third Nat. Bank v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 76 Hun. 475, 27 N. Y. Supp. 1070, where a check had been paid upon the forged indorsement of the payee, it was held that, although, upon discovery of the forgery, the duty is incumbent on the one detecting the imposition to act promptly in giving notice, he will not be prevented from recovering the damage or injury shown to have been actually incurred, unless there is some proof on the part of the one entitled to notice, of damage from the failure to receive such notice.

This case was followed in Harlem Co-op. Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Mercantile Trust Co. 10 Misc. 680, 31 N. Y. Supp. 790, the court remarking that in some states the rule was that a change of circumstances and resulting damage to the bank's interest will be presumed, but that such rule had not been adopted in New York; adding that in the present case, "as a matter of fact, the defendant bank cannot be said to have been damaged in any way by the delayed notice."

To the same effect is Wind v. Fifth Nat. Bank, 39 Mo. App. 72, the court expressly declaring that there was no presumption of disadvantage to the bank by reason of the delay, but that it must be affirmatively shown.

The doctrine of the responsibility of the depositor to his bank for the result of failure promptly to notify it of the forgery was held, in Hurdy v. Chesapeake Bank, 51 Md. 562, 34 Am. Rep. 325, to rest upon the principle of an estoppel in pais, which may be invoked to prevent injustice only by one who can show that he has acted or refrained from acting by the conduct of another which would ordinarily influence other persons; and the court, relying on this doctrine, held that it was incumbent upon the bank to show that it had been actually misled to its injury by the conduct of the depositor.

In Murphy v. Metropolitan Nat. Bank, 191 Mass. 159, 114 Am. St. Rep. 595, 77 N. E. 693, it was held that, even if there was a delay by the depositor in giving information after obtaining such knowledge as to warrant him in making a claim on the bank for the amount paid on the forged paper, there was no good ground for conjecturing that the bank's position was changed on account of the delay, and that, without showing some injury by reason of the delay, the bank could not use it as an estoppel against the depositor.

In Weinstein v. National Bank, 69 Tex. 38, 5 Am. St. Rep. 23, 6 S. W. 171, an action by a depositor against the bank, a plea 195; States v. First Nat. Bank, 203 Pa. 69, 52 Atl. 13; 1849 P. L. 426; Chambers v. Union Nat. Bank, 78 Pa. 205; Corn Exch. Nat. Bank v. National Bank, 78 Pa. 233; *Tradesmen's Nat. Bank v. Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

McNeely Company, a corporation, was a depositor with the appellee, the Bank of North America, and had in its employ one Charles S. Reber, who, between April 20, 1897, and February 24, 1903, forged the names of payees on 90 checks issued by it. Some of these checks were paid directly to him by the appellee, and others he deposited to the credit of his account with certain alleging failure by the depositor to use diligence to detect and denounce certain forgeries of checks within a reasonable time, and that thereby he was estopped from questioning the correctness of the account, was held bad and properly excepted to; in that it contained no averment of any injury or loss to the bank on that account. In this case the court also held that it was properly a matter for the jury, under appropriate instructions, to say whether the bank was injured or not by the depositor's delay.

In United States v. National Bank, 2 Mackey, 289, it seems to have been recognized that the reasonableness of the notice depended to some extent at least upon the question whether or not the bank had lost its recourse against other parties. In this case, however, it was expressly held that no recourse against third parties had been lost, and that the notice was reasonable.

The negligent delay of the drawee in discovering the forgery of a check, prompt notice having been given as soon as the forgery was discovered, was held, in First Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 151 Mass. 280, 21 Am. St. Rep. 450, 24 N. E. 44, not to preclude it from throwing the loss upon another bank which had negligently cashed the check and received credit therefor from the drawee, it having been found as a fact that the latter's negligence did not in fact prejudice the other bank. The general question, which was also involved in this case, whether a drawee bank which cashes a forged check may, independently of any delay in reporting the forgery, recover from another bank to which it pays the check, is, of course, not within the scope of this note. It will be noticed that in this case the court was not called upon to pass upon the question as to the burden of proof with respect to prejudice.

In Gloucester Bank v. Salem Bank, 17 Mass. 33, however, where a bank received from another bank a package of what purported to be its own bank notes, which in 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

fact were forged, and cashed the same, it was held that its negligence in discovering the forgery was sufficient to prevent a recovery of the money paid, although there was no proof that the other bank could have saved itself from loss if earlier notified. The court said in this connection: "Although there is no evidence in the case from which it can be ascertained that they could have saved themselves if they had received earlier notice, the law will presume that a change of circumstances had taken place which would justify them in resisting the action."

In United States v. National Exch. Bank, 45 Fed. 163, where a postmaster, on a forged indorsement of a money order, gave a check on a local bank, it was recognized that, even if the bank could otherwise have been held liable for paying such check, the fact that no notice had been given it by the former for more than a month after discovering the fraud would be sufficient to prevent recovery from the bank, even though the bank had notice of the forgery as soon as the drawer had. The court said: "The notice should have been given without unnecessary delay after discovery of the fraud, to enable the bank to pursue any remedy it might have against the forger or indorsers. . . . It is urged in answer to this objection that the defendant also had notice of the fraud about the same time. But that was not enough. The government did not repay the money until July, and the bank could not assume, without the return of the check and demand of payment, that the government intended to pay, or to hold the bank responsible."

In Bank of St. Albans v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 10 Vt. 141, 33 Am. Dec. 188, an action by a drawee bank against a bank which collected the check, it was held that an unreasonable delay of two months on the part of the drawee bank to notify its correspondent of the forgery was sufficient to prevent its recovery, the court saying that, unless banks and bankers, who collected them through the clearing house. Each of said checks was charged to plaintiff's account with the defendant, and the amount thereof entered as a charge against its deposit in its bank book when the same was settled. On each settlement the balance was struck and entered, after deducting the amount of the checks paid on the forged indorsements. During the period of these forgeries the bank book of the appellant was settled 76 times, and all checks that had been paid by the bank, including those bearing the forged indorsements, were regularly returned to the appellant at each settlement of its bank book. Reber continued in its employ until April, 1, 1903. Some of his forgeries were discovered on or about January 1, 1904, and within two or three weeks thereafter a very large number of the 90 forged indorsements were discovered. The twenty-fourth finding of fact of the referee is: "No notice was given by the plaintiff to the defendant of the forgeries, or any of them, until April 11, 1904. As stated in finding No. 10, the bank book was settled three times, viz., on February 1, 1904, February 28, 1904, and March 31, 1904, after the discovery of the forgeries and before notice was given thereof on April 11, 1904. During the same period, Robert K. McNeely, who was a director of the bank, attended directors' meetings weekly from January 4, 1904, to April 11, 1904, a total of 14 meetings, but gave no notice to the bank concerning the forged indorsements or complaining of their payment." Robert K. McNeely, referred to in the foregoing finding, was a director of the company and its secretary and treasurer, having charge of its offices and the examination of its trial balances. Reber was able to conceal his forgeries from his employer by a complicated and ingenious system, which need not be here described, for the referee has found that the appellant was not negligent in failing to discover them sooner, though they extended through a period of nearly six years. The reasons for this finding are unimportant, if the legal conclusion of the referee and court was correct, that the appellant so delayed giving notice to the bank of the forgeries, after it had discovered them, that it cannot recover the amount paid and charged to its account on any of the forged indorsements. The fact that Reber had forged some of the indorsements was, as stated, discovered about January 1, 1904, and, within two or three weeks thereafter, it was known to the appellant that a very large number of the 90 forgeries had it could be judicially determined that the bank which purchased the check could at a future day command the same facilities for redress which existed when the check was first presented, the unreasonable delay would destroy the equity of the plaintiff's claim.

So, in Continental Nat. Bank v. Metropolitan Nat. Bank, 107 Ill. App. 455, a bank check or draft was, before its presentation for payment, fraudulently raised, and largely increased in its amount, and, after certification, finally reached another bank, to which it was paid by the drawee. In an action by the drawee bank to recover the amount so paid, as money paid by mistake, it appeared that, for four or five years after knowledge of the fraud, it had given no notice of it. The court said: "The record does not show that the long delay of nearly five years in giving notice of the raising or altering of the draft has not resulted in loss to appellee. It is to be presumed, under the facts of this case, that there has been a change of circumstances in the position of the parties otherwise liable, and therefore . . . through the negligence of appellant in not promptly notifying appellee of the alteration of the draft the appellee has been prejudiced; and, if prejudiced, it follows that the delay in giving said notice was unreasonable; and, under the authorities, such delay as would preclude recovery."

And see the cases set out and sufficiently reviewed in McNeely Co. v. Bank of North America.

335, the court said that, if the depositor failed in exercising due care to discover forgeries, and the bank is injured in consequence of such omission of duty, the depositor is liable to the bank. But that the extent of the liability is commensurate with the loss sustained in consequence of his neglect of duty, no more and no less. The court, however, was here dealing with the question as to the effect of an actual recoupment of part of the loss by the bank to reduce the depositor's liability. A similar view is taken in Critten v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 171 N. Y. 219, 57 L.R.A. 529, 63 N. E. 969, holding that a drawee bank could not throw the loss upon the depositor, even if he was negligent in discovering the forgeries, where the drawee still had recourse against the bank in which the check was deposited.

It will be noticed that it was expressly stated in McNeely Co. v. Bank of North America that the negligence of the depositor was not in the failure to discover the forgery, but in the giving of the notice thereof after the discovery. However, whether this was an important factor in the decision of the case does not appear, and no other case has been found which called attention to the possibility of such a distinction.

For cases on depositor's right to recover amount of forged or raised checks paid by bank, as affected by the fact that he intrusted the examination of vouchers to the employee who was guilty of the original fraud, see case note to First Nat. Bank v. Richmond Electric Co. 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 744.

been committed; but no notice of this was given to the bank until nearly three months afterwards. The duty of a depositor in a bank, upon discovering that it has paid and charged to his account either a check bearing his forged signature as drawer or his check on the forged indorsement of the payee, is to promptly notify it of the forgery. This notification is not only a duty, but it is what a depositor will instinctively do on discovering, upon the return of his bank book with canceled checks charged to his account, that there are among them some which he never signed or which were not paid to the payees named in them. This duty is not questioned by the learned counsel for the appellant. Their contention is that, for the disregard of it, a depositor is not to be barred from recovering from the bank what it may have paid on his forged signatures or on the forged indorsements of payees named in checks drawn by him, unless, by his failure to promptly notify it of the forgeries, it has lost rights over against other parties, and the burden is upon it to prove such loss. Authorities are not wanting to support this, but the referee and court below did not follow them. Relying upon others, they held that the plaintiff, by reason of its failure to promptly notify the bank of its discovery of the forgeries, could not recover, even though the bank had offered no evidence that it could have protected itself and the plaintiff had not shown that it could not if prompt notice had been given.

The relation between a bank and its depositor is a contractual one. Its undertaking with its depositor is to pay his checks, if he has sufficient funds with it for that purpose; and it assumes all the risk as against him of a mispayment in paying and charging to his account a check which he has not signed or one which he has signed bearing a forged indorsement of the payee. To his account it may not charge such a check. If it does, the depositor can recover from it the amount so charged. No payment by a bank on a forged signature of a depositor as drawer of a check, or on a forged indorsement of his payee, can affect him.... His right is to get back from the bank whatever he has deposited with it, less what has been properly paid out on his orders. The responsibility of the bank to the depositor is absolute, and it can retain no money deposited with it by him to reimburse it for any mispayment it has made out of such deposit; but it can recover from a forger responsible for the mispayment, or from those who, by their indorsement of a check, have vouched for previous indorsements or the genuineness of the signature of the alleged drawer. The right of a bank to recover from a forger, or from those to whom it may have paid a check bearing the forged signature of one of its depositors, or a forged indorsement, is its only remedy for the fraud practised upon it by the forgery. The depositor's money is not affected by it, and, when he is the first to discover it, it is not reasonable that he should not be required to give prompt notice of it to the bank, if he intends to hold his depository liable for the mispayment, and this without regard to what may or may not result from a prompt effort to recover from the party or parties who may be liable to the bank for the mispayment. The depositor can gain nothing by withholding knowledge of the forgery, but the bank, if kept in ignorance of it after his discovery of it, may lose everything. As soon as a bank learns that it has paid a check on a forged signature of a depositor, or on a forged indorsement on his check, it is its duty to promptly restore to the depositor's account what was improperly taken from it, and its right at the same time is to proceed against those who wrongfully got the money. This right is to proceed immediately, and to the promptness with which a bank is able to exercise it recovery is often due. When a depositor withholds from his bank his knowledge of the forgery, he withholds from it this right to proceed promptly for its own protection. It may or may not be able to recover from the forger by promptly proceeding against him, but its right is to try by so proceeding; and, when one of its depositors discovers that it has innocently sustained a loss, he ought, not only in all good conscience, but as a legal duty, to notify it at once of its mistake; for, by withholding from it what he has discovered, he can, as just stated, gain nothing, but it may lose all. A forger may be insolvent or beyond the reach of civil or criminal process, but, by prompt proceedings against him, others may become interested in him and come to his assistance, who, after delay, may not do so. This incident to a bank's right to promptly proceed against a forger is not to be overlooked. Whenever a depositor knowingly withholds from it knowledge without which it cannot so proceed in an effort to protect itself, he ought to be regarded, when he comes to enforce alleged rights against it, as having withheld from it a substantial right, without regard to what might or might not have resulted from a prompt exercise of that right. When an indorser on a promissory note defends on the ground that prompt notice was not given him of its nonpayment, the holder will not be heard in reply that, if notice of the nonpayment had been promptly given, it would not have helped the indorser, because he could have recovered ered nothing from the maker of the note or prior indorsers. The right of the indorser on a note is to prompt notice of its nonpayment, that he may have an opportunity of proceeding promptly against the maker or prior indorsers, without regard to what may result from his efforts, and, if this right is not given him, his liability is at an end. "The insolvency of the maker of a note, though known to the indorser, ought not to discharge the holder from giving notice. There are various degrees of insolvency, and it rarely happens that a man is totally insolvent. So that there is a chance of getting something by an application to the debtor. Besides, if a man has nothing of his own, he may have friends, who, to relieve him from pressure, will do something for him. The indorser, therefore, has a chance of securing himself, at least in part. The only reason that can be assigned for insolvency taking away the necessity of notice is that notice could be of no use to the indorser; but it is almost impossible to prove that it might not have been of use; therefore it is necessary." Barton v. Baker, 1 Serg. & R. 334, 7 Am. Dec. 620. Why should a different rule apply to a bank, which never knowingly pays on a forgery, but, in cases like the one now before us, is always an innocent victim?

Delay by a depositor in giving notice to a bank means not only its enforced delay in proceeding against those liable to it, but means loss of evidence as well; and, if the rule for which appellant contends should prevail, a bank might be deprived of the opportunity of showing that prompt proceeding on its part would have resulted in its recovering for its loss. And, again, in a suit brought by a depositor against a bank to recover the amount which it may have improperly paid on a forgery, the issue is the forgery. This issue ought not to be complicated with another, and a speculative one, as to whether anything might have been recovered from the forger, if prompt notice had been given to the bank of the forgery. The only reasonable and logical rule is the one adopted by the referee and the court below. Our own cases are in harmony with it, and it is approved by high authority. A different one would be putting a premium upon the laches of a depositor, and give to a dishonest one opportunity to help a forger to escape.

In Rick v. Kelly, 30 Pa. 527, the plaintiffs below purchased from the defendants notes bearing the genuine signature of George Fox, as maker, but the forged indorsements of the payee. In reversing the judgments in favor of the plaintiffs and announcing the general rule that notice of a forgery within a reasonable time after discovery is necessary for 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the maintenance of an action for the recovery of the money paid for such notes, it was said by Porter, J.: "The notes in this suit contained a genuine name. For aught that appears, timely application to that party might have saved the debt, for others thought proper to obtain judgments and sell his property. At some stage of the business the plaintiffs obtained knowledge of the forgery, for they brought the actions and put the fact on record. Why not inform the defendant of his risk, and give him a chance of escape by a direct blow at the maker? What justice could there be in permitting a holder to hold on until the very close of the period of limitation, and then to spring a suit on the seller, when the genuine parties are dead and their estates gone?" In Meyers v. Southwestern Nat. Bank, 193 Pa. 1. 74 Am. St. Rep. 672, 44 Atl. 280, in a suit to recover what had been paid by the bank on the forged signature of the plaintiff to checks, judgment on a verdict directed for the defendant was sustained, because the plaintiff had not promptly notified it of the forgeries after he was held to have had notice of them, and we said: "It was not the bank's fault that the first forgeries were not promptly discovered and notice thereof given. If plaintiff's duty to the bank had been performed at the proper time, the fact would have appeared that the bank had charged plaintiff, on his bank book, with the payment of two items ($300 and $200) for which no vouchers appeared among the checks handed to him by his clerk. These vouchers, the two forged checks, had been abstracted and destroyed by the latter. No objection having been made at the time of the first settlement, the bank had a right to assume that everything was correct, including the two checks purporting to be signed by him. His silence was tantamount to a declaration to that effect, and, in afterwards honoring checks signed by the same person, the bank had a right to consider the fact that these signatures had been at least tacitly recognized by the plaintiff as genuine. While the plaintiff was not chargeable with the knowledge of his clerk that the latter had committed the forgery, he was clearly responsible for the acts and omissions of his clerk in the course of the duties with which he was intrusted, viz., to receive the checks from the bank, take them to his employer's office, compare the amounts thereof with the amounts in the bank book and check book, etc. In view of the uncontradicted evidence as to the foregoing facts, it cannot be doubted that, as between the bank and the plaintiff, the latter alone should be held responsible for the consequences resulting from the failure to examine the checks in question, and approve or reject them within a reasonable time. In contemplation of law the delivery of the checks to plaintiff's clerk was a delivery by the bank to the plaintiff himself, as the basis on which its credits were claimed. The bank was therefore entitled to have them examined, and, if rejected, returned within a reasonable time. That was not done, and, because of plaintiff's failure to perform his duty in that regard, he should not be permitted to recover. Any other rule would be inconsistent not only with general and long-established custom, but also with well-settled principles of law on the subject. Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 107, 29 L. ed. 811, 816, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 657; United Security L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Central Nat. Bank, 185 Pa. 586, 40 Atl. 97."

A very learned referee in United Security L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Central Nat. Bank, supra, in his report, confirmed by the court, held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover from the defendant the amounts paid and charged to its account on forged indorsements, because it had not promptly notified the defendant of the forgeries after it had what the referee held to be constructive notice of them. The judgment was reversed solely on the ground that the referee had erred in finding that the plaintiff had had constructive notice of the forgeries on March 27, 1894, and judgment was directed to be entered for it, because, when it actually discovered the forgeries on May 17, 1894, it gave immediate notice to the defendant. What the referee said and what was not held to be error was: "The referee is of opinion that it is not necessary for the defendant to make effective the defense based upon the want of diligence of the plaintiff in giving notice of the forgery to show with certainty that, had notice been given at an earlier day a fund belonging to Williams [the forger] was in existence which could have been attached and held. When it is once shown that the plaintiff failed to give prompt notice of the discovery of the forgery, the plaintiff's right of action is gone. The law assumes, and does not find it necessary to conduct an inquiry to verify the assumption, that, had the notice been given promptly, the Central Bank might have taken steps to protect itself against Williams." A sentence from the opinion in Iron City Nat. Bank v. Ft. Pitt Nat. Bank, 159 Pa. 46, 23 L.R.A. 615, 28 Atl. 195, is pointed to by counsel for the appellant as an expression from this court sustaining their contention. In that case the present chief justice did say that all a bank which has paid a forged check of one of its depositors "need do in any case is to give notice promptly according to the circumstances and the usage of the business; and, unless the position of the party receiving the money has been altered for the worse in the meantime, it would seem that the date of notice is not material." This must be read with reference to the facts in that case. As to those in the present one, it is not applicable. There the Fort Pitt National Bank, the defendant, which received the money on the forged check, had paid it out on the check of its depositor, to whose credit it had been placed, and all that we meant to say was that if the bank had not paid it out, and could still have protected itself by withholding it, the date of the notice of the forgery would not have been material.

The rule followed by the learned referee and court below is the only reasonable, logical, and proper one in this class of cases. It is approved by the Supreme Court of the United States in Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 657, where it is said by Harlan, J.: "If the depositor was guilty of negligence in not discovering and giving notice of the fraud of his clerk, then the bank was thereby prejudiced, because it was prevented from taking steps, by the arrest of the criminal, or by an attachment of his property, or other form of proceeding, to compel restitution. It is not necessary that it should be made to appear, by evidence, that benefit would certainly have accrued to the bank from an attempt to secure payment from the criminal. Whether the depositor is to be held as having ratified what his clerk did, or to have adopted the checks paid by the bank and charged to him, cannot be made, in this action, to depend upon a calculation whether the criminal had, at the time the forgeries were committed or subsequently, property sufficient to meet the demands of the bank. . . . As the right to seek and compel restoration and payment from the person committing the forgeries was in itself a valuable one, it is sufficient if it appears that the bank, by reason of the negligence of the depositor, was prevented from promptly, and, it may be, effectively, exercising it. Continental Nat. Bank v. National Bank, 50 N. Y. 583; Voorhis v. Olmstead, 66 N. Y. 113, 118; Knights v. Wiffen, L. R. 5 Q. B. 660; Casco Bank v. Keene, 53 Me. 103; Fall River Nat. Bank v. Buffinton, 97 Mass. 498."

Other questions raised by the appellant need not be considered in view of the correct conclusion of the court below that its delay in giving the appellee notice of the forgeries bars its right to recover.

The assignments of error are all overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

ED. KING, Respt.,
v.

ANTON GRAEF et al., Appts.

(136 Wis. 548, 117 N. W. 1058.)

Sale — Sunday — consummation.

1. Delivery of a car load of potatoes on Monday, and the payment and receipt of the purchase money, constitute a complete sale and delivery, although the transaction was in pursuance of a parol contract made on Sunday.

Same — sample — warranty.

2. An express warranty of a car load of potatoes may be found from the fact that at the time of the sale a few bags were opened and examined, and the owner's agent represented that the rest of the potatoes in the car were as good as those examined, on which representation the buyer relied.

(October 20, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Outagamie County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of warranty in a sale of a car load of potatoes. Affirmed.

Case Note. — Delivery on week day pursuant to contract made on Sunday.

The foregoing case presents rather a unique question. Goods were delivered and paid for under a guaranty upon Monday, but the terms of the sale were discussed and agreed upon on Sunday, and the question is, Will the fact that the terms were talked over and agreed to upon Sunday so taint the sale that the law will refuse to recognize or enforce the contract? This note will be confined to cases involving a similar state of facts, and will not include cases which treat merely of the question of a subsequent ratification of a contract made upon Sunday.

Upon the question of validity of contract partially made on Sunday and perfected on a secular day, see case note to Jacobson v. Bentzler, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1151.

The cases for the most part follow the rule enunciated in KING v. GRAEF, and hold that the mere fact that the terms of the sale were agreed upon on Sunday will not invalidate a contract where the delivery and payment took place upon a secular day, the cases generally holding that the delivery and payment in themselves were sufficient to constitute a complete contract regardless of what may have taken place upon Sunday. And this is true notwithstanding the fact that in many of the jurisdictions the general rule prevails that a contract made and executed upon Sunday is void ab initio, and consequently cannot be ratified.

Thus, in Butler v. Lee, 11 Ala. 885, 48 Am. Dec. 230, it was held that, when nothing was done towards the performance or execution of a contract until a subsequent period, the fact that a similar contract had been previously made on Sunday would not bring the subsequent contract within the statute; this would not be a ratification of the contract previously made, but a new and substantive contract.

And in Hopkins v. Stefan, 77 Wis. 45, 45 N. W. 676, it was held that, if goods were shipped by the plaintiff and received by the defendant on a secular day on the faith of the defendant's engagement, made upon such a day, to pay for them, then he would be legally liable to pay for them, though a 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

similar promise may have been made on a Sunday to the same effect.

Although the prices of the articles set out in an account sued on were agreed upon on Sunday, it was held, in Rosenblatt v. Townsley, 73 Mo. 536, that, as the contract of sale was not completed until the day following, when the goods were delivered, the contract could not be regarded as a contract made on Sunday.

So, in Bloxsome v. Williams, 3 Barn. & C. 232, it was held that the sale of a horse by a delivery thereof and the payment of the agreed price by the vendee upon a secular day is not vitiated by the fact that the terms were agreed to upon Sunday.

Where the vendee retained the privilege of examining the goods before the sale would be completed, which examination took place upon a secular day, when the sale was in fact completed, it was held, in Moseley v. Vanhooser, 6 Lea. 286, 40 Am. Rep. 37, that the fact that the price was agreed upon and the time of delivery was fixed upon a Sunday did not vitiate the transaction.

Possession of goods acquired on a secular day in pursuance of a contract made on Sunday was held, in Smith v. Bean, 15 N. H. 577, to be good as against the vendor, or as against his creditors.

And in Evert v. Kleinhagen, 6 S. D. 221, 60 N. W. 851, it was held that, where parties meet on Sunday, and talk over and substantially agree upon the terms of a purchase and sale of a pair of horses, during which representations are made by the seller which would constitute a warranty of soundness, and then agree that they will meet again on the next day, when secured notes shall be given for the purchase price, and the horses shall then be transferred to the purchaser, which is done, the warranty takes legal effect, as such, only when the trade is completed and the property in the horses passes to the purchaser, and is not void as a Sunday contract.

Although the parties to a bill of sale of a stock of merchandise were employed upon Sunday in taking an account of stock, making a schedule, and preparing a bill of sale, which was perhaps signed upon that day, nevertheless the fact that it was acknowledged and delivered upon Monday was suf-

Statement by Barnes, J.:

This action was brought to recover damages for breach of warranty. The defendants shipped a car load of potatoes from Hortonville to Watertown, in February, 1906, the car arriving at its destination on Sunday morning, February 9th. During the day the agent of the defendants, who was in charge of the car, made an oral agreement with the plaintiff whereby he agreed to sell the plaintiff the car load of potatoes at 58 cents per bushel. The evidence further tended to show that the agent represented that the car of potatoes sold was as good in every respect as other potatoes formerly sold by the defendants to the plaintiff, and that the potatoes formerly sold were a good merchantable article. Nothing more was done by the parties on Sunday, but on Monday morning the potatoes in the car were weighed, some 20 sacks in the car were opened and examined, and the potatoes were delivered to the plaintiff, and were paid for by him without any further examination, or without any opportunity to examine them except by unloading them from the car and opening the sacks. The testimony also tended to show that on Monday the agent in charge of the potatoes represented to the plaintiff that all of the potatoes in the car efficient to render the sale valid. Luebbing v. Oberkoetter, 1 Mo. App. 393.

So, in Bland v. Brookshire, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 539, it was held that a contract of sale was not void because some of its terms might have been fixed on Sunday, or because most of the business out of which the consideration for the contract arose was transacted on that day.

And parol negotiations on Sunday have no effect on the validity of a contract within the statute of frauds which is actually executed in writing and delivered on a secular day. Tyler v. Waddingham, 58 Conn. 375, 8 L.R.A. 657, 20 Atl. 335.

In P. J. Bowlin Liquor Co. v. Brandenburg, 130 Iowa, 220, 106 N. W. 497, where goods were ordered on Sunday, but were not delivered and accepted until a later day, it was held that the trial court correctly ruled that the sale could not be avoided as having been made in violation of the Sunday law. The court said: "Where the parties to an executory Sunday contract thereafter unite in recognizing its obligation by making and accepting a delivery of the property on a subsequent secular day, they are held to have ratified the agreement, and it may be enforced, according to its terms, to the same extent as if the negotiations had been begun and completed on the day of the delivery."

In Helm v. Briley, 17 Okla. 314, 87 Pac. 595, it was held that the payment of $10 on a secular day upon a debt of $60, the price of a mule sold on a previous Sunday, was such an acknowledgment of existing indebtedness as to amount to a contract and promise to pay at that time.

Some of the cases, however, are to the contrary. In these cases the court usually takes the position that the subsequent acts were not a complete transaction in themselves, but were merely an attempted ratification of the illegal contract, and therefore did not avail to validate the original contract.

Thus, in Aspell v. Hosbein, 98 Mich. 117, 57 N. W. 27, it was held that the mere removal of the goods by the vendee in pursuance of the terms of a sale made on Sunday was insufficient to validate the sale; the delivery must be accompanied by circumstances which in themselves supply the necessary elements of a contract, without depending on the Sunday contract for any essential elements.

So, a contract was held void in Kountz v. Price, 40 Miss. 341, where it was fully agreed upon between the parties to it on Sunday, and the goods were delivered on the same day, and nothing was done in the completion of it on a subsequent day but the execution of a note which was wholly in consideration of the sale and delivery of the goods on the previous day. In this case, however, there was apparently nothing more than an attempted ratification of the Sunday contract.

Some other cases may be noted which, although not strictly in point, may throw some light upon the question under discussion. It will be noticed that in each of these cases the recovery was on an implied assumpsit, the court giving recognition to the transactions taking place on the secular day only.

Where pigs were selected and marked on Sunday, and a price agreed upon, and a guaranty as to quality made, but the pigs were weighed and delivered on Monday, it was held, in Bradley v. Rea, 96 Mass. 20, that the price fixed on Sunday would not be binding, nor could the defendants avail themselves of the guaranty; but the plaintiff could recover only on an implied assumpsit for a quantum valebant. On the second appeal, 103 Mass. 188, 4 Am. Rep. 524, where the plaintiff showed that the pigs were delivered by him and accepted by the defendant with the purpose that they should be sold and paid for, it was held that this would constitute a sale, and, if nothing was said about the price, the law would imply a fair price; but that the defendant could not in any way rely upon the alleged guaranty given upon Sunday.

Where a number of mules were sold and a note given for the price thereof on Sunday, and all but two were delivered on that day, which two were delivered upon the following day, it was held, in Foreman v. Ahl, 55 Pa. 325, in an action on an implied assumpsit, that the trial court fell into error in suffering the jury to inquire into more than the liability of the defendant for the two mules.

were as good in quality as those examined, and that plaintiff relied on such statement. Upon unloading the car it was found that 100 bushels of the potatoes contained therein were frozen, and the evidence tended to show that they were frozen in transit, probably because of an accident to the car at Fond du Lac. On February 13th the plaintiff notified the defendants of the condition of the potatoes, and demanded settlement for the worthless potatoes found in the car. Payment was refused, and this action was brought, which resulted in a trial and judgment for the plaintiff for damages sustained by reason of the potatoes in the car being frozen, from which judgment this appeal is taken. Two errors are alleged: (1) That the contract was made on Sunday, and is therefore void, and cannot furnish any basis for recovery in any action; (2) that no express or implied warranty followed the sale, in any event, and that therefore the plaintiff could not recover.

Mr. A. M. Spencer, for appellants:

Agreement as to the terms of sale was reached on Sunday, and what they did thereafter was only carrying out the terms of the contract so made.

Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is well settled that contracts made in violation of the statute forbidding the doing of any business on Sunday are void, and cannot be made the basis of a recovery in the law. Pearson v. Kelly, 122 Wis. 660, 100 N. W. 1064; Vinz v. Beatty, 61 Wis. 645, 21 N. W. 787; Thomas v. Hatch, 53 Wis. 296, 10 N. W. 393; Howe v. Ballard, 113 Wis. 375, 89 N. W. 136; Brown v. Gates, 120 Wis. 349, 97 N. W. 221, 98 N. W. 205, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 85. Neither can a contract made on Sunday be validated by proving acts tending to show a ratification, because such a contract is void, and is not 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

susceptible of ratification. Jacobson v. Bentzler, 127 Wis. 566, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1151, 115 Am. St. Rep. 1052, 107 N. W. 7, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 633; Troewert v. Decker, 51 Wis. 46, 37 Am. Rep. 808, 8 N. W. 26; Brown v. Gates and Vinz v. Beatty, supra; Sherry v. Madler, 123 Wis. 621, 101 N. W. 1095. If the acts done on Monday were mere incidents to the Sunday transaction, they would not save it from the condemnation of the statute. Jacobson v. Bentzler, supra. It follows that, in determining the rights of the parties here, the Sunday transaction must be eliminated from consideration. In this case the potatoes were not weighed nor delivered until Monday, and no part of the purchase price was paid until Monday. The agreement of Sunday was void under the statute of frauds (Stat. 1898, § 2308), even if it were not subject to any other infirmity. It might, of course, if made on a secular day, be validated by partial or complete performance. It was perfectly lawful for the defendants to deliver, and for the plaintiff to pay for, a car load of potatoes on Monday. These acts were not mere incidents to the transaction on Sunday, but comprehended all the elements necessary to make a complete contract in itself. If the potatoes had been delivered on credit, the Sunday agreement would not govern as to price, but the defendant could recover on quantum meruit. The case is akin to an agreement for hire made on Sunday. The employee may not recover the contract price for his work, but he is entitled to recover what it is reasonably worth. Pearson v. Kelly, supra; Thomas v. Hatch, 53 Wis. 296, 10 N. W. 393. In Taylor v. Young, 61 Wis. 314, 21 N. W. 408, a settlement was agreed upon on Sunday for trespass done by live stock. The consideration was paid on a week day, and was retained by the claimants. The court held that the settlement, being fully performed on a week day, was valid. So, too, it was held in Vinz v. Beatty, supra, that, while a lease of premises made on Sunday was void and incapable of ratification, subsequent occupancy and payment of rent by the lessee created a tenancy, the terms of which would depend upon a contract to be implied from the acts of the parties. The delivery of the potatoes on Monday, coupled with the fact that a consideration was paid for them, was tantamount to a sale on that day, and the payment and receipt of a sum of money for such potatoes was tantamount to an agreement upon the price to be paid; and the conclusion therefore follows that the transaction on Monday constituted a complete contract of sale and delivery.

The testimony showed that, at the time of the delivery of the potatoes, they were in sacks; that some of the sacks were opened, and the potatoes were found to be all right; that all of them could not be examined without unloading the car and opening the sacks, which work would necessitate a considerable expenditure of time,—much more, perhaps, than the agent who made the sale desired to spend at Watertown; and that plaintiff promptly unloaded the car, and found that 100 bushels of the potatoes had been frozen, probably while in transit. A claim for damages was promptly made. The testimony further showed that, at the time the 20 sacks of potatoes were opened and examined, the agent of the defendants represented to the plaintiff that the rest of the potatoes in the car were as good as those examined, and that plaintiff relied upon such representation. This evidence was sufficient to warrant a finding of the jury that there was an express warranty of the potatoes sold and delivered, and that they did not conform to such warranty. If plaintiff were compelled to rely upon an implied warranty, we still think he was entitled to recover under the rule in Northern Supply Co v. Wangard, 117 Wis. 624, 98 Am. St. Rep. 963, 94 N. W. 785. Judgment affirmed.

Case Note. — Right to mechanics' lien for labor or material furnished on order of architect before abandonment of contract by contractor.

An extended search has revealed but few cases in point. These cases, while not all resulting in a denial of the right to a lien, are in general accord with the principles announced in STERNBERG v. FT. SMITH REFRIGERATOR WORKS, and, like that case, depended upon the decision of the question as to whether the architect, either by express terms of his contract, by direction of the owner, or by implication, became the agent of the owner, so that his act in procuring the materials or labor became the act of the principal, and binding upon him.

order for materials for the construction of a building was given by an architect before the contract was let, and such materials were paid for by the owner, and other materials, called "extras," were furnished in part while the original contractor was in charge of the construction work, and in part after he had absconded, and while the owner and his employees were in charge, no provision having been made in the original contract for the necessary material, it was held that the materials were furnished to the owner's agent, authorized to purchase material on his account, and that the materialmen were entitled to a mechanics' lien therefor under 2 Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 5900, providing that every person furnishing material to be used in the construction of any building shall have a lien therefor.

McCulloch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One S. K. Robinson entered into a written contract with appellant, Sternberg, to furnish material and construct two cottages, in the city of Ft. Smith, for the latter, at and for the sum of $3,950. The contract provided that the houses should be constructed in accordance with certain plans and specifications prepared by Sullenger, an architect, which are referred to in the contract, and expressly made a part thereof. The specifications contained the following: "Supplying labor, etc. Should the contractor, at any time during the progress of the work, refuse or neglect to supply a sufficiency of materials or workmen, the architect will have power to provide materials or workmen after three days' notice having been given in writing to furnish said materials and workmen. In case of noncompliance, the expense arising from such action shall be deducted from the contract price, the back percentage shall be forfeited, and, if necessary, the work relet. The materials and implements on the premises shall hereby become forfeited and sold if necessary to finish the work." Robinson abandoned the work before completing the

In Crockett v. Chattahoochee Brick Co. 95 Ga. 540, 21 S. E. 42, the court, in allowing foreclosure of a mechanics' lien for material furnished upon the order of the architect, who was the agent of the defendant only for the purpose of drawing plans and seeing that proper material was used, before the abandonment of his contract by the contractor, but upon the owner's credit, pledged by the architect, said: "Whether an architect who furnishes designs and undertakes to superintend the construction of a building is also such an agent of the owner as to bind him personally for material furnished to a contractor who undertakes to construct the building depends upon the contract between the owner and the architect; but, whether originally so authorized or not, if the architect assumes to act as such agent, and purchases material upon the credit of the owner, with his full knowledge and assent, the latter thereby ratifies the assumed agency of the architect, and is bound for the price of the material thus purchased." This judgment, however, seems to have been based upon a finding of the jury that the owner assented to the materials being furnished upon his credit.

But in Bouton v. McDonough County, 84 Ill. 384, it was held that subcontractors who had refused to complete a courthouse for a county unless paid directly by the county, the original contractor being insolvent, were not entitled to a mechanics' lien even though they finished the building in reliance upon a promise by the architect and superintendent that they would be so paid, as it was not shown that the architect and superintendent had any authority from the county to make such arrangement. A mechanics' lien was denied in this case on the further ground that the courthouse was a public building within the meaning of the lien law, against which a lien will not lie.

And in Lewis v. Slack, 27 Mo. App. 119, it was held that a contractor who had furnished extras at the order of an architect who was the "architect, agent, and superintendent" appointed by the principal "to erect and build" the building was not entitled to a mechanics' lien for the extras so furnished, as the architect had no right, as such, to direct extra work to be done, it being only such extra work as the defendant directed to be done, or authorized the architect to have done after the original contract with the plaintiff contractor was made, or such as was done with her knowledge or consent, knowing that it was extra work, that she could be charged for.

As bearing somewhat on the foregoing decisions, the principles involved being in the main similar, the following cases, in which the action was on contract for labor or material furnished on the order of the architect, are set out, although not strictly within the scope of this note:

Thus, in Campbell v. Day, 90 Ill. 363, where an architect who was only employed to supervise and direct the work to be done by the contractor ordered a subcontractor to substitute stone piers for defective brick ones which had been constructed in compliance with the original contract, it was held that, in the absence of proof that the principal authorized his architect to bind him for the work, he had no authority to employ another than the original contractor to do work which the contractor had undertaken to do.

And in Stuart v. Cambridge, 125 Mass. 102, where the contract provided that it should be lawful for the architect to direct in writing for additions to or deviations from the original plans, additional work performed at the oral direction of the architect "to go ahead and do the work as he directed, and that they would be paid for it," could not be recovered for, as the direction therefor, being oral, was not in conformity with the terms of the contract.

But in Gibson County v. Motherwell Iron & Steel Co. 123 Ind. 364, 24 N. E. 115, where the board of commissioners let a contract for the construction of a courthouse, and appointed an architect, giving into his hands full supervision of the construction, it was held that such architect became the agent of the county, and that he could bind the county for work done at his order by a subcontractor, beyond that contemplated by the original contract, although there was no agreement as to the price of the extra work, and the order therefor was not in writing and attached to the original contract, as provided for in case additions or omissions should be desired in the construction of the building.

houses, and the same were completed by other parties employed by appellant, in accordance with the contract. At the time of the abandonment appellant had paid out, on certificates of the architect, for labor and material, the sum of $2,913.33, and it cost him the additional sum of $1,369 to complete the houses, making an excess, which he paid out over the contract price. Appellees, Ft. Smith Refrigerator Works and Kenney Bros., instituted suits in equity, to recover the price of material furnished for use in the buildings, and to have liens declared on the buildings and lot. The chancellor found in their favor, and entered a decree accordingly.

Robinson got sick during the progress of the work on the buildings, but the work was continued, for a time, under supervision of the architect, before final abandonment, when appellant relet the contract for completing the buildings to other parties for the sum named above. During the time Robinson was sick, and before he finally abandoned the work, appellees furnished the material in question upon orders given by the architect. The chancellor found that the orders were given without any authority from appellant, except the authority implied from the terms of the contract with Robinson, and we think the proof sustains the finding. Appellant expressly declined to bind himself to pay for material to be furnished by one of the appellees, and as to the other, he was not consulted. The chancellor decided that the contract itself constituted sufficient authority, from appellant to the architect, to purchase the material for him, and to bind him for the payment thereof. The conclusion of the chancellor is stated in the following language: "The purchases thus made by the architect became a debt, in favor of Sternberg, against the contractor, and the claim must take its place, and assume the chances of payment, as if furnished by an independent materialman; but each is a basis for a lien against his building under the circumstances, the same as if there had been no contract between him and Robinson, or as if he had made a direct personal purchase of the material." We think that this interpretation of the contract was erroneous. The stipulation in question did not constitute the architect the agent of the owner for the purpose of procuring labor and material for the building. The builder obligated himself in the contract to furnish these, and to complete the building for a stated price; and, in this particular clause of the contract, he expressly agreed that, if he failed to furnish sufficient labor and material, the architect might do so, and deduct the cost from the contract price. The statute would give a lien, as to subcontractors, to the extent of the original contract price, for labor or material furnished under these circumstances. But the clause of the contract in question did not authorize the architect to bind the owner, or to create a lien on the building, beyond the original contract price. This feature of the contract was manifestly inserted for the benefit of the owner, so that the architect could require the furnishing of labor and material pursuant to the contract; but, until work was abandoned by the contractor, and the owner took charge for the purpose of completing the building, or unless he authorized the architect to procure labor and material for the building, he cannot be held liable, nor can liens be asserted against his building beyond the original contract price. The contract did not constitute the architect the agent of the owner for the purpose of procuring labor and material, as that was within the obligation of the builder. We are therefore of the opinion that the chancellor erred in holding appellant liable, beyond the contract price, for material furnished.

Under the rule laid down by this court in Long v. Charles T. Abeles & Co. 77 Ark. 156, 93 S. W. 67, all who furnish, to a principal contractor, labor or material used in the construction of a building, are entitled, on equal footing, to liens on the building, to an amount not exceeding the original contract price; or, where work has been abandoned by the principal contractor, to the amount of the contract price after deducting the cost of completing the building, in accordance with the contract; and the owner cannot discriminate between persons who perform labor or furnish material, but must prorate the contract price between them. To this extent the case of Barton v. Grand Lodge, 1 O. O. F. 71 Ark. 35, 70 S. W. 305, was overruled. The amount paid out by appellant for labor and material before Robinson abandoned the work, together with the amount necessarily expended in completing the building after abandonment, exceeded the original contract price. Appellee Ft. Smith Refrigerator Works, according to the proof in the record, received its pro rata of the amount paid by appellant, and is entitled to no more; but it does not appear that Kenney Bros. have been paid anything at all. So, under the rule in Long v. Charles T. Abeles & Co. they are entitled to their pro rata of the difference between the contract price and the amount paid out by appellant in completing the buildings after Robinson abandoned the work. We cannot, from the proof before us, ascertain precisely what their property share is.

The decree is reversed, with directions to dismiss the complaint of Ft. Smith Refrigerator Works for want of equity, and to ascertain the amount of pro rata of the contract price due Kenney Bros., and decree a lien therefor, in accordance with this opinion.

Case Note. — Proximate cause; weather conditions as an independent, intervening, efficient cause.

This note is confined to cases which discuss the question whether a weather condition or atmospheric change which intervenes, in time, between a negligent act and a subsequent loss, is to be deemed the proximate cause of the loss. Cases involving the proximate cause of losses in respect to contracts, as in insurance, for instance, have been excluded. And cases have also been excluded which involve the question of the proximate cause of the loss of goods which, by a negligent delay on the part of a carrier, have been exposed to loss or injury by flood, etc.

Upon the question of anticipation as an element of proximate cause, see case note to Kreigh v. Westinghouse, C. K. & Co. 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 684.

Negligent fires spread by wind.

A large number of cases involving the question of weather conditions as an independent, efficient, intervening cause have to do with a wind which facilitates the spread of a fire which has been negligently started. The cases generally hold that an ordinary wind, even though it is a high wind, cannot be considered as an independent, intervening cause, nor is a mere change in the direction of the wind so considered; but, where the wind is extraordinary and unusual, some cases hold that it so breaks the causal connection between the negligent act and the resulting loss as to relieve the defendant from the effects of his negligence.

In Union P. R. Co. v. McCollum, 2 Kan. App. 319, 43 Pac. 97, the distinction between an ordinary wind and one of extraordinary force is thus set out: "One setting out a fire on the prairie is bound to take into consideration any such merely natural occurrences. If the winds did not fan the flames and sweep them with such destructive and often uncontrollable force, prairie fires would not leave so many black-a count therein is bad in substance, or fails to allege a cause of action, does not comply with the statute requiring the substantial matters of law intended to be argued to be stated, and will not avail as a demurrer, unless it plainly appears from a reading of the declaration or count that it does not, by direct statements, or by fair inferences drawn therefrom, contain all the essentials of a cause of action.

Railroads — injury to property — duty in operating.

2. The right of a railroad company to run its engines and trains over its tracks is coupled with the duty to so operate the engine as not to negligently injure the property of others near the track. The duty arises by implication of law out of the relation of the parties to each other and the circumstances of the case.

Negligence — proximate cause.

3. The negligent act or omission for which ened ruins in their paths. But it cannot be said in such cases that a wind which is neither unusual nor extraordinary is an independent, intervening cause of the spread of the flames. It is simply a natural force which is exerted upon almost every fire, as a contributing cause, to the doing of more or less damage. When two causes combine to produce an injury, both of which are proximate in their character, the one being the result of culpable negligence and the other an occurrence for which neither party is responsible, the negligent party is liable if the injury would not have been sustained but for such negligence. If there had been the intervention of such an extraordinary force as a whirlwind, as was the case in Marvin v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 79 Wis. 140, 11 L.R.A. 506, 47 N. W. 1123, a different question would be presented. The independent, intermediate agency which may become the proximate cause, and thus stand between the injurious results and a prior wrongful act, must also be a force whose intervention or contribution in bringing about the results could not have been foreseen by the exercise of reasonable diligence on the part of the wrongdoer."

As was suggested, the cases generally hold that an ordinary and not unusual wind, although it may cause the fire to spread to a greater extent than it would had there been no wind, is not to be deemed an independent, efficient, intervening cause. And the mere fact that the wind is high does not change the rule, provided that it is not an extraordinary and unusual wind.

Thus, in Lillibridge v. McCann, 117 Mich. 84, 41 L.R.A. 381, 72 Am. St. Rep. 553, 75 N. W. 288, it was held that a wind existing at the time a building is set on fire is not an intervening cause of the burning of another building to which the fire is carried.

So, in East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Hesters, 90 Ga. 11, 15 S. E. 828, it was held that a high wind, unless shown to be extraordinary, by which a fire negligently started was facilitated in passing from one a party is liable in damages in one that proximately, i. e., in ordinary, natural sequence, causes, or contributes to causing, an injury to another, when no independent, efficient cause intervenes, and the injured party is not at fault.

Same — results.

4. Liability for negligence extends to all its natural, probable, and ordinary results. An injury that, under the circumstances, is the natural, probable, and ordinary result of a negligent act or omission is, in law, held to have been contemplated by the negligent party as a probable and proximate result of the negligence, when he is informed, or by ordinary observation would have been informed, of the facts and circumstances attending the negligence.

Same — contributing causes — weather conditions.

5. The ordinary conditions or forces of nature, such as ordinary wind, cold, heat, and the like, that are usual at the time and place side to the other of roads traversing the district, would not be considered an intervening, efficient cause.

And, in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Cullers, 81 Tex. 382, 13 L.R.A. 542, 17 S. W. 19, it was held that a railroad company was not relieved from liability for injuries caused by fire started through its negligence, by the facts that the fire had traveled over considerable space and had been revived by a strong wind after having apparently gone out before doing the damage which occurred the day after the fire had started.

So, in Indiana, I. & I. R. Co. v. Hawkins, 81 Ill. App. 570, the court said: "We are of opinion the proximate cause of the damage to appellee was not the act of God or inevitable accident, but resulted solely from human agency, for which appellant was responsible. . . . It is matter of common experience and observation in this western prairie country that just such gusts of wind as this apparently was are liable to spring up at any time, especially when a fire is started in dry grass and weeds, such as accumulate in the fall of the year. Fire is a dangerous element, and one who sets it out upon the open prairie must be prepared to take care of it and prevent its escaping and doing damage to others, or be liable for the consequences."

Where, from the evidence, it was not clear whether the plaintiff's buildings were set on fire by sparks from the defendant's engine or by sparks carried by a high wind from a pile of sawdust which had previously been fired by sparks from the engine, the court said, in Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Johnston, 128 Ala. 283, 29 So. 771: "In either case the cause was not so remote as to relieve the defendant from liability. That winds might occur sufficient to carry fire from the sawdust to those premises was an event the defendant ought reasonably to have expected and guarded against, to the extent, at least, of using due care to prevent an unnecessary escapement of sparks; and its failure to do so, if proven, shows and under the circumstances, and that reasonably should have been expected or foreseen as probably to occur, are not, in general, independent, efficient causes, when they affect or operate upon a negligent act or omission in causing an injurious result.

Same — contemplation.

6. Those who are negligent are held in law to know the usual effect of ordinary, natural conditions and forces upon a negligent act or omission, and to have contemplated the probable effect of such conditions and forces upon their negligence or upon its proximate results, and to be liable in damages for the natural and probable proximate results of the negligence.

Same — contributing cause.

7. Where an action is brought for an injury that is the result of the negligence of the defendant and of some other contributing cause not an independent efficient cause, and the result could not have been produced in the absence of either contributing cause, negligence supporting the complaint. The wind was but a natural condition establishing the connection between the alleged negligence, if proven, and the injury; and was not, in a legal sense, an intervening cause breaking such causal connection."

So, in Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Nitsche, 126 Ind. 229, 9 L.R.A. 750, 22 Am. St. Rep. 582, 26 N. E. 51, it was held that an ordinary wind is not an independent, intervening cause so as to relieve a railroad company from the consequences of its negligent act in permitting a fire in a peat bed upon its own premises to extend to the plaintiff's premises.

And the Nitsche Case was cited with approval, and followed, in a number of cases wherein fire was carried by an ordinary wind from the place where it was started to the plaintiff's premises. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Williams, 131 Ind. 30, 30 N. E. 696; Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Lesh, 158 Ind. 423, 63 N. E. 794; Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Luddington, 10 Ind. App. 636, 38 N. E. 342; Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Ross, 24 Ind. App. 222, 56 N. E. 451.

And the Nitsche Case was followed in Ft. Wayne Cooperage Co. v. Page (Ind. App.) 82 N. E. 83, where it was held that the wind which blew steam negligently permitted to escape from the defendant's mill across the street, and frightened the plaintiff's horse, was not an independent, intervening cause.

In Pennsylvania Co. v. Whitlock, 99 Ind. 16, 50 Am. Rep. 71, where a railroad company negligently, but unintentionally, set fire to one of its buildings, and the flames were carried by the wind to the plaintiff's building, which was destroyed, it was held that the wind should be considered as an intervening, independent agency, without which the fire would not have extended to and consumed the plaintiff's property. The court said: "The unexpected intervention of the wind, even when the fire is voluntarily set upon the premises of the person setting it, has generally been accepted as the defendant's negligence is a proximate cause of the injury, if, under the circumstances attending the defendant's negligence, the injury was a probable, natural, and usual result of the two contributing causes that the defendant is held to have contemplated, and the plaintiff or those for whom he is responsible did not contribute proximately to the injury.

Same — destruction of safety appliance — liability.

8. Where a means, such as a cover, has been provided by the owner of property to protect it from an injury that will probably occur, and such cover is, without the fault of the owner, injured or destroyed by the negligence of another, who, under the circumstances of the case, knew, or should have known, of the use to which the cover was applied and of the injury that would probably result from the destruction of the cover; and the destruction of the cover defeats the sole purpose for which it was used,—damages may be recovered for injuries to the property that was so protected, which proximately follow or result from the destruction of the cover provided for the protection of the property injured.

Railroads — fires — negligence — liability.

9. Owners of property have a right to use it in any manner desired that is not inconsistent with the rights of others. This includes the right of those having land near a railroad track to place a canvas cover over plants growing on the land, and the mere fact that the cover is within the reach of sparks of fire emitted from locomotive engines passing on the track near by does not relieve the railroad company from liability for its negligence in permitting sparks to escape from the engine and burn the cover.

Negligence — fires — damages — intervening cause — act of God.

10. Where a cover is put over growing plants and fruit to protect them from ordinary and usual cold and frost, and the cover is burned by the negligence of another, the intervention of a new and independent agency, and this inference from the intervening force of the wind ought, we think, to have a much stronger and more general application to cases of merely accidental or unintentional fires." But in Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Nitsche, supra, the court said that the decision in the Whitlock Case was to be confined to the particular facts of the case, and in Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Williams, supra, the Whitlock Case was expressly disapproved in part at least.

And a mere change in the direction of the wind is usually not considered to be an independent, intervening cause.

Thus, in Northern P. R. Co. v. Lewis, 2 C. C. A. 446, 7 U. S. App. 254, 51 Fed. 658, reversed on other grounds in 162 U. S. 366, 40 L. ed. 1002, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 831, the court said: "A simple and not unusual change in the direction of the wind cannot be said to disturb the unbroken connection between the wrongful act and the injury, and hence is not an intervening cause."

So, also, in Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Welch, 53 Fla. 145, 44 So. 250, it was held that, conceding the fact that there was a change in the direction of the wind so as to blow the fire onto the land of the plaintiff and into his grove, the mere change in the direction of the wind was not an intervening cause, so as to deprive the plaintiff of his right to recover.

And in Poeppers v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 67 Mo. 715, 29 Am. Rep. 518, it was held that the fluctuation of the wind could not be deemed an independent, intervening cause between the negligent starting of a fire and the burning of plaintiff's buildings 5 miles away, to which place the fire had been driven by the wind. And to the same effect was the decision in Hightower v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 67 Mo. 726, where the loss was occasioned by the same fire. And to the same general effect was the decision in Kenney v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 70 Mo. 252.

Where, in an action for damages for negligently allowing fire to escape from the premises of the defendant, the defense is that the loss was occasioned by a sudden shift of the wind, it is held in Mahaffey v. J. L. Rumbarger Lumber Co. 61 W. Va. 571, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1263, 56 S. E. 983, that it must be shown, in order that such defense may avail, that the change of wind was unusual and extraordinary, and such as in its nature not reasonably to be expected.

But, to the contrary was the decision in Read v. Nichols, 118 N. Y. 224, 7 L.R.A. 130, 23 N. E. 468, where a high north wind carried sparks from defendant's chimney to a tall building situated some distance to the south. The wind changed to the south, and several buildings between the building where the fire originated and the defendant's shop, from which the sparks came, including the plaintiff's houses, were burned. There was a lack of proper fire-fighting apparatus. The court held that the original negligence was the remote cause of the plaintiff's loss, and the change of the wind, lack of apparatus, etc., were to be deemed the proximate causes. In the decision the court followed Ryan v. New York C. R. Co. 35 N. Y. 210, 91 Am. Dec. 49, in which the essential point determined was that the defendant could not have anticipated that a fire would spread from building to building, and consequently was not liable for the loss of plaintiff's building, which took fire from a shed in which a fire was negligently started by the defendant.

In a few cases in which a fire negligently started has been spread by a high or unusual wind, the wind has been held to be an independent, efficient, intervening cause.

Thus, in Fent v. Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. 59 Ill. 349, 14 Am. Rep. 13, where a fire was started by a spark from a locomotive and was carried from one building to another, the court said: "If loss has been caused by the act, and it was, under the circumstances, a natural consequence which injury to the growing plants and fruit by ordinary and usual cold and frost that should have been expected at the time and place of the negligence is not such an act of God as will relieve from liability the party who negligently burned the cover.

Pleading — declaration — essentials.

11. Where negligence is the basis of recovery, the declaration should contain allegations of the negligent act or omission of the defendant, and also allegations of facts to show injury to the plaintiff, and that such injury was a proximate result of the negligence alleged.

Railroads — fires — pleading — damages.

12. A declaration which states that the defendant railroad company "so carelessly and negligently managed and operated one of its locomotives . . . that fire escaped therefrom and set fire to the canvas cover or cloth with which a pinery belonging to the plaintiff and situated near to the track of the defendant . . . was covered, and any reasonable person could have anticipated, then the act is a proximate cause, whether the house burned was the first or the tenth, the latter being so situated that its destruction is a consequence reasonably to be anticipated from setting the first on fire. If, on the other hand, the fire has spread beyond its natural limits by means of a new agency,—if, for example, after its ignition, a high wind should arise, and carry burning brands to a great distance, by which a fire is caused in a place that would have been safe but for the wind,—such a loss might fairly be set down as a remote consequence, for which the railway company should not be held responsible." And this case is cited with approval, and followed, in Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Muthersbaugh, 71 Ill. 572.

And a strong wind which arises while a fire is in progress, and carries it where it could not otherwise have spread, and there destroys property, was held, in Marvin v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 79 Wis. 140, 11 L.R.A. 506, 47 N. W. 1123, to be an intervening cause which will relieve the party responsible for the original fire from liability for the loss of such property.

The decision in Tyler v. Ricamore, 87 Va. 406, 12 S. E. 799, is to the contrary, but it is a rather extreme case. It was there held that the court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury that, although the defendant had started the fire by negligent conduct, yet, if the fire was propagated and carried farther on by a high and unusual wind, breaking the continuity of the fire, then the injury was too remote and the plaintiff could not recover. The court said: "In the first place, the instruction was not applicable to this case, except that it was a very windy day and the fire was carried before it, as was to be expected, as the usual and ordinary consequence; and, in the second place, if the wind had been unusual and peculiar, it would not have been proper. Having once set the fire, the injury resulting burned a large part, to wit, about 1 acre of said cover;" and alleges damages in a stated amount,—is sufficient to authorize a recovery of general damages or such as necessarily result from the burning of the canvas cover to the extent of its value within the stated amount.

Negligence — pleading — materiality.

13. In an action for damages, where it is, in effect, alleged that in the month of January the defendant negligently burned the cover used to protect growing plants and fruit from injury by ordinary cold and frost usual "in the winter season" at the place of the negligence, of which use to prevent probable injury the defendant knew, or should have known, that, shortly after the burning of the cover, the plants and fruit were injured by frost and cold, which injury defendant should have anticipated; and that the injury "was caused by the negligence of the defendant in burning part of the cover as aforesaid;" and damages are claimed,—it is not necessary to allege "that, at the time of therefrom was proximate, and not remote, if the burning was naturally and reasonably to be expected from the setting of the fire in the place where it was set."

In some cases it has been held that the question whether the wind was an independent, efficient, intervening cause was a question for the jury.

Thus, in Henry v. Southern P. R. Co. 50 Cal. 176, it was held that, in view of the long, dry season in California and the prevalence of certain winds in the valleys there, it might be left to the jury to determine whether the spreading of a fire from one field to another was not the natural, direct, or proximate consequence of the original firing.

So, also, in Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Pindar, 53 Ill. 447, 5 Am. Rep. 57, it was held that whether a loss occasioned by a fire negligently started by a railroad, but carried along by a high wind, was too remote to authorize a recovery from the railroad company was a question for the jury.

And in Gram v. Northern P. R. Co. 1 N. D. 252, 46 N. W. 972, it was held that, in an action for damages caused by a fire which escaped from one of defendant's trains and ignited upon defendant's right of way, and which spread over adjoining land, and finally destroyed plaintiff's property, whether the fire started by the defendant was the proximate cause of the injury complained of, or whether such injury was the result of another and independent cause, was, under the evidence, a question of fact for the jury; and the court did not err in submitting such question to the jury, with proper directions as to the law. This is true where the wind shifts or increases in violence after the fire starts, and before the damage is done. And to the same general effect was the decision in Pennsylvania & N. Y. Canal & R. Co. v. Lacey, 89 Pa. 458.

Accidents occasioned by winds.

It is difficult to formulate any rule which the occurrence of the fire, the weather was such that cold and frost could be anticipated by the defendant," or "that in the month of January cold and frost of such character as to damage growing plants ordinarily occurred." The court knows judicially that January is in the winter season. If frost or cold of any degree injured the plants and fruit, as a proximate result of the defendant's negligence, under the circumstances as alleged, the extent of the cold or the condition of the weather at the time of the negligence is not material.

Same — sufficiency.

14. An allegation that injury to growing plants and fruit by frost and cold occurred after and as a result of the negligent burning of the cover used to protect the plants will govern cases where a negligent act is followed by an injury, immediately occasioned, however, by a wind of greater or less velocity. Much depends upon the strength of the wind and the character of the negligent act.

Thus, a very violent wind which blew down defendant's uncompleted barn and injured the plaintiff was held, in Valiquette v. Fraser, 9 Ont. L. Rep. 57, to be an independent, intervening cause, which would protect the defendant from his alleged act of negligence in leaving the barn in an insecure condition.

So, in Sutphen v. Hedden, 67 N. J. L. 324, 51 Atl. 721, it was held that the owner of premises would not be liable for injuries caused by the blowing down of barriers around an excavation if the wind was of such extraordinary violence that a reasonably careful person would not be bound to have anticipated it.

And a high wind which blew down a tree, making an opening in a fence between the defendant's land and plaintiff's, and not the defendant's negligence in leaving open a gate from his premises to the right of way of a railroad, was held, in Strobeck v. Bren, 93 Minn. 428, 101 N. W. 795, to be the proximate cause of the loss of plaintiff's cattle, which passed through the opening in the fence, and through the open gate onto the tracks, and were killed.

A furious wind which blew a car from the track was held in Blythe v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 15 Colo. 333, 11 L.R.A. 615, 22 Am. St. Rep. 403, 25 Pac. 702, to be the proximate cause of the loss of goods destroyed by a fire which immediately followed, without negligence on the part of the carrier, as the result of the overturning of the car, in which were burning a lamp and a coal fire.

But where a long ladder, the lower end resting in a village street outside the sidewalk, the upper end inclining over and across the walk and resting upon a building, was blown down in an unusual wind, and injured a passer-by, it was held, in Moore v. Townsend, 76 Minn. 64, 78 N. W. 880, that the negligence of the owner and occupants of the building in allowing the ladder to remain across the walk, and of the village and fruit from frost and cold sufficiently connects by ordinary, natural sequence the negligence and the injury.

Railroads — contributory negligence — presumption — effect.

15. In view of the peculiar risks and duties of railroad companies in the use of dangerous machinery running rapidly and carrying fire along the lines of road, the statutes of the state provide that railroad companies shall be liable for any damage to property by the running of trains or other machinery, unless the companies shall make it appear that their agents have exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, the presumption in all cases being against the companies; and that, if the complainant and the agents of the companies are both at authorities, after knowledge of the facts, was the proximate cause of the injury, and not the unusual wind.

And, where certain walls were negligently left unprotected by iron work, and were blown down in a storm, it was held, in Meyer v. Haven, 37 App. Div. 194, 55 N. Y. Supp. 864, that the negligence in failing to protect the walls was a concurring cause with the storm, and the party guilty of the negligence was liable for the loss.

So, in Detzur v. B. Stroh Brewing Co. 119 Mich. 282, 44 L.R.A. 500, 77 N. W. 948, it was held that an ordinary wind which blows broken glass out of a window is not the proximate cause of an injury caused by the fall of the glass, when there was negligence in leaving the window in such a condition that the glass was liable to fall out.

Where a fire has destroyed a building, and dangerous walls have been left standing, which have been blown down by a wind, a few cases have held that the wind would be a remote cause only, unless the owner has done all in his power to render the walls safe.

Thus, in Nordheimer v. Alexander, 10 Can. S. C. 248, where a wall left standing after a fire destroyed the remainder of the building, was blown down by a wind, injuring plaintiff's premises, it was held that the wind could not be considered a vis major unless the accident could not have been anticipated or prevented.

And the negligence of the owner of premises upon which were standing the walls of a building destroyed by fire was held, in Schwarz v. Adsit, 91 Ill. App. 576, to be the proximate cause of injuries resulting from the falling of the walls during a high wind, where the owner had not done all in his power to render them safe or to remove them.

Miscellaneous cases.

Where the plaintiff's intestate was killed by a bolt of lightning which passed through a transformer which defendant had permitted to become defective, in Quincy Gas & Electric Co. v. Schmitt, 123 Ill. App. 647, fault, the former may recover, but the damages shall be diminished or increased by the jury in proportion to the amount of default attributable to the complainant. Under these statutes, a complainant has a right of action for the negligence of a railroad company, even if he has also been negligent; but the amount of recovery is affected by the complainant's negligence.

Pleading — demurrer — declaration good in part.

16. Where a declaration states a cause of action for any recovery, a demurrer thereto should be overruled.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Orange County to review the sustaining of a dethe court, in discussing the question of proximate cause, said that, if the death of the plaintiff's intestate was caused by an act of God unmixed with the alleged negligence of the appellant as a proximate cause, the latter cannot be held liable; if, however, he was negligent, and such negligence as a proximate cause alone, or, concurring with an act of God, caused the death, then the appellant is liable.

In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Hoag, 90 Ill. 339, where the defendant negligently permitted water to flow onto the plaintiff's premises, where it froze, which freezing caused injury to the plaintiff, the court said: "But, to claim exemption from liability for the consequences of such an act of nature, it must be such as could not have been foreseen and prevented by the exercise of any ordinary care and prudence. . . . Appellant must be held to have known that the water would freeze upon appellant's land at the time it was turned on it, it being a fact occurring in the course of nature, and be chargeable with the consequences resulting from the known action of frost in freezing water in combination with appellant's own act. The injury was one which might reasonably and naturally have been expected to result."

Where a storm caused cattle to travel to a washout and excavation negligently left by the defendant in a dangerous and unguarded condition, and the cattle were injured, it was held, in Big Goose & B. Ditch Co. v. Morrow, 8 Wyo. 537, 80 Am. St. R. p. 955, 59 Pac. 159, that the negligence of the defendant, and not the storm, was the proximate cause of the injury, as the result was one which might reasonably and naturally have been anticipated.

In Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Reeves, 10 Wall. 176, 19 L. ed. 909, it was held that a loss by flood or storm is a loss by act of God, and a common carrier is excused when the damage results from this cause immediately; and, if it is charged that the carrier's negligence contributed to the loss, the proof of this must come from those who assert or rely upon it.

In Louisiana Mut. Ins. Co. v. Tweed, 7 Wall. 44, 19 L. ed. 65, it was held that, un-murrer and the entering of judgment upon plaintiff's refusal further to amend a declaration in an action to recover damages for injuries caused by fire alleged to have been the result of the negligent operation of one of defendant's locomotives. Reversed.

Statement by Whitfield, J.:

On a former writ of error the original declaration in this cause was held to be defective, and a judgment obtained against the railroad company was reversed. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Benedict Pineapple Co. 52 Fla. 165, 42 So. 529.

The amended declaration is as follows:

"The Benedict Pineapple Company, a cor-

der a policy of insurance which exempted the insurance company from losses due to explosions, the company was not liable for a loss by fire which was started by an explosion in another building situated across the street. The court said: "The explosion undoubtedly produced or set in operation the fire which burned the plaintiff's cotton. The fact that it was carried to the cotton by first burning another building supplies no new force or power which caused the burning. Nor can the accidental circumstance that the wind was blowing in a direction to favor the progress of the fire towards the warehouse be considered a new cause." This case, however, is not strictly within the scope of this note, which, as was stated in the beginning, is confined to cases of negligence, and does not include cases of contracts.

In an action for damages for the breach of a contract to thresh grain, which is not entered into under such special or exceptional circumstances that it may be reasonably inferred that other than the ordinary liability was contemplated by the parties, it was held, in Hayes v. Cooley, 13 N. D. 204, 100 N. W. 251, that the loss of grain by exposure to storm is a remote, and not a proximate, consequence of the breach, and will not sustain a recovery, although such loss would not have occurred had the contract been carried out within a reasonable time.

In McClary v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 3 Neb. 44, 19 Am. Rep. 631, it was held that the fact that a train was running three quarters of an hour behind time was not the proximate cause of injuries to a passenger, received by reason of the train being upset by a sudden gust of wind which crossed the track, but not the part of the track where the cars would have been had they been on time.

And a storm which sinks a barge in a lake is the proximate cause of the loss of the barge, notwithstanding the fact that but for the negligent delay of the owner of a tug the barge would have been in a place of safety at the time of the storm. Daniels v. Ballantine, 23 Ohio St. 532, 13 Am. Rep. 264.

poration existing under the laws of the state of Florida, by Massey & Warlow, its attorneys, sues the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, a corporation:

"For that the defendant is a railroad corporation operating a railroad through the city of Orlando, and in the winter season, to wit, on or about the 7th day of January, A. D. 1905, it so carelessly and negligently managed and operated one of its locomotives while drawing a train through said city, in Orange county aforesaid, that fire escaped from said locomotive and set fire to the canvas or cloth with which a pinery belonging to the plaintiff and situated near to the track of the defendant in the city aforesaid was covered, and burned a large part, to wit, about 1 acre, of the said cover.

"And the plaintiff says, also, that in the said pinery a large number of pineapple plants were set and growing, some of which had on them fruit at various stages of development, and that pineapple plants and fruit were likely to be damaged by frost and cold in the said city of Orlando (in which said pinery was situated) and the latitude thereof in the winter season, and that it was usual and customary in and about the said city and latitude to cover pineries with canvas or cloth in order to protect the plants and fruit growing thereon from damage by frost and cold, and also to keep in the heat produced or generated by fires maintained in the pineries during spells of frost and cold which ordinarily come in the winter season on short notice, and which otherwise would damage the plants and fruits; and that, in accordance with said custom, the plaintiff had provided its said pinery with a good canvas or cloth cover for the purpose aforesaid, and had also provided stoves and fuel in the said pinery ready and sufficient (if the pinery were covered as aforesaid) to heat the said pinery immediately upon the coming of cold and frost dangerous to the said plants and fruit, and thus preserve them from damage therefrom. And the plaintiff says that, shortly after the burning of the portion of the cover as aforesaid, and before the plaintiff, by exercise of any reasonable diligence by it, could replace the part of the cover which had been burned through the negligence of the defendant as aforesaid, the plants and fruit were damaged by frost and cold for want of the complete cover and the subsequent inability of the plaintiff to control the temperature within said pinery.

"And the plaintiff says that the defendant well knew, or ought to have known, that pineapple plants and fruit in the city of Orlando and in the latitude thereof were likely to be damaged by frost and cold in the winter season, and that it was usual and customary to cover the pineries aforesaid with canvas or cloth in order to protect the plants and fruit from damage by frost and cold, and also to keep in the heat produced or generated as aforesaid, during spells of frost and cold as aforesaid; and well knew, or ought to have known, the purpose for which the plaintiff's said pinery was covered with canvas or cloth as aforesaid, and that damage to plants and fruit therein was likely to happen at that season by the burning of a large part of the said cover as aforesaid. And the plaintiff says that, but for the burning of a large part of the cover through the negligence of the defendant as aforesaid, it, the said plaintiff, could have saved its said plants and fruit from damage by the particular frost and cold which damaged them, which damage was caused by the negligence of the defendant in burning part of the cover as aforesaid.

"And, also, for that the defendant is a railroad corporation operating a railroad through the city of Orlando, and in the winter season, to wit, on or about the 7th day of January, A. D. 1905, it ran a train through said city, in Orange county aforesaid, drawn by a locomotive which was so carelessly and negligently equipped and provided with proper apparatus to prevent the escape of fire from said locomotive that fire did escape therefrom and set fire to the canvas or cloth with which a pinery belonging to the plaintiff and situated near to the track of the defendant in the city aforesaid was covered, and burned a large part, to wit, about 1 acre, of the said cover.

"And the plaintiff says, also, that in the said pinery a large number of pineapple plants were set and growing, some of which had on them fruit at various stages of development, and that pineapple plants and fruit were likely to be damaged by frost and cold in the said city of Orlando (in which said pinery was situated) and the latitude thereof in the winter season, and that it was usual and customary in and about the said city and latitude to cover pineries with canvas or cloth in order to protect the plants and fruit growing therein from damage by frost and cold, and also to keep in the heat produced or generated by fires maintained in the pineries during spells of frost and cold which ordinarily come in the winter season on short notice, and which otherwise would damage the plants and fruit; and that, in accordance with said custom, the plaintiff had provided its said pinery with a good canvas or cloth cover for the purpose aforesaid, and had also provided stoves and fuel in the said pinery, ready and sufficient (if the pinery were covered as aforesaid) to heat the said pinery immediately upon the coming of cold and frost dangerous to the said plants and fruit, and thus preserve them from damage therefrom. And the plaintiff says that, shortly after the burning of the portion of the cover as aforesaid, and before the plaintiff, by exercise of any reasonable diligence by it, could replace the part of the cover which had been burned through the negligence of the defendant as aforesaid, the plants and fruit were damaged by frost and cold for want of the complete cover and the consequent inability of the plaintiff to control the temperature within said pinery.

"And the plaintiff says that the defendant well knew, or ought to have known, that pineapple plants and fruit in the city of Orlando and in the latitude thereof were likely to be damaged by frost and cold in the winter season, and that it was usual and customary to over the pineries aforesaid with canvas or cloth in order to protect the plants and fruit from damage by frost and cold, and also to keep in the heat produced or generated as aforesaid during spells of frost and cold as aforesaid, and well knew, or ought to have known, the purpose for which the plaintiff's said pinery was covered with canvas or cloth as aforesaid, and that damage to plants and fruit therein was likely to happen at that season by the burning of a large part of the cover as aforesaid. And the plaintiff says that, but for the burning of a large part of the cover through the negligence of the defendant as aforesaid, it, the said plaintiff, could have saved its said plants and fruits from damage by the particular frost and cold which damaged them, which damage was caused by the negligence of the defendant in burning part of the cover as aforesaid. And the plaintiff claims $10,000.00."

The following demurrer was interposed to the declaration:

"Now comes the defendant in the above suit, and says that the declaration and each count thereof is bad in substance and in law, and demurs thereto.

"Sparkman & Carter.

"And, for substantial matters of law to be argued to the court, says:

"First. That neither the declaration as a whole, nor either count thereof in itself, states a cause of action against the defendant.

"Second. That each count in the said declaration shows that the damage, if any, suffered by the plaintiff, was not the proximate result of any negligence on the part of the defendant.

"Third. That each count in the said declaration shows that the damage claimed by the said plaintiff, was caused by an act of God, and was not the proximate result of 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

any negligence chargeable against the defendant.

"Fourth. That neither count in said declaration alleges or charges any facts bringing home to the defendant the knowledge that the freeze which caused the damage to plaintiff might be reasonably expected by the said defendant.

"Fifth. That neither count in said declaration alleges facts to bring home to the defendant the knowledge that the freezing of the pineapple plants might be reasonably expected to follow directly and naturally from the burning.

"Sixth. That neither count in said declaration charges such a state of facts as would show that the damage suffered by the plaintiff might be reasonably expected from burning the canvas charged to have been burned."

The demurrer was sustained, and, the plaintiff not desiring to further amend the declaration, judgment for the defendant was entered, and the plaintiff on writ of error assigns as errors the sustaining of the demurrer and the entering of judgment for the defendant.

Messrs. Massey & Warlow for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Sparkman & Carter for defendant in error.

Whitfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is suggested that the first ground of the demurrer, that neither the declaration nor a count thereof states a cause of action, is in effect but a mere repetition of the statutory form of a demurrer, and is insufficient.

The General Statutes of 1906 contain the following provisions as to demurrers in pleadings at law: Section 1430, originally part of § 15 of chapter 1096, p. 28, Laws 1880-81: "No pleading shall be deemed insufficient for any defect which could heretofore only be objected to by special demurrer." Section 1444, originally § 36 of chapter 1096: "Either party may object by demurrer to the pleading of the opposite party, on the ground that such pleading does not set forth sufficient ground of action, defense, or reply." Section 1444, originally § 36 of chapter 1096: "The form of a demurrer shall be as follows, or to the like effect: 'The defendant (or plaintiff) says that the declaration (or plea) is bad in substance.' And the substantial matters of law intended to be argued shall be stated; and, if any demurrer shall be delivered without such statement or with a frivolous statement, it may be set aside by the court." Under this last section the demurrer to a pleading is the averment that it "is bad in substance." The statute originally required some substantial matter of law intended to be argued to be stated in the margin of the demurrer. The present statute does not specify how the substantial matters of law intended to be argued shall be stated, but it is usual to state them as grounds of the demurrer, as in this case. Any such grounds or specifications of matters of law that do not comply with the statute, or that are frivolous, may be disregarded by the court, and, if the demurrer contains no statement of substantial matters of law, or if the statements are frivolous, the demurrer may be set aside by the court as the statute provides.

Before the enactment of the statute first above quoted, the defects in a pleading that could be objected to by special demurrer were those relating to the form or manner of stating the matters contained in the pleadings, and not to the sufficiency in substance of the matters alleged as a ground of action, defense, or reply. The effect, therefore, of § 1430, is to dispense with the use of demurrers except to test the sufficiency of the matters of substance pleaded, without reference to the form or manner of statement. Sections 1441 and 1444, above quoted, refer to demurrers to test the sufficiency of the matters of substance stated as the ground of action, defense, or reply, without reference to the form or manner of statement.

Rule 30 of circuit-court common-law rules provides that, "upon demurrer to any declaration or other pleading, the party plaintiff or defendant may admit the cause of demurrer by filing an amended declaration or pleading, which shall do away with the cause of demurrer."

A purpose of the above statutory provisions and rule is to require that a demurrer presented to test the sufficiency of the substance of a pleading shall contain a statement of the substantial matters of law intended to be argued, so that the opposite party may be advised by the pleading itself of the particulars wherein the pleading is said to be insufficient, to the end that the party whose pleading is demurred to may amend or be prepared to sustain his pleading by argument on the demurrer. This course facilitates the hearing and aids the court in the disposition of causes in the interest of justice. Sledge v. Swift, 53 Ala. 110, text 114; Moore v. Heinke, 119 Ala. 627, 24 So. 374; Cowan v. Motley, 125 Ala. 369, 28 So. 70.

Defects of mere form and irrelevant or improper matters in a pleading in an action at law that prejudice or embarrass or delay the fair trial of the action may be reached by proper motion under § 1433 of the Gen-20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

eral Statutes of 1906. Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. Ashmore, 43 Fla. 272, 32 So. 832; State ex rel. Ellis v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 53 Fla. 711, 44 So. 230.

A demurrer or a ground thereof that in effect merely states that a declaration or a count therein is bad in substance, or fails to state a cause or right of action, does not comply with the statute requiring the substantial matters of law intended to be argued to be stated, and will not avail as a demurrer, unless it plainly appears from a reading of the declaration or count that it does not contain by its direct statements, or by fair inference from the direct statements, all of the essentials of a cause of action, or unless it plainly appears from the direct statements of the declaration, or count, or by fair inference therefrom, that the plaintiff has no cause or right of action, or has lost it, if it ever existed. In short, a demurrer or a ground thereof that in effect merely states that a declaration or a count therein does not allege a cause of action, or is bad in substance, will not be sustained, unless, upon a bare inspection of the declaration or count, it is clear that it fails to state the essentials of a cause of action, or shows that the plaintiff has no cause of action, e. g., if damages are claimed for negligence, and no negligence or no damage is alleged by direct statements or by fair inference from the allegations, or if all the essentials of a cause or right of action are alleged, and it appears from the declaration or count that the action is barred or destroyed by the act or default of the plaintiff, or otherwise. See State ex rel. Kittel v. Jennings, 47 Fla. 302, text 307, 35 So. 986; Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. Ashmore, 43 Fla. 272, 32 So. 832; Crawford v. Feder, 34 Fla. 397, 16 So. 287; Camp v. Hall, 39 Fla. 535, 22 So. 792; Jacksonville Electric Co. v. Schmetzer, 53 Fla. 370, 43 So. 85; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Benedict Pineapple Co. 52 Fla. 165, 42 So. 529, concurring opinion and authorities.

If it clearly appears that no cause or right of action is stated, the court may and should dismiss the action of its own motion; but, if it does not clearly appear that no cause or right of action is alleged, the court is not called upon to sustain a demurrer that in effect merely states that no cause of action is alleged, or that the declaration or count is bad in substance, without stating the substantial matters of law intended to be argued as required by the statute. The defendant's right to have the sufficiency in law to the pleading passed upon by the court depends upon the proper presentation of the matter to the court. The court may not act of its own motion or upon insufficient application, except in plain cases that require little more than a bare inspection of the pleading to determine.

Grounds of demurrer to a pleading that are in effect mere repetitions of the statutory form of a demurrer, i. e., that the pleading "is bad in substance," will not be considered unless upon an inspection it is clear that the pleading is fatally defective in substance. It does not appear from an inspection of the declaration in this case that it is fatally defective in substance. Therefore the first ground of the demurrer, that neither the declaration nor any count thereof states a cause of action, is of no avail.

The main questions presented are whether the negligent burning of a canvas cover used to protect growing pineapple plants and fruit from injury by cold and frost is a proximate cause of injury by cold and frost to the growing plants and fruit before the burned cover could, by reasonable diligence, be restored, so as to give the owner a right to recover damages for the injury to the plants and fruit by cold and frost; and whether the declaration sufficiently states that the alleged negligent act or omission of the defendant, whereby fires escaped from a passing locomotive, setting fire to the cover, and burned it, is a proximate cause of the injury to the growing plants and fruit from frost and cold.

The defendant railroad company had a right to run its engine and train over its tracks, but such right is coupled with the duty to so operate the engine as not to negligently injure the property of others near the track. The duty arises by implication of law out of the relation of the parties to each other and the circumstances of the case.

To entitle a party to recover damages for his property injured or destroyed through or by the negligent act or omission of another, the negligence complained of must be shown to have been a proximate cause of the injury. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Peninsular Land, Transp. & Mfg. Co. 27 Fla. 1, 17 L.R.A. 33, 9 So. 661.

Negligence is a proximate cause of an injury when in ordinary, natural sequence it causes, or contributes to causing, the injury, without an intervening independent cause.

The negligent act or omission for which a party is liable in damages is one that proximately, i. e., in ordinary, natural sequence, causes, or contributes to causing, an injury to another, where no independent efficient cause of the injury intervenes, and the injured party is not at fault.

A negligent act or omission may be the proximate cause of injury, whether such injury necessarily or immediately follows the negligence or not, if the negligence is in ordinary, natural, unbroken sequence the cause of the injury. Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 26; 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256.

Liability for negligence extends to all its natural, probable, and ordinary results. Any injury that, under the circumstances, is the natural, probable, and ordinary result of a negligent act or omission is in law held to have been contemplated by the negligent party as a probable and proximate result of the negligence, when he is informed, or by ordinary observation would have been informed, of the facts and circumstances attending the negligence.

Results that follow in ordinary, natural, continuous sequence from a negligent act or omission, and are not produced by an independent efficient cause, are proximate results of the negligence, and for such results the negligent party is liable in damages, even though the particular results that did follow were not foreseen.

Where the injury is caused by the intervention of an independent efficient cause to which the defendant did not contribute and for which he is not responsible, or is caused by the act or omission of the plaintiff, the negligence of the defendant is not the proximate cause of the injury. If the plaintiff contributes proximately to causing the injury, he cannot recover, unless otherwise provided by statute.

The ordinary conditions or forces of nature, such as ordinary wind, cold, heat, and the like, that are usual at the time and place and under the circumstances, and that reasonably should have been expected or foreseen as probable to occur, are not, in general, independent, efficient causes, when they affect or operate upon a negligent act or omission in causing a result. Those who are negligent are held in law to know the usual effect of ordinary natural conditions and forces upon a negligent act or omission, and to have contemplated the appearance and the effect of such conditions and forces upon their negligence or upon its proximate results, and to be liable in damages for the natural and probable proximate results of the negligence. 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 457 et seq.; 1 Thomp. Neg. 136; Wharton, Neg. § 97.

If the natural condition or force that affects the negligent act or omission is unusual or extraordinary, the negligent party will not, in general, be held to have known of or contemplated it, unless the circumstances of the particular negligent act or omission are such that the negligent party should have known of or contemplated the probable appearance and effect of such unusual or extraordinary natural condition or force. If the injury was caused by some extraordinary or unusual natural force or condition that could not have been foreseen, or that would have caused the injury if there had been no negligence, the negligence is not the proximate cause of the injury.

Where the injury complained of is the result of the negligence of the defendant and of some other contributing cause not an independent efficient cause, and the result could not have been produced in the absence of either contributing cause, the defendant's negligence is a proximate cause of the injury, if, under the circumstances attending the defendant's negligence, the injury was a probable, natural, and usual result of the two contributing causes that the defendant is held to have contemplated, and the plaintiff or those for whom he is responsible did not contribute proximately to the injury. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Peninsular Land, Transp. & Mfg. Co. supra; Moore v. Lanier, 52 Fla. 353, 42 So. 462.

Where a negligent act or omission is a proximate cause of an injury, the negligent party is liable in damages for the usual and natural consequences of the injury, whether the particular consequences that followed the negligence were actually contemplated or not. For such losses as necessarily follow the injury as the result of the negligence, recovery may be had under a claim for general damages. Losses that are the natural and proximate, but not the necessary, result of the injury, may be recovered as special damages when sufficiently stated and claimed. Jacksonville Electric Co. v. Batchis, 54 Fla. 192, 44 So. 933.

If, by a wind that is ordinarily likely to occur, a fire started by the negligence of a railroad company is communicated to and destroys property of another, the company is liable in damages for the property so destroyed, since it is held to have contemplated all the natural and ordinary consequences of the negligence. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Peninsular Land, Transp. & Mfg. Co. supra; Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Welch, 53 Fla. 145, 44 So. 250.

Where a railroad company allows water from its tank to run upon the premises of another in the winter season, and the water subsequently freezes and injures property on such premises, the company is liable in damages for the injury, since the negligent escape of the water from the tank in ordinary, natural sequence caused a result that, under the circumstances, should have been expected. The negligence of the company in permitting the water to run on the premises was the proximate cause of the injury to the property from the freezing of the water. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Hoag, 90 Ill. 339.

Where a means such as a fence or a cover, or the like, has been provided by the 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

owner of property to protect it from an injury that will probably occur, and such means are, without the fault of the owner, injured or destroyed by the negligent act or omission of another, who under the circumstances of the case knew, or should have known, of the use to which the means was applied and of the injury that would probably result from the destruction of such means, damages may be recovered for injuries to the property that was so protected, which proximately follow or result from the destruction of the means provided for the protection of the property injured. Garrett v. Sewell, 108 Ala. 521, 18 So. 737; Krebs Mfg. Co. v. Brown, 108 Ala. 508, 54 Am. St. Rep. 188, 18 So. 659; Miller v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 90 Mo. 389, 2 S. W. 439.

The declaration alleges that the defendant so carelessly and negligently managed and operated one of its locomotives that fire escaped therefrom and set fire to and burned the canvas or cloth covering to a pinery of growing plants 'situated near to the track of the defendant.'

Owners of property have a right to use it in any manner desired that is not inconsistent with the rights of others. This includes the right of those having land near a railroad track to place a canvas cover over plants growing on the land, and the mere fact that the cover is within the reach of sparks of fire emitted from a locomotive engine passing on the track near by does not relieve the railroad company from liability for its negligence in permitting the sparks to escape and burn the cover. While those having property are charged with the duty of caring for it, there is no obligation to constantly guard and protect it from injury by the negligence of others. See Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Peninsular Land, Transp. & Mfg. R. Co. 27 Fla. 1, 17 L.R.A. 33, 9 So. 661.

It is alleged that the canvas cover placed over growing pineapple plants and fruits to protect them from injury by cold and frost was destroyed by the negligence of the defendant, who should have known the use of the cover and the protection it afforded, and that, because of the destruction of the cover, a cold and frost that ordinarily should have been expected as likely to occur at the time and place did occur and injured the plants and fruit without the fault of the plaintiff.

If the negligent burning of the canvas cover to the growing pineapple plants and fruit defeated the sole object for which the cover was used, and such negligent burning of the cover in ordinary, natural sequence caused the injury to the growing plants and fruit by cold and frost that, under the circumstances, should have been expected as likely to occur and injure the plants at the time and place of the negligent burning of the cover, such negligent burning was the proximate cause of the injury to the growing plants and fruit from cold and frost.

Injury to growing pineapple plants and fruit by ordinary cold and frost that should have been expected as likely to occur is not such an act of God as will relieve from liability for such injury a railroad company that negligently burned the cover over the plants and fruit, which cover was used solely to protect the plants and fruit and would have prevented the injury. See Norris v. Savannah F. & W. R. Co. 23 Fla. 182, 11 Am. St. Rep. 355, 1 So. 475; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Coggin & Dunaway, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 423, 99 S. W. 1052.

If the injury would not have resulted from the cold and frost but for the negligent burning of the cover, the defendant is liable, as such negligence made effective and injurious an ordinary natural condition that should have been contemplated and that would otherwise have been harmless.

Under the allegations of the declaration, the negligent burning of the cover was a primary and efficient act that in ordinary, natural sequence caused the injury to the growing plants and fruit by cold and frost; such injury not being the result of an intervening independent, efficient cause, or of an extraordinary or unusual frost and cold that could not have been foreseen, or that would have injured the plants if the cover had not been burned by the negligence of the defendant. If this is proved, the plaintiff may recover damages for the injury.

The count of the original declaration upon which recovery was had was held to be "fatally defective in not alleging negligence, either of commission or omission, on the part of the defendant in communicating the fire" to the canvas cover, and also in not alleging facts "sufficient to bring home to the defendant that such burning might reasonably have been expected to result directly and naturally in damage to the plants and fruit by cold and frost." Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Benedict Pineapple Co. 52 Fla. 165, 42 So. 529.

Where negligence is the basis of recovery, the declaration should contain allegations of the negligent act or omission of the defendant, and also allegations of facts to show injury to the plaintiff, and that such injury was a proximate result of the negligence alleged.

The declaration now in the first count alleges that the defendant "so carelessly and negligently managed and operated one of its locomotives while drawing a train of cars . . . that fire escaped from said locomotive and set fire to the canvas or cloth with which a pinery belonging to the plaintiff and situated near to the track of the defendant . . . was covered, and burned a large part, to wit, about 1 acre, of the said cover." This is a sufficient allegation of a negligent act of the defendant in communicating fire to the canvas cover, and of injury resulting proximately therefrom to the plaintiff when taken with the claim for damages, to authorize a recovery of general damages or such as naturally and necessarily result from the burning of the canvas cover to the extent of its value.

As special damages resulting from the negligent act alleged, the first count further states: "That, in the said pinery, a large number of pineapple plants and fruit were growing and were likely to be damaged by frost and cold in the" stated vicinity and "the latitude thereof in the winter season; and that it was usual and customary in and about the said" vicinity "and latitude to cover pineries with canvas or cloth in order to protect the plants and fruit growing therein from damages by frost and cold," and to keep in the heat supplied by fires maintained in the pineries during spells of frost and cold which ordinarily come in the winter season on short notice and would otherwise damage the plants and fruit; that, in accordance with said custom, plaintiff provided said pinery with a good canvas or cloth cover, and also provided stoves and fuel therein, ready and sufficient within the covered pinery to heat the same immediately upon the coming of frost and cold dangerous to the plants and fruit, and thus preserve them from damage therefrom; "that, shortly after the burning of the portion of the cover as aforesaid, and before the plaintiff, by exercise of any reasonable diligence by it, could replace the part of the cover which had been burned through the negligence of the defendant as aforesaid, the plants and fruit were damaged by frost and cold for want of the complete cover and the subsequent inability of the plaintiff to control the temperature within said pinery; that the defendant well knew, or ought to have known," of the custom, conditions, and circumstances alleged; and that the "damage was caused by the negligence of the defendant in burning part of the cover as aforesaid." Damages are claimed in $10,000.

As the defendant is liable for such injurious results as were likely to and did naturally and proximately follow its negligence, it was not necessary to allege as contended, "that at the time of the occurrence of the fire the weather was such that cold or frost could be anticipated by the defendant," or "that in the month of January cold or frost of such character as to damage pineapple plants ordinarily occurred." That the month of January, when the fire occurred, was "in the winter season," the court knows judicially, and there are allegations, that pineapple plants and fruit are likely to be damaged by frost and cold in the vicinity stated in the winter season, that it was usual and customary there to cover the growing plants with canvas to protect them from damage by frost and cold, and, that the defendant knew, or should have known, of all the circumstances alleged. If the frost or cold of any degree injured the plants or fruit under the circumstances alleged, as the proximate result of the defendant's negligence, it is not necessary to state the extent of the frost or cold necessary to the damage, or that such frost or cold was likely to come at the time the fire occurred, because of the then condition of the weather, as is insisted by the defendant in error.

If the defendant was negligent in burning the cover, it cannot be relieved from liability for the proximate results of such negligence on the ground that an ordinary natural condition, i. e., frost and cold, intervened, when such ordinary cold and frost should have been expected as probably to occur at the time and place of the negligence. The declaration in effect alleges that the cold which injured the plants should, under the circumstances, have been contemplated by the defendant as likely to occur, that the injury was the natural result of the cold, and that such injury would not have resulted but for the negligence of the defendant that caused the fire to destroy the covering to the plants. The demurrer admits this. It is, in effect, alleged that, by ordinary, natural sequence the negligence of the defendant in starting the fire burned the covering, thereby exposing the growing plants and fruit to an injurious cold and frost that, under the circumstances stated, should have been expected as likely to occur, and the plants and fruit were injured by such cold and frost without the fault of the plaintiff, because the covering was destroyed by the fire started by defendant's negligence. It is sufficiently alleged that the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the injury to the plants and fruit by cold and frost.

The cold that injured the plants was not an independent, efficient cause occurring between the negligence of the defendant and the injury by cold and frost, as such injury was the natural and ordinary result of cold and frost that it is alleged should have been expected as likely to occur as an ordinary or usual natural condition that would not have been harmful to the plants if the covering had not been destroyed by the fire negligently started by the defendant.

The allegation that the damage to the plants from frost and cold occurred after and as a result of the negligent burning of the cover sufficiently connects by ordinary, natural sequence the negligence of the defendant and the injury by cold to the plants and fruit. If the plaintiff was negligent in not using reasonable diligence to protect the plants after the fire occurred, and before the frost or cold caused the damage, such negligence of the plaintiff is a matter of defense in mitigation of damages under the statute. Negligence or fault of the plaintiff does not appear from the declaration; but, on the contrary, it is alleged and admitted by the demurrer that the damage occurred "before the plaintiff, by the exercise of any reasonable diligence by it, could replace the part of the cover which had been destroyed through the negligence of the defendant."

In view of the peculiar risks and duties of a railroad company in the use of dangerous machinery running rapidly and carrying fire along the lines of its road, the statutes of this state provide that "a railroad company shall be liable for any damage done to persons, stock, or other property by the running of the locomotives, or cars, or other machinery of such company, or for damage done by any person in the employ and service of such company, unless the company shall make it appear that their agents have exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, the presumption in all cases being against the company." "No person shall recover damages from a railroad company for injury to himself or his property, where the same is done by his consent, or is caused by his own negligence. If the complainant and the agents of the company are both at fault, the former may recover, but the damages shall be diminished or increased by the jury in proportion to the amount of default attributable to him." Gen. Stat. 1906, §§ 3148, 3149. If the railroad company negligently caused the injury complained of, the complainant may recover; but, if the complainant contributed to the injury by his own fault or negligence, the damages to be recovered are affected by the default or negligence attributable to the complainant. Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. Williams, 37 Fla. 406, 20 So. 558.

The demurrer admits all the allegations of the declaration that are well pleaded. The negligence of the defendant in causing the burning of the canvas cover and the injury to the growing plants and fruit by cold as a natural, probable, and proximate result of the burning of the cover that should, under the circumstances, have been known to and contemplated by the defendant, may have been stated in more positive and affirmative terms; but the allegations are sufficiently direct and certain to state a cause of action requiring a response from the defendant.

The second count of the declaration is subject to the above conclusions.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

NANCY E. HOBBS et al., Appts.,
v.

JOSEPH W. FRAZIER, Trustee, etc., of
J. W. Hobbs, Bankrupt.

(— Fla. —, 47 So. 929.)

Partition — bankrupt's estate — trustee.

1. A trustee in bankruptcy having legal title with no beneficial interest in undivided property, and no duties with reference to the undivided property requiring partition

Headnotes by WHITFIELD, J.

Case Note. — Right of trustee in bankruptcy, or assignee for creditors, to maintain partition.

While the case reported appears to be one of first impression upon the question therein decided, the right of an assignee for the benefit of creditors to bring partition has, in a few instances, been the subject of adjudication.

In Jewett v. Perrette, 127 Ind. 97, 26 N. E. 685, it is held that, while the assignee of an insolvent debtor cannot maintain an action for partition as a matter of course, he may, upon a proper showing, obtain an order from the court to bring and maintain an action for partition; and this it is his duty to do whenever it will be found to the interest of the estate so to do.

In Van Arsdale v. Drake, 2 Barb. 599, it was held that since at common law, as well as by statute, partition between tenants in common of real property is matter of right where both parties cannot, or either of them will not, consent to hold and use the property in common, an assignee for creditors, seized by virtue of the assignment of the interest of a tenant in common, has an absolute right to a decree of partition. It is said that cases going to show that a power of sale is not well executed by a partition do 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) for the benefit of a cœtui que trust, is not in general such a tenant in common as authorizes him to sue for partition.

Same — trustee — rights.

2. The Federal bankruptcy statute (act July 1, 1893, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 544. U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3418) contains no express authority to a trustee in bankruptcy to sue for partition of the property of the bankrupt, the title to which is by the law vested in the trustee in bankruptcy for the purpose of paying the debts of the bankrupt, and the nature of the trustee's power and duties does not necessarily make the right to sue for partition exist by implication. A sale of the bankrupt's interest may be made without partition, and this may be sufficient for debt-paying purposes.

Same — necessity.

3. The statutes of the state do not contemplate that partition may be enforced except when required by the demands or the interests of a beneficial owner, or when shown to be necessary to protect the rights of those beneficially interested.

Same — trustee — rights.

4. Where a trustee in bankruptcy sues for partition of property, and merely alleges that he "is desirous of obtaining a partition and division of the said premises;" and it does not in any way appear that partition is essential to the statutory duties of such trustee, or that the bankruptcy court has authorized the proceeding, or that it is necessary to fully protect the rights of those interested in the estate of the bankrupt, the right of the trustee in bankruptcy to sue for partition is not apparent.

not interfere with this right, because assignees for creditors have something more than a mere power, but are absolutely seized of a legal estate.

In Horstman v. Ritter, 6 Ohio N. P. 470, it is held that, under a partition statute providing that "tenants in common and coparceners of any estate in lands, tenements, or hereditaments within the state, may be compelled to make or suffer partition thereof," an assignee in trust for the benefit of creditors, who takes title, for the purposes of his trust, of an undivided interest in real estate, may maintain an action in partition; the court saying: "That an assignee might be compelled to suffer partition cannot be doubted. If so, it is difficult to see why he should not make it himself."

In this connection, reference may also be made to a few dicta and nisi prius decisions as to the right of a receiver appointed in supplementary proceedings to bring partition.

In Powelson v. Reeve, 2 N. Y. Week. Dig. 375, it is held that a receiver of a tenant in common, appointed in proceedings supplementary to execution, may maintain an action for partition of real estate; but in Dubois v. Cassidy, 5 N. Y. Week. Dig. 210, it is held that the title

Mr. G. B. Wells for appellants.

Mr. F. M. Simonton for appellee.

Whitfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Joseph W. Frazier, as trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of J. W. Hobbs, under the bankruptcy laws of the United States (act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 544, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3418) approved July 1, 1898, filed a bill against Nancy E. Hobbs, J. W. Hobbs, and H. P. Porter for the partition of certain lands and personal property alleged to be owned and possessed in equal undivided shares by complainant as trustee in bankruptcy and the defendant H. P. Porter. It is alleged that the defendant Nancy E. Hobbs claims some interest in the premises, but that the complainant's interest as trustee in bankruptcy is superior thereto. A demurrer by J. W. Hobbs and H. P. Porter to the bill of complaint was overruled. Nancy E. Hobbs answered, claiming to be the owner in fee simple of an undivided one-half interest in the land. J. W. Hobbs answered, disclaiming any interest in the property. Replications were filed to these answers. Testimony was taken and a partition between complainant as trustee and Porter was decreed. Nancy E. Hobbs and J. W. Hobbs appealed.

If the trustee in bankruptcy is not authorized to compel partition of lands which the bankrupt and another owned as cotenants or as partners, it will not be necessary to consider other questions.

At common law only coparceners who derive their title by the involuntary method of inheritance could compel partition by judicial process. Ancient English statutes extended the right to joint tenants and tenants in common, and eventually to all cotenants, whether of freehold or less estates in possession.

Under our statute, any one or more of several joint tenants, tenants in common, or coparceners may compel partition by suit in equity. The joint tenants, tenants in common, and coparceners contemplated by the statute are those who are in some way the owners of a beneficial estate in the land, or whose status and duties are of such a nature as require the exercise of the right to compel partition by judicial proceedings. Joint tenants have unity of interest, title, time, and possession. Tenants in common may have unity of possession only. Coparceners derive their title by inheritance. A trustee in bankruptcy is not a coparcener. Nor is he a joint tenant with the wife or the partner of the bankrupt. A trustee having legal title with no beneficial interest in undivided property, and no continuing duties with reference to the undivided property for the benefit of a cestui que trust, is not in general such a tenant in common as authorizes him to sue for partition. A trustee with power to sell may not authorize partition. 1 Lewin, Tr. 8th ed. * 427. See 1 Perry, Tr. § 769; Brassey v. Chalmers, 16 Beav. 223; Bradshaw v. Fane, 3 Drew. 534.

A statutory trustee has only such title and authority as is conferred by the law. The Federal bankruptcy law vests the trustee by operation of law with the title of the bankrupt, coupled with the duty to reduce to money the property of the estate for which he is trustee, under the direction of the court, and to close up the estate as expeditiously as is compatible with the best interests of the parties in interest. While this statutory provision vests the title of the bankrupt in the trustee, it is so vested only for the purpose of paying debts.

The power to sell is under the direction of the court, and the trustee has no authority with reference to the estate to which he has the statutory title, except such as is expressly or impliedly given by the law.

There is no express authority given by

of a receiver in supplementary proceedings is not such that he can bring an action for the partition of real estate of the judgment debtor,—citing Scott v. Elmore, 10 Hun, 68, in which it is held that the order appointing a receiver in supplementary proceedings does not vest him with title to the debtor's real estate, although the debtor may be compelled to transfer it to him.

In Dubois v. Cassidy, 75 N. Y. 298, the court, although declining to decide the question, expressed the opinion that a receiver in supplementary proceedings does not obtain such a title to real estate as will enable him to maintain an action for partition.

And in Miller v. Levy, 14 Jones & S. 207, the court, although finding it unnecessary to pass upon the question whether a receiver in supplementary proceedings, to whom a conveyance has been made by the judgment debtor, can, as such, maintain an action for a partition, said: "He holds the property as an officer of the court, to discharge some designated duty in respect to it, subject to its order and approval. That it should be his right, or duty, as such, to institute an action in partition, does not seem to have been contemplated by the legislature, or approved by the courts, any more than in the case of a sheriff, or a referee, appointed to sell."

the statute to a trustee to sue for partition of the property of the bankrupt the title to which the law vests in the trustee for sale to pay debts with, and the nature of the trustee's power and duties does not necessarily make the right to sue for partition exist by implication. A sale of the bankrupt's interest may be had without partition, and this may be sufficient for debt-paying purposes.

Under the bankruptcy law, the trustee has "rights of action arising upon contracts or from the unlawful taking or detention of, or injury to, his [bankrupt's] property." The bankrupt's right to partition does not arise out of contract. Partition does not involve unlawful taking or detention of, or injury to, property.

The bankruptcy law vests the title to the property of the bankrupt in the trustee in bankruptcy, and requires the trustee under the supervision of the bankruptcy court to reduce the property to money for debt-paying purposes. The possession of one cotenant is the possession of all cotenants when the rights of none are denied. If in this case Porter is in possession and denied the right of the trustee, the latter, having the legal title, could bring ejectment to establish his right to possession. But, as the title of the trustee is not denied by Porter, the possession follows the title, and partition is not shown by any allegation in the bill to be necessary to a reduction of the property to money for purposes of paying debts, or that it will be advantageous to the interest of creditors to have partition thereof. There is no showing that partition is necessary or expedient to protect the rights of the trustee in bankruptcy or those whom he represents. The allegation is that the trustee in bankruptcy "is desirous of obtaining a partition and division of the said premises." The statutes of the state do not contemplate that partition may be enforced except when required by the demands or the interests of a beneficial owner, or when shown to be necessary to protect the rights of those beneficially interested. It is not shown that the interests of the beneficial owners here require partition. The defendants in the partition proceedings did not consent to the partition, but by demurrer questioned the trustee's right, under the showing made by the bill, to partition.

The bankruptcy law does not expressly authorize partition proceedings by the trustee of the bankrupt; and, as such a proceeding is not shown here to be essential to the statutory duties of such a trustee, and no such duty appears to have been imposed by the bankruptcy court, the statute of this state relating to partition should 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

not be unreasonably extended to cover trustees in bankruptcy who have the bare legal title, but only special statutory duties to perform in connection with such title, who have no beneficial interest in the estate of the bankrupt, and where there is no allegation that partition is necessary to fully protect the rights of those interested in the estate of the bankrupt.

The decree is reversed and the cause remanded.

v.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

(33 Ky. L. Rep. 770, 111 S. W. 303.)

Hotel — license — bona fides.

1. One is not shown not to be a bona fide tavern keeper by the fact that the receipts from his bar are in excess of those from the tavern proper.

Same — necessity — evidence.

2. The existence of hotels in a city a mile away does not establish the non-necessity of a tavern at a river landing where one has existed for thirty years, and the receipts from it, exclusive of the bar, amount to from $16 to $20 per week, and a number of reputable citizens testify to its necessity, although there is testimony to the contrary.

Same — disorderly house.

3. The keeping of a disorderly house by a man of good character who has been a tavern keeper for thirty years is not shown by the fact that a few negroes congregated about his place, that drunken people have been seen on a neighboring highway, and that in two cases liquor had been sold to minors.

(June 11, 1908.)

Case Note. — What constitutes hotel or tavern within liquor-license law.

In Re Brewster, 39 Misc. 689, 80 N. Y. Supp. 606, it was held that, within the liquor-tax law, it was sufficient to constitute a house a hotel if all who came to the house without any previous agreement as to duration of their stay or terms of their entertainment were received as guests; and that it was not necessary that the house be kept only for the reception of travelers, or that it have a register for guests, or that it have stable accommodations. grounds in 85 App. Div. 235, 83 N. Y. Supp. 504.

In People v. Jones, 54 Barb. 311, it appeared that, by chap. 628, Laws 1857, it was provided that no license to sell intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises should be granted to any person, unless such person proposed to keep an inn, tavern, or hotel; and it was held that the terms "inn, tavern, or hotel" were used synonymously to designate what was ordinarily or popularly known as an inn, or tavern, or place for the entertainment of travelers, and where all their wants could be supplied.

In Re Application for License, 19 W. N. C. 359, it was held that a hotel under the Pennsylvania liquor license act of March 22, 1867, was a place where every well-behaved stranger or traveler who was willing to pay reasonable rates for accommodations was entitled to receive food, drink, and lodging.

In Cullinan v. Clark, 46 Misc. 188, 93 N. Y. Supp. 256, it was held that the mere presence of some guests who made a stipulated engagement as to the duration of their stay, or as to the rate of compensation they should pay, did not deprive that which was a hotel of its character as such; that the test was what the landlord was willing to do, and sometimes did, in the way of receiving visitors, without any agreement as to rate or time, and not what he did with other visitors in the way of making such engagements in advance.

In Ebner's Petition, 1 Woodw. Dec. 21, where it appeared that a license to keep a tavern carried with it the right to furnish the guests with intoxicating liquors, and, under the law, such licenses were to be granted only to the proprietors of houses which were kept for the entertainment of travelers, it was held that the keeper of an eating house or restaurant, who occasionally accommodated strangers and travelers, and was provided to a reasonable extent with the means of affording such accommodations, was not the keeper of a hotel, inn, or tavern, so as to be entitled to a license.

The keeper of a restaurant, who has no beds for the accommodation of travelers, is not an innkeeper. Kelly v. Excise Comrs. 54 How. Pr. 327.

Clay, C., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant, Joe Schneider, has a tavern located at Delafield, Warren county, Kentucky, at what is generally known as the "boat landing." At the November term, 1907, of the Warren county court, he made application for a tavern license with the privilege of selling spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors. No question was made as to his having filed proper notices as required by law; but, as there was an oral protest against granting the license, the court, without objection by anyone, set out by metes and bounds the neighborhood in which the sense of the legal voters might be obtained as to whether or not the application of appellant should be granted. No written protest was filed, but on the day of the hearing several persons were in court to protest against the granting of the license. After hearing the testimony, the county court granted the license. The commonwealth then appealed to the circuit court, and the circuit court decided that appellant was not entitled to the license. From that judgment, he prosecutes this appeal.

It appears from the record in this case that appellant is a man of good character, and that he has kept a tavern at Delafield for a period of about thirty years. The place where he sells liquors is located on the road, while his residence, consisting of about six rooms, is situated 50 yards to the rear of where the liquors are sold. Near his residence is also another large room, in which four beds are kept. It is the contention of the commonwealth that appellant is not a keeper of a tavern in good faith, and that there is no real necessity for a tavern at that point. In addition to this, the commonwealth insists that he has not kept an orderly house. Delafield, it seems, is a small river town on Barren river, at the head of navigation, about 1 mile from Bowling Green. Considerable business is transacted at that point. Steamboats ply from Bowling Green to Evansville, Indiana, and also up Green river. The boat landing is the harbor for the fleet of United States boats that are frequently engaged in improving the river. The proof shows that appellant's place was the only tavern in Delafield, and that it was continuously patronized by people going away or coming in on boats; that shippers of hogs and cattle depend almost solely upon Schneider's tavern and premises. It is true appellant stated that he frequently kept personal friends for nothing, and that he let people hitch their horses in his yard without making any charge therefor. It seems, too, that he never kept any books showing his receipts from guests independently of the bar. He does swear, however, that his receipts, aside from the bar, amounted to $16 or $20 per week. It is argued that, because the receipts from his bar were far in excess of that amount, the keeping of a tavern was a mere device to enable him to conduct a saloon. We are unable to say that, because the receipts from the bar were larger than those from the tavern proper, the owner is not a bona fide tavern keeper. If such were the rule, no man could be said to be a keeper in good faith of a tavern or a hotel, for it is a well-known fact that the bar privilege in many instances carries with it returns much larger than are received from the accommodation of guests in other respects.

Nor do we think there is anything in the argument that appellant was not prepared to receive women. True, his family occupied the most of his residence, but, in case of an emergency, we doubt not that his family could be doubled up in such fashion as to enable him to take care of women guests.

Counsel for appellee earnestly insists that because Bowling Green is situated about a mile distant from Delafield, and the former city has hotels which could accommodate the patrons who go to Delafield, there is no necessity for a tavern at Delafield. We do not think, however, that the question depends upon whether or not accommodation can be secured at another place. It depends upon whether or not there are persons who, in going to Delafield, naturally seek or desire accommodation at appellant's tavern. Where a tavern has existed at one place for about thirty years, and the proof shows that the receipts from it, exclusive of the bar, amount to from $16 to $20 per week, and a number of reputable citizens testify that, in their opinion, there is a necessity for a tavern at the place in question, we are unable to say that no such necessity exists, even though an equal number of citizens testify that in their opinion there is really no need for such tavern.

The only other point attempted to be made against the granting of the license was that Schneider did not keep an orderly house. There was some proof to the effect that at times large crowds of negroes assembled around the tavern. There was also some proof to the effect that drunken men were seen occasionally on the pike beyond Schneider's tavern. It does not appear, however, that they became or were drunk at Schneider's tavern. Appellee relies principally upon the fact that appellant was twice convicted of selling liquor to minors, claiming that under the rule laid down in Caudill v. Com. 23 Ky. L. Rep. 2140, 66 S. W. 723, this fact showed that Schneider did not keep an orderly house. In that case Caudill had applied for a merchant's license to sell spirituous liquors. The applicant had been engaged in the illegal sale of liquor both to adults and minors. This court held that the county court was given a judicial discretion as to when a license to sell liquors should be granted; that as it was an admitted fact that the applicant had sold without license, and, in further violation of the law, there was no abuse of the legal discretion confided to the court in refusing the applicant a license. In the case cited there were numerous violations of the law on the part of the applicant. Here we have two isolated cases of illegal sales of liquor to minors, made by the proprietor's clerk in the proprietor's absence. This court has held in a large number of cases that the county court has a discretion in granting tavern licenses, and, unless it is shown that that discretion has been abused, there is no cause of complaint. Lupe v. Barbee, 18 B. Mon. 9. Where, then, an applicant has been a tavern keeper for thirty years, is a man of good character, and the only evidence of his having kept a disorderly house is the fact that a few negroes congregated about his place, that drunken people were seen upon the road,—it not being shown, however, that they became drunk at his establishment,—and that he in two instances had sold liquor to minors, we do not feel authorized in reversing the action of the county court, which, in the exercise of the discretion vested in it by law, held that the applicant was entitled to a license. No doubt the fact that Bowling Green has recently gone "dry" has made the opposition to a tavern at Delafield all the more pronounced, and in the opinion of many substantial people it is not desirable to have a tavern there. That being the case, the law has provided, means whereby the sale of liquor at that point may be prevented.

For reasons given, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to grant appellant a license.

The note does not include cases involving the right of holders of invalid obligations of municipal corporations for money loaned to follow the money into property purchased therewith by the municipality, and to have an equitable lien declared thereon for the loan. Such cases depend upon somewhat different principles from those applicable to an action or suit to recover the specific property sold or conveyed.

The few cases that have passed upon the subject agree that a municipality cannot acquire property under an invalid contract and plead the invalidity of the contract as a defense to an action thereon, and also retain the property where it is still in existence and in its possession. In such cases the courts will, in a proper proceeding, allow the seller of the property, if he has acted in good faith in the matter and without fraud, to recover possession.

This was the doctrine of Chapman v. Douglas County, 107 U. S. 348, 27 L. ed. 378, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62, which held that the

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In June, 1905, the appellant city of Bardwell purchased from appellee an engine to be used in operating its electric-light plant. It contracted to pay for the engine $1,550. Six hundred dollars of this amount was paid in cash, $150 in an old engine, and for the remaining $500 the city executed its note due in June, 1906. The note, as well as the contract, contained the stipulation that the city had received the engine from the Southern Engine & Boiler Works "with the express agreement and understanding that the title of said machinery is now and shall remain in the said Southern Engine & Boiler Works until the note is paid in full; and it shall have the right, in case of nonpayment at maturity of said note, or at any time it deems itself insecure, or if the property is sold or removed from the district where located, to enter and retake immediate possession of said property wherever it may grantor of real estate to a county on conditions in the contract which it was impossible for the county to perform, because in excess of the authority of its officers to make, could rescind the agreement upon which the deed was made, and thus convert the county into a trustee of the title for his benefit. A rescission of the contract and restoration of the title was therefore decreed, unless the balance due on the purchase price was paid, although the property had greatly increased in value and large improvements had been made thereon by the county since acquiring it. In reaching the foregoing conclusion the court said: "As the agreement between the parties has failed by reason of the legal disability of the county to perform its part, according to its conditions, the right of the vendor to rescind the contract and to a restitution of his title would seem to be as clear as it would be just, unless some valid reason to the contrary can be shown. As was said by this court in Marsh v. Fulton County, 10 Wall. 676-684 (19 L. ed. 1040-1042), and repeated in Louisiana v. Wood, 102 U. S. 294-299 (26 L. ed. 133-135): 'The obligation to do justice rests upon all persons, natural and artificial, and, if a county obtains the money or property of others without authority, the law, independent of any statute, will compel restitution or compensation.'" (Neither of the cases quoted from comes within the scope of this note.)

Following the doctrine of Chapman v. Douglas County, supra, it was held in Wrought-Iron Bridge Co. v. Utica, 17 Fed. 316, that a bridge company which had been defeated in an action in the state courts against two townships to recover on a contract for the erection of a bridge on the ground that the township officers had not proceeded according to law in making the contract was entitled in equity to remove the bridge unless paid therefor. As a condition precedent to removing it, however, the decree provided that the company must repay that portion of the purchase price received by it. The court said: "The delivery of this bridge to the towns of Utica and Deer park passed to them the apparent legal title, but they have never become the equitable owners. The bridge has not been paid for, and they have therefore no equitable right to keep it without paying for it."

In sustaining the right of a builder of a bridge, erected under an invalid contract with the commissioners of a county, to remove the same because of nonpayment of the purchase price, the court, in Lee v. Monroe County, 52 C. C. A. 376, 114 Fed. 744, said: "While the law affords no remedy, equity, although it will not enforce the contract or create a contract between the parties on account of the acceptance and retention of the property, when the property is in existence, and in the hands of the defendant, will not allow it to retain that to which it has no title whatever, and prevent the owner from reclaiming it. The case presented by the bill shows no moral turpitude in the transaction, and, although the bridge company should have ascertained whether each step provided by the statutes had been properly taken, the law placed upon the defendant the duty of taking those steps. It was necessary for it to comply with every provision of the statutes in that behalf before entering into these contracts, and it represented to the bridge company that it had so complied, and thus misled the bridge company into entering into the agreement, the carrying out of which placed these bridges in the hands of the defendant. The complainant has no remedy at law, and to deny him equitable relief would be to enforce the contract on the part of the bridge company, and to allow the defendant to repudiate its part of the same contract, and thereby appropriate, without compensation, property to which it had no legal or equitable right."

In Berlin Iron Bridge Co. v. Wilkes County, 111 N. C. 317, 16 S. E. 314, one who had erected a bridge under an invalid contract with a county, and who sued the county commissioners on a quantum meruit for its value, was held not entitled to a judgment for the return of the bridge where there was no allegation of a demand on his part for the bridge, or refusal thereof on the part of the county.

be, and remove the same." The contract also contained the following guaranty: "The material and workmanship entering into the construction of this engine shall be first class in every respect, and any defective part will be replaced by us without charge. We also guarantee this engine to run smoothly with close regulation under varying loads and steam pressure and to be as economical in the use of steam as any engine of its class." Failing to pay the note at maturity, the appellee instituted this action against the city. It asked for judgment for its debt, interest, and costs, and that it be adjudged a lien on the engine to secure the payment of the same. To this petition the city answered that the engine was not constructed of first-class material, but that much of the material entering into its construction was defective in many respects, and also alleged that the workmanship was inferior, and that, by reason of these defects, the engine was not worth over $500 when delivered to the city. It made its answer a counterclaim, and asked that the note sued on be canceled, and that it have judgment over against the company for $550.

To this pleading the engine company replied that it had repeatedly offered to fully perform its guaranty by replacing without charge any defective or inferior parts, but that the city had refused to permit it to do so, and it renewed its offer to fully perform its contract obligation. A rejoinder was filed by the city, in which it stated that it was willing to accept such an engine as the company warranted the engine purchased to be, but that, if the company would not do this, then it offered to rescind the contract, provided the company would return to it the $1,050 paid on the purchase price and surrender the note sued on. Subsequently the city filed an answer, setting out that at the time the contract was entered into, and the note sued on executed, it was indebted largely in excess of the constitutional limit as fixed in §§ 157 and 158 of the Constitution, and that the indebtedness assumed in the purchase of the engine was unauthorized and the note executed as evidence of it void. The case, after being prepared for trial, was submitted to the court, and a judgment ren-

While the specific question under annotation was not passed upon in the following cases, it was, however, recognized and stated that one who sold property to a municipal corporation under an unenforceable contract might recover the property if the municipality refused to pay for it.

Thus, in Harrison County Court v. Smith, 15 B. Mon. 155, in denying the right to a contractor to recover of the county the contract price of a jail erected on county land under an invalid contract, the court said that at all events the builder might remove the building unless paid therefor.

So, in Salt Creek Twp. v. King Iron Bridge & Mfg. Co. 51 Kan. 520, 33 Pac. 303, a contract by the township for the erection of a bridge was held invalid because not purchased as provided by statute, and because the indebtedness attempted to be created thereby was in excess of the statutory amount of indebtedness which the township was authorized to create. The court, however, said that, as the bridge was constructed upon the highway with the permission of the authorities, the company erecting it might remove it; and that, as the township refused to pay for it, it could have no interest or right to keep it.

Language to the same effect was used in LaFrance Fire Engine Co. v. Syracuse, 33 Misc. 516, 68 N. Y. Supp. 894, wherein a contract by a municipality for the purchase of an aerial truck was held invalid because certain formalities in executing it, required by statute, were not complied with. While denying the company the right to recover the purchase price, the court said that it did not follow that it was entirely without redress; that it was clear that it might at least recover possession of the truck.

And in Clark v. District No. 1, 78 Ill. 474, although holding that an order by a school district for a set of stereoscopic views and a scope was invalid because ultra vires, the court said that the plaintiff could reclaim the property.

The right to remove property sold to a municipal corporation has sometimes been denied on the ground that such relief, because of the nature of the property and its situation, could not be had without injuring or destroying other property of the corporation to an amount greatly in excess of the amount of the claim. This principle was recognized in Gamewell Fire-Alarm Teleg. Co. v. Laporte, 42 C. C. A. 405, 102 Fed. 417. In this case it was apparently conceded, however, that for the foregoing reasons the right to remove a fire-alarm system sold to a city would not be enforced by equity; but the court was asked to declare an equitable lien upon the entire system in favor of the seller of the system. Such relief was denied, as it would create and enforce a contract between the parties radically different from that which was intended and entered into, and would place the plant and its control in private hands, together with a perpetual franchise to maintain and operate the system.

On this theory, Grady v. Landram, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 506, 63 S. W. 284, held that one who had a balance due him under a contract for the erection of a school building, the terms or nature of which were not given, was not entitled to have the building either removed or divided where a division would practically destroy it. The district had paid over $2,000 on the building as it stood, and the balance due was about $600.

dered in favor of the engine company for the amount of its note and interest; and it was further adjudged that, to secure the payment of the same, it had a lien upon the engine. Of this judgment the city complains.

In respect to the question that the city had no authority to purchase the engine because its indebtedness at the time exceeded the limitation provided in the Constitution, we may say that the evidence indicates that the contention of the city upon this point is correct. So that we will consider the case as if the city had no authority to buy the engine or create any indebtedness for that purpose.

Upon the issue presented as to whether or not the engine fulfilled the guaranty, the evidence is conflicting. Indeed, the weight of it tends to support the conclusion that the engine in some particulars, especially in material, was not what it was guaranteed to be. The engine was installed as a part of the electric plant in July, 1905, and the evidence shows that it operated the plant continuously from the time it was installed until the last depositions in the case were taken in the summer of 1907. Presumably the city as it superseded the judgment is yet using the engine for the purpose for which it was bought. Soon after the engine was installed, the city notified the engine company that the engine was not rendering satisfactory service, and pointed out several defects in its material and construction. In response to this letter, the company sent one of its agents to inspect the engine. After making an inspection, he reported to the company that the engine fully came up to the stipulations contained in the contract, and that he found no defects either in material or construction, although a number of witnesses who testified for the city, some of them being experienced machinists, were able to discover defects in both these particulars. It may, however, be here remarked that the defects in material or construction, although causing some inconvenience and annoyance, as well as additional expense, did not seriously interfere with the running of the engine, or prevent it from performing the work it was desired it should do. Subsequent to this, and before the institution of this action, in October, 1906, considerable correspondence passed between the city and the company in respect to other indebtedness of the city to the company, and also concerning the engine. Finally, in June, 1906, for the purpose of definitely ascertaining whether or not the engine fulfilled the contract, it was agreed between the city and the engine company that two experts, one to be selected by each of the parties, should examine the engine and report the result of their inspection. The correspondence between the parties leading up to the selection of these experts clearly shows the attitude of the engine company. In July, 1906, it wrote to the city that it was perfectly willing to make good any defects that existed in the engine, and offered to send an experienced and competent machinist to examine it and supply any defects, and stay with it until the city was satisfied that it was the kind of an engine the city bought. It further wrote that it sold the Coyliss engine to be in first-class condition, and that was the kind it proposed to make it if it was not such. In reply to this, the city wrote that it wished to have a competent man go over the machinery with the expert from the company, and agreed to abide by what this man reported. In July, 1906, these experts met and inspected the engine. At this time it had been in use by the city for about one year.

The expert selected by the city reported to it as follows: "As requested by Mr. Ponder, a member of your board, I made an examination of the Coyliss engine at electric-light plant at Bardwell, Kentucky. I found it running smoothly and a steady light from lamp spoke well for speed regulation. The cylinder head and two of valve bonnets are honeycombed, and should be replaced by better castings. Your engineer said that (the engine was running and I could not examine it) the cross heads come so close or strikes the gland when the stuffing box is full. This should be remedied by the builders before engine is accepted. He also complained that the stuffing box was back so deep in the frame that he could not get to it while running. This, of course, is annoying to the man running the engine, and may cause him to stop sometimes to adjust the glands; but I can see no remedy for this. Aside from the defective casting and the closeness of the cross-heads to the cylinder head, I consider it a well-built, substantial engine." The expert selected by the company made the following report to it: "Met Mr. Harrison, their expert from Cairo, this evening, and, after going over the engine into details, could only find a few minor faults as to defective castings. The only one we found was a cylinder head which had a spongy place in it about the size of a dime right in the fillet, which was disclosed by oil seeping through. Found the crank end stem broken across lower half of housing, would not say it broke from defective casting from nature of break. I would say was broken by being caught in some manner or dash-pot rod had been lengthened out, which would cause it. Found grab claws had been taken off and set crews put in, which makes them look very bad. The only other fault he had to find, and that was in the design, was piston-rod nut ran too close to stuffing box. He suggested that we replace cylinder head, also face off piston-rod nut, and stuffing-box gland, which would give more clearance, and that he would make written report to board to that effect. In his opinion that would make engine first-class job; and I would suggest we furnish new pair of grab claws to replace those that have been ruined. Also set of die plates."

Immediately upon receiving the report from its expert, the company wrote the city the following letter: "The machinist sent by Southern Engine & Boiler Works to examine the engine sold you some time ago has returned, and made his report to the company. He reports that he found the engine in comparatively good condition, and for all practical purposes no defects in same that would in any way impair its usefulness. He reports that there is a defective casting in the cylinder head which will permit oil to ooze through; that he found that the grab claws had been taken off, and some set screws put in their place; and also the end of the crank where grab claws had been broken. I now write to say that a new cylinder head will be replaced and a new pair of grab claws put on, as well as a new crank end for the grab claws. We will also turn off face of piston-rod nut and stuffing-box gland to give more clearance for the piston rod. These matters are to be done without any additional cost to you, and done whenever it may suit your convenience, and, when demanded by you, it will be whenever you will give permission to do so. We are ready and willing to do this." It seemed that the city did not answer this letter, nor did it notify or inform the company of the report made by its expert, nor have sent to it a copy of his report, and a few weeks afterwards the company again wrote, expressing its willingness to supply all the defects of which it had notice, and also said: "If there are any defects connected with this machinery under the contract, the Southern Engine & Boiler Works has the right to make it good, but, of course, they are entitled to be notified what they are. And, as stated above, I understand you had an expert to examine it for this purpose, and certainly the Southern Engine & Boiler Works should be informed of all the defects that he may have found, so that they could replace it or make it good." In reply to this letter, the city, in August, 1900, wrote the following: "I am requested to reply to yours of 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the 30th of July and the 21st, and say that it is the opinion of the board that you cannot patch this engine in question enough to make a first-class one, and therefore they prefer that you do not begin to repair it. And in their opinion it will be necessary to fulfil the contract. It is plainly evident to the writer that a considerable compromise on the part of your company will be necessary for us to ever come to a settlement." This concluded all efforts to adjust the matter between the parties without litigation.

Assuming that there were defects in the material used in the construction of the engine, and the evidence shows that there were, it became the duty of the company under its contract to cure these defects by supplying other pieces of machinery to take the place of the inferior ones. That it was somewhat negligent in this respect may be conceded, but it is also true that the defects were not of such a character as to prevent the operation of the engine, and it may safely be said that those reported by the expert selected by it are the only ones that are definitely and certainly pointed out as being necessary to remove in order to bring the engine up to the guaranty. When the city received the report of its expert, it should have sent to the engine company a copy, and demanded of it that his recommendations be complied with. The correspondence shows that the city did not do this; and, further, that the company was ready and willing to perform its contract and supply any deficiencies in the engine. This was all its contract obliged it to do, and all that the city had a right to demand. It is apparent that the city authorities, doubtless feeling that the engine company had not primarily complied with its contract, wished to rescind it, and for this reason refused to permit the company to make the needed repairs. So that, unless the constitutional question raised presents an obstacle in the way of the affirmance of the judgment of the lower court, our conclusion is that it is correct. Upon this question the argument is strongly pressed that the city had no authority to create the indebtedness in the purchase of the engine, that, therefore, the contract was void, and the only remedy of the company was to apply to the court for a mandamus to compel the municipal authorities to levy a tax to pay the debt. If, however, it be a fact, as is stated in the pleading on behalf of the city and in the argument of its counsel, that the city at the time it purchased this engine had already incurred indebtedness in an amount exceeding 3 per centum of the value of the taxable property estimated by the assessment next before the last as-assessment previous to the incurring of the indebtedness, the remedy suggested would be of no avail, because the court could not compel the city authorities to levy a tax when the limitation provided in § 158 of the Constitution had been exceeded, when the indebtedness for which it was sought to impose a tax was created. Although the court might compel municipal authorities to levy a tax to pay a debt that they had the power to create, we do not understand that it could require them to levy a tax in direct violation of the Constitution. So that, if the appellee company has any remedy at all, it is the one adopted by the lower court. A rescission would not afford adequate or satisfactory relief, and § 157 of the Constitution provides in part that "no county, city, town, taxing district, or other municipality shall be authorized or permitted to become indebted in any manner or for any purpose to an amount exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year without the assent of two thirds of the voters thereof voting at an election to be held for that purpose; and any indebtedness contracted in violation of this section shall be void. Nor shall such contract be enforceable by the person with whom made, nor shall such municipality ever be authorized to assume the same." We have then presented this condition of affairs: The city has the use and is in the possession of a valuable engine that it purchased from the appellee company; but, when the company attempts to collect the note executed by the city for the purchase price of the engine, the city responds: "We have your property. We are using it for public and governmental purposes. We have not paid for it, and do not intend to. You cannot compel us to levy a tax to pay your debt because our tax rate exceeds the constitutional limit. You cannot take a personal judgment against the city because the contract was made in violation of the Constitution, and is not enforceable, and you cannot take the engine upon which you have a lien because it is used in connection with our electric-light plant and is necessary in its operation. Therefore you are remediless unless you accept our offer to rescind the contract." There is no constitutional or statutory law in this state that will permit municipalities in cases presenting facts like this to retain possession of property and refuse to pay for it or afford relief, unless the seller will accept a rescission upon equitable terms. Within the constitutional limitation, the city had the right, under § 3637 of the Kentucky Statutes of 1903, to purchase an engine for use in connection with its water and light plant; and, as between the company and the city, the company, under its contract, had a lien upon the engine to secure the payment of the note, and this lien it had the right to enforce by sale of the engine for the satisfaction of its purchase-money debt. This identical question was before this court in Fordsville v. Postel, 121 Ky. 67, 123 Am. St. Rep. 184, 88 S. W. 1065. In that case the trustees of Fordsville established a school and issued bonds to the amount of $4,000 on behalf of the district for the purpose of providing it with a lot, schoolhouse, and suitable furniture. The bonds were sold and the proceeds used for this purpose. The bonds were issued without a vote being taken authorizing the issue, and were adjudged to be void. Thereupon the holders of the bonds instituted an action in equity asking that the lot, house, and furniture, which were purchased with the proceeds of the bonds, be sold to satisfy them. In granting this relief the court said: "The money which the plaintiffs paid is distinctly traced into the schoolhouse and lot and furniture, and no other money went into them. This property can be reclaimed without taking any other property with it or injuring any other person or interfering with his rights. . . . No liability, direct or indirect, may be imposed upon the school district under the bonds in question. It is not liable on the bonds, nor can it be made liable by indirection in any way; but, if we ignore the bond transaction altogether, what have we? The district received $4,000 from the bondholders. The bonds being void, the district should have returned the money to the bondholders. If the bondholders had learned of the invalidity of the bonds while the district still had the $4,000 in its treasury, which they had paid to it, manifestly a court of equity would have required the district to pay back their money to them. It was money obtained by a mutual mistake. While, under the Constitution, no liability would attach to the district for the money if it had lost it, or if it had spent it, and the fund could not be identified and followed, where it may be followed and identified, there is no more reason why property which represents the fund should not be returned than there would be for not returning the money if it had been placed in a bag and the district had the bag locked up in its safe. The purpose of the Constitution is not to enrich municipalities at the expense of innocent people who deal with them, and, when they repudiate their bonds, they must act honestly. A loss must not be placed upon the district, but, when justice may be done without inflicting any loss upon the district, equity will lay hold of the conscience of the parties, and make them do what is just and right. . . . We see no reason why the right to follow a fund should not be applied against municipalities under the clause of the Constitution above quoted just as it is against other persons obtaining the property of another under a void contract, where the fund may be identified, and is separated from other property of the municipality." This opinion, sound in law as well as morals, is conclusive of the question we are now considering. There is no difficulty in identifying the property. There are no other liens on it. Nor does it appear that any other property will be seriously injured by the sale of it. True, if the engine should be removed, the city might be deprived of the use of its electric-light plant until it obtained another engine; but, except in this particular, the removal of the engine will not impair the value of the plant. It would be manifestly unjust and inequitable under the circumstances presented by this record to permit the city to keep this engine and not pay for it. The constitutional provision in question is one of the most valuable clauses in the instrument, and it is not our purpose to in any wise impair its usefulness or deprive the taxpayers and citizens of municipalities of the protection it affords. But it was not designed to enable cities or towns to perpetrate fraud.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

JEREMIAH M. MORAN et al.

v.

THOMAS F. GALLAGHER.

Intoxicating Liquors — license — owner of street — objection.

The owner of the fee of a street at the point where it abuts on property, to sell liquor upon which an application has been made for license, is within the provisions of a statute authorizing owners of real estate within 25 feet of such property to object to the granting of the license.

(September 4, 1908.)

Note. — Upon the question of the ownership of the fee in a public street within the distance prescribed by statute, as entitling the owner to consent or object to the granting of a license for the sale of intoxicating liquors, no other cases are to be found. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

RESERVATION by the Supreme Judicial Court for Worcester County for the opinion of the full bench of a petition for certiorari to set aside an order revoking a license to sell intoxicating liquors. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. David I. Walsh and Thomas L. Walsh, for petitioners:

A statute will be given a reasonable construction so as to carry out the intent of the legislature, though such construction may seem contrary to the letter of the statute.

Opinion of Justices, 22 Pick. 571; Cleveland v. Norton, 6 Cush. 380; Somerset v. Dighton, 12 Mass. 383; Staniels v. Raymond, 4 Cush. 314; Elliott v. Elliott, 137 Mass. 116; *Chase v. The legislature never intended that the owner of the fee in a public highway within 25 feet of licensed premises should have the right to object to the granting of such license within the meaning of the statute.

Spaulding v. Smith, 162 Mass. 543, 39 N. E. 189.

Messrs. Charles F. Baker and Emerson W. Baker, for defendant:

The owner of the soil in the street retains the title and right to make any use of the same not inconsistent with the public use thereof as a street.

The right to object in such cases was clearly contemplated, and the statute must be so construed.

Rev. Laws, chap. 8, § 5, chap. 100, § 15: Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. ed. 629.

Knowlton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition for a writ of certiorari to set aside an order of the police court of Fitchburg, revoking a license of the petitioners to sell intoxicating liquor to be drunk on the premises. The order was made under Rev. Laws, chap. 100, § 15. It is undisputed that the Simonds Manufacturing Company, the applicant before the police court for a revocation of the license, had duly objected to the granting of the license, as an owner of real estate within 25 feet of the premises described in the application for the license. The only question that arises under the present petition is whether it was such an owner of real estate within the meaning of the statute.

It appears that it was the owner of the real estate on the opposite side of the street which was 40 feet wide at that point, and it was also the owner of the fee of the entire street in front of the property described in the application for a license. It had a perfect title to the land in the street, subject to an easement of the public to use it for travel. The precise question is whether the existence of such an easement in land within 25 feet of the premises described in an application for a license leaves the owner of the fee with such a title as is necessary to constitute him an owner of the real estate, within the meaning of the statute.

There is no doubt that in a general sense he is the owner, and "has a right to the enjoyment of any use of his estate consistent with the servitude to which it is subjected, and may maintain trespass for any interruption of his enjoyment." Van O'Linda v. Lothrop, 21 Pick. 292-297, 32 Am. Dec. 261; Locks & Canals v. Nashua & L. R. Co. 104 Mass. 1-11, 6 Am. Rep. 181. He may build his cellar under the highway. Allen v. Boston, 159 Mass. 324-335, 38 Am. St. Rep. 423, 34 N. E. 519. See also Com. v. Morrison, 197 Mass. 199, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 194, 83 N. E. 415. If the highway or street is discontinued his title immediately becomes absolute.

If the contention of the present petitioners could be maintained, there would be ground for a similar contention against an owner of land subject to the easement of a private way, especially if the persons entitled to use the way were numerous. It might be argued that other burdensome easements would have the same effect to deprive the owner of his right, under the statute, to object to the issuing of a license.

We are of opinion that the Simonds Manufacturing Company was plainly the owner of the land in the street, within the ordinary meaning of the word. There is no good reason for holding that the word is used in the statute otherwise than in its ordinary signification, and the entry must be—

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

THOMAS PAINTER et al., Appts.,

v.

PETER PAINTER.

Will—equitable conversion — failure of scheme.

1. The doctrine of equitable conversion does not apply in case of a devise of real estate to testator's wife for life, and directing that at her death the property be sold and the proceeds divided between testator's daughters, where they die without issue after testator but before their mother's death, so that testator's scheme has failed; but the property will descend as real estate to testator's heirs at law.

Equitable conversion — creditors.

2. Equity never enforces the doctrine of equitable conversion for the benefit of creditors.

(Brown, Potter, and Stewart, JJ., dissent.)

(January 20, 1908.)

Case Note. — When is there such a failure of testator's purpose or object as to preclude the application of the doctrine of equitable conversion.

The general principle is well established that a power of sale in a will, if inserted in aid of a particular purpose of the testator, or to accomplish his general scheme of distribution, does not operate as a conversion where the scheme or purpose fails. It is also well established that, though there may be a failure of a specific object, the doctrine of equitable conversion will nevertheless apply where a clear intention can be collected from the will that the distribution of the testator's estate shall be made in money at all events. The inquiry to which this note is addressed is, therefore, as to under what circumstances there is such a failure of the testator's purpose or object that the property directed to be sold will be deemed to retain its original character.

There is clearly such a failure, altogether or pro tanto, where conversion is directed for the purpose of paying a legacy which has lapsed by reason of the death of the legatee. See Trippe v. Frazier, 4 Harr. & J. 446; Canfield v. Canfield, 62 N. J. Eq. 578, 50 Atl. 471; Wright v. Methodist Episcopal Church, Hoffm. Ch. 202 (arguendo); Lindsay v. Pleasants, 39 N. C. (4 Ired. Eq.) 320; Worsley's Estate, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 177.

It has also been held in numerous instances that, where conversion is directed for the purpose of a bequest for charitable or religious purposes, which is void for uncertainty or want of capacity in the legatee, the property will be considered as retaining its original character. See State use of Wiltbank v. Bates, 2 Harr. (Del.) 18; State

APPPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Butler County dismissing a bill filed to secure partition of certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. H. Goucher and Jacob M. Painter for appellants.

Messrs. W. D. Brandon, William Z. Murrin, and John Murrin for appellee.

Mestrezat, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill filed in the court below for the partition of 120 acres of land and the undivided one-seventh interest in another tract of 60 acres situate in Buffalo township, Butler county. George W. Painter died seised of the land on May 22, 1899, use of Derrickson v. Walter, 2 Harr. (Del.) 151; Rizer v. Perry, 58 Md. 112; Read v. Williams, 125 N. Y. 560, 21 Am. St. Rep. 748, 26 N. E. 730; McCarty v. Deming, 4 Lans. 443; Fifield v. Van Wyck, 94 Va. 557, 64 Am. St. Rep. 745, 27 S. E. 446; McHugh v. McCole, 97 Wis. 166, 40 L.R.A. 724, 72 N. W. 631.

The same doctrine has been applied where the charitable bequest, in behalf of which the conversion was made is rendered invalid by statute because made within a month of the testator's death (Luffberry's Appeal, 125 Pa. 513, 17 Atl. 447); or because, having a wife, testator's bequest of nearly all of his estate for charitable purposes was valid only as to one half (Jones v. Kelly, 170 N. Y. 401, 63 N. E. 443).

Such is also the case where the provision runs counter to the statute restricting the suspension of the power of alienation. Hawley v. James, 7 Paige, 213, 32 Am. Dec. 623; DePeyster v. Clendinning, 8 Paige, 295. affirmed on other points under title of Bulkley v. DePeyster, 26 Wend. 21; Giraud v. Giraud, 58 How. Pr. 175.

Where a testator directs the sale of real estate for the purpose of paying debts or legacies for which the personal estate proves sufficient, so that a sale is unnecessary for the purpose of accomplishing his object, the doctrine of equitable conversion does not apply. Sweeney v. Warren, 127 N. Y. 426, 24 Am. St. Rep. 468, 28 N. E. 413; McCarty v. Terry, 7 Lans. 237; North v. Valk, Dud. Eq. 212; Pratt v. Taliaferro, 3 Lelgh. 419 (where the case is put by way of analogy).

Where the purpose of a conversion directed by a will is to enable the executors to sell if necessary to support and educate the family of the testator, but the personal estate is ample for that purpose, so that extent the purpose fails, and the land retains its original character. Gourley v. Campbell, 66 N. Y. 169.

The failure of testator's purpose or object was also considered as precluding the application of the doctrine of equitable conversion, in the following cases:

Where a testator whose estate consisted almost entirely of realty authorized the sale leaving to survive him a widow, Mary E., and two daughters, Minnie R. and Helen M., and as brothers and sisters the plaintiffs, and Peter Painter, the defendant in the bill. By his last will George W. Painter directed an appraisement and sale of his personal property and the application of the proceeds to his debts and funeral expenses, and then provided as follows: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Mary E. Painter, the farm on which we now reside situate in Buffalo township, Butler county and state of Pennsylvania, containing one hundred and twenty-two acres less or more. She to have the use and occupancy of said farm so long as she lives and remains my widow, then and in either case the farm aforesaid and also my unof his real estate by his executors, in their discretion, and directed that, when his son should attain the age of twenty-one, his executors should take the sum of $10,000 to invest, and pay the interest and dividends arising and accruing therefrom to the son, and at his death pay said sum of $10,000 to his children, and the son died after becoming of age, without issue, so that, though the testator's purpose that his son, during his lifetime, should have the income arising from the money was accomplished, the main purpose of the conversion failed,—the property was held to pass as undisposed realty. Roy v. Monroe, 47 N. J. Eq. 356, 20 Atl. 481.

Where a testator, after giving the rents and profits of his entire estate to his wife during widowhood, directed a conversion of it into cash to be placed out at interest for the benefit of his son during his lifetime, and, after the wife's death, gave and devised his estate to children of his son; and the son died before the mother,—the object of the power failed, and the property came to the children of the son at the death of the testator's widow, as real estate. Slocum v. Slocum, 4 Edw. Ch. 613.

Where a testator devised the remainder of his estate, for the purpose of administering which he authorized the sale of his real estate, to the lawful issue of his daughter; and the daughter died without issue,—the proceeds of any real estate sold by the executor retained the character of undisposed real estate. Wood v. Keyes, 8 Paige, 365.

Where a testator authorized and empowered his executors, upon the death of his wife, to sell the residuary realty and divide the proceeds equally between his two children or their issue; and one of them died in the testator's lifetime without issue, thereby obviating the necessity for a division,—the purpose fell, and the estate remained unconverted. Re Rudy, 185 Pa. 359, 64 Am. St. Rep. 654, 39 Atl. 968.

Where a testator directed a sum of money to be laid out in land to be divided between six of his children; and further provided that, if any one of his children should marry into a certain family, the preceding provision should be revoked; and one of such divided one-fourth interest in another farm of sixty acres situate in Buffalo township, Butler county, Pennsylvania, be sold and the money arising from said sales of land, together with all the rest, residue and remainder of my estate of whatsoever kind or nature the same may be I give and bequeath to my two daughters, Minnie R. and Helen M. Painter to be equally divided between them share and share alike. The said sales of land to be made as my daughters, aforesaid, shall see proper. I further direct that my two daughters, Minnie R. and Helen M. Painter shall have a good and comfortable home on my farm on which we now reside so long as they remain single." He appointed his wife and daughter Minnie R. executrices of the will. Minnie R.

Painter died on June 27, 1901, intestate, unmarried, and without issue, leaving to survive her her mother and sister. Helen M. Painter married J. L. M. Halstead, and died November 29, 1903, intestate, and without issue, leaving to survive her her husband, J. L. M. Halstead, and her mother, Mary E. Painter. The latter died June 17, 1905. This bill was filed by the brothers and sisters of George W. Painter, who claim that on the death of his widow and daughters the land descended to them and their brother Peter Painter, one of the defendants. Halstead, the husband of Helen M. Painter, and the two sisters of Mary E. Painter, the widow, intervened and became defendants in the action, and claim that the will of George W. Painter worked children did contract the prohibited marriage.—the object of the conversion, to the extent of the provision made for her, failed, and consequently the undisposed-of portion of the fund directed to be invested resulted, in its unconverted form as personality, to the executors, for the residuary legatees other than herself. Phillips v. Ferguson, 85 Va. 509, 1 L.R.A. 837, 17 Am. St. Rep. 78, 8 S. E. 241.

In this connection, see also Fifield v. Van Wyck, 94 Va. 557, 64 Am. St. Rep. 745, 27 S. E. 446, where it is said: "It seems to be established by the weight of authority that, where a testator directs his real estate to be sold, and the mixed fund arising from the proceeds of the realty and personality to be applied to certain specified purposes, if any part of the disposition fails, either because void ab initio or by lapse, then, in proportion to the extent or amount which the real estate would have contributed to that disposition, the proceeds thereof retain the quality of real estate for the benefit of the heir, although the real estate has been in fact sold."

As hereinbefore noted, the failure of a specific purpose is not always conclusive that the doctrine of equitable conversion is not to be applied, as sometimes the will is regarded as evincing an intention that a conversion of the estate into money shall take place at all events. Such a situation appears to have been presented in the cases following:

In Lash v. Lash, 209 Ill. 505, 70 N. E. 1049, where a testator directed the sale of his land after his wife's death, and the division of the proceeds among his children in specific amounts, it was held that the fact that the directed distribution of the proceeds among the children was not according to the statute of descent disclosed an intention on the part of the testator that his land should not descend to his heirs; and that therefore the death of one of the testator's children before his own death did not destroy the equitable conversion of the lapsed bequest, which went to those entitled to take as intestate personal property.

N. W. 486, it was held that, where a testator directed that, for the more efficient execution of the provisions of his will, and for the purpose of securing a larger income and a better support for his wife, his property should be exchanged for money or for interest-bearing securities, an equitable conversion was effected, notwithstanding the death of the beneficiaries before such conversion took place.

Where a testator directed his executors to sell his real estate, and, after giving certain pecuniary legacies, and directing certain expenditures, gave and bequeathed the residue to be equally divided among certain persons, it was held that the direction to convert was absolute and unqualified, and the share of a legatee whose legacy lapsed upon her death in the lifetime of the testator went to the testator's next of kin, though composed partly of the proceeds of the real estate. Hand v. Marcy, 28 N. J. Eq. 59. This decision is criticized in Canfield v. Canfield, 62 N. J. Eq. 578, 50 Atl. 471, where it is said that the only case cited in support of the proposition is not to the point, but relates to equitable conversion by a contract for the sale of real estate.

In Gourley v. Campbell, 6 Hun, 218, it is held that, where a testator directed his real estate to be converted into a pecuniary fund, to be held by trustees for purposes indicated in the will, the death, before the execution of the power, of the person entitled to the proceeds, does not change the character of the estate, which continues to be deemed to be personality, there being no failure of the object of the conversion, which was simply to establish one character for the whole body of the estate.

This case was, however, reversed upon appeal in 66 N. Y. 169, upon the ground that language of the will did not disclose an intent to make an absolute conversion of the real estate into money; and the further ground that the testator's purpose was to provide for the support and maintenance of his widow and children.

Where a direction of a testator that his real estate should be converted into money, and that the proceeds therefrom should be an equitable conversion of the land into personality; that it vested in his daughters as such; and that on the death of Minnie R., intestate and without issue, her share vested in her mother, Mary E. Painter, absolutely, and at the latter's death intestate it vested in her two sisters. Halstead, for the same reason, claim the interest of his wife, Helen M., the other daughter of George W. Painter. The right, therefore, of the plaintiffs to maintain this bill and have the real estate in question partitioned depends upon whether the will of George W. Painter worked an equitable conversion of the land into personality. If it did, the bill cannot be maintained; if it did not, the real estate descended to the brothers and sisters of George W. Painter, and they have the right to have it partitioned.

The doctrine of equitable conversion is a creature of equity, and is wholly unknown to the law. It is based on the familiar maxim that what ought to be done will be considered or treated as already done. It is now a well-recognized rule of equity used in paying his indebtedness, legacies, and charities, and that the balance be divided between the residuary legatees named, was very explicit, it affected an absolute conversion, for all purposes, into personal property, of his whole estate, which should be distributed as personal property even if the special object intended by the testator should fail. Hutchings v. Davis, 68 Ohio St. 160, 67 N. E. 251.

In Evans's Appeal, 63 Pa. 183, it was held that, where a testator directed the sale of certain real estate and the application of the proceeds to a charitable use, and the gift was void, the real estate was, nevertheless, equitably converted into personality where the power given to the executors to sell the real estate was in the most positive and direct terms, and it appeared to have been the intention of the testator to turn all his property into money.

Where a testator authorized and empowered his executors to convert his estate into cash upon the expiration of a life estate given to his wife, and to distribute the proceeds among certain charitable institutions, it was held that the evident intention of the testator, and the necessity of treating the land as personality in order to carry out that intention, would work an equitable conversion, although the bequest of the residuary estate should be void as having been made within one calendar month before testator's death. Hodges's Estate, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 283.

The effect of failure of the testator's purpose or object is discussed in Harrington v. Pier, 105 Wis. 485, 50 L.R.A. 307, 76 Am. St. Rep. 922, 82 N. W. 345, as follows: "The will requires the executrix to convert the real property of the testatrix into money, and to distribute the entire estate as personal property in the manner indicated therein. In the absence of any circumstances sufficient to do away with the force of that direction, it worked an equitable conversion of the testatrix's real property into personality, and required the will and every part of it to be treated as if dealing with property of the latter character in law and in effect, as of the death of the testatrix. . . . True, a general direction to sell all the real property for some one or more purposes named in a will does not always work a conversion thereof into personality where a necessity therefor does not exist and there is not a clear intent that 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) at all events the testator's purpose was to distribute his estate as personal property. If it appear that the direction to convert the realty into money was coupled with and to merely effect some particular purpose susceptible of satisfaction by a sale of part of the realty only; or if the bequest for such purpose be void, and the will evidences that the execution of the power of sale was made dependent upon the purpose to be accomplished,—the application of the doctrine of equitable conversion of realty into personality ends where the absence of necessity for it begins. The mere circumstance, however, that bequests can be satisfied without a full execution of the power of sale, or be coupled with invalid bequests, is not so inconsistent with an intent that the whole estate shall be treated as personal property as to preclude the application of the doctrine of equitable conversion in such circumstances, if that be manifestly necessary to effect the testator's intent gathered from the entire will. As said in Given v. Hilton, 95 U. S. 591, 24 L. ed. 458, the blending of real estate and personal property in one fund for all the purposes of the will is generally regarded as evidencing intent that the whole estate shall be treated as personal property, even though a necessity therefor does not exist, but such evidence is not conclusive on the question." And it was held that, in view of the condition of the estate, of the fact that the will contemplated the blending of real and personal property for every purpose mentioned in it,—the payment of debts, expenses of administration, and funeral expenses, as well as the final division of the net proceeds,—the entire estate must be dealt with as personal property, irrespective of the validity of a bequest of a share of the net proceeds.

In Read v. Williams, 125 N. Y. 560, 21 Am. St. Rep. 748, 26 N. E. 730, it is said that nothing short of a clear intention, to be collected from the will, that the land shall be sold and converted into money before division, whether the particular purpose fail or not, will be sufficient in equity to change the character of the property; and that while in England even this is not sufficient to exclude the heir, in the absence of an express gift of the proceeds away from him, in this country the courts do not seem to hold so strict a doctrine.

jurisprudence, and is in constant application in courts exercising chancery jurisdiction. The master of the rolls states the principle in Fletcher v. Ashburner (1779) 1 Bro. Ch. 497, a leading case on the subject, as follows (page 499): "Money directed to be employed in the purchase of land and land directed to be sold and turned into money are to be considered as that species of property into which they are directed to be converted." The rule is operative whether the direction is contained in a will or other instrument of writing. Its sole purpose, however, as declared in textbooks and the adjudicated cases, is to effectuate the intention of the testator or parties to the instrument. The crucial test in the application of the doctrine always is whether it is absolutely necessary to carry out the purpose and object of the testator or settlor. If its interposition is a necessity, then it may be invoked with all its legal consequences. Before the rule can operate, however, in the case of a will, the purpose of the testator must be ascertained. Until this is done there is no room for the application of the doctrine. The intent of the testator being ascertained, then so far, and only so far, as there is a necessity to carry that into effect, will there be conversion, though an actual sale of the land has taken place. The doctrine is not an inexorable rule of law to control the inheritance of estates, or to defeat the intestate laws of the state which direct the disposition of the estates of the dead. It is not an inheritance law, nor is it a rule, enforceable at law or in equity, by which a court can divert the transmission of real property from the inheritable channel provided by the laws of the commonwealth. It is simply a fiction, a creation of equity, to carry into effect the purpose in the disposition of his real estate which a testator has expressed in his will, and which, without its application, would be defeated. These principles are well settled, and are recognized by the courts in the application of the doctrine. Mr. Justice Sharswood states the rule with its limitations in Foster's Appeal, 74 Pa. 391, 15 Am. Rep. 553. In delivering the opinion of the court he says (page 397 of 74 Pa.): "Conversion is altogether a doctrine of equity. In law it has no being. It is admitted only for the accomplishment of equitable results. It may be termed an equitable fiction, and the legal maxim In fitione juris semper subsistit equitas has redoubled force in application to it. It follows of necessity that it is limited to its end. . . . There must be some purpose recognized as lawful to be accomplished by a conversion before equity will permit it to have place. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

. . . When the purpose of conversion is attained, conversion ends." In Lorillard v. Coster, 5 Paige, 172 Chancellor Walworth, delivering the opinion of the court, said (page 218): "Upon the principles of equitable conversion, money directed by the testator to be employed in the purchase of land, or land directed to be sold and turned into money, is in this court, for all the purposes of the will, considered as that species of property into which it is directed to be converted, so far as the purposes for which such conversion is directed to be made are legal and can be carried into effect."

While the doctrine of equitable conversion is well settled on principle and reason, and is recognized in numerous cases determined by this court, the sphere or limitation of its application is equally well established, and should be observed. The sole purpose of the doctrine in the case of a will being to effectuate the intention of a testator, it cannot be invoked when his intention fails or is incapable of accomplishment. The reason of the rule then ceases, and the rule itself no longer obtains. This principle is as well settled on reason and authority as the doctrine of equitable conversion itself. It is the logical consequence of the doctrine which cannot be applied unless there is an existing purpose of the testator to be carried into effect. The testator's intention in regard to the disposition of his property, as declared in his will, having failed, an alternative, undisclosed intention cannot take its place, and the doctrine of equitable conversion be invoked to carry it into effect. The court is not at liberty to surmise what the intention of the testator would have been, and what disposition he would have made of his property if he had anticipated the failure of the disposition which he makes in his will. He is dead, and no one can speak for him and declare an alternative intent in the disposition of his property. Any other purpose than that named in the will is necessarily unknown, and the doctrine of equitable conversion cannot be applied to carry out his unknown intention. Hence the necessity for enforcing the rule stated by Mr. Scott, afterwards Lord Eldon, in his argument in the leading English case of Ackroyd v. Smithson, 1 Bro. Ch. 503, that, the reason of the intention ceasing, the intention should be taken to have ceased.

This limitation upon the doctrine of equitable conversion is settled by a uniform current of decisions in this country and in England. In Re Rudy, 185 Pa. 359, 64 Am. St. Rep. 654, 39 Atl. 968, a life interest in land was given the widow, and at her death the executors were to sell and divide the proceeds of sale equally between his son and daughter, "if they be living, or the issue of such of them as may then be deceased." The son died before the testator, the daughter after the testator, but before the life tenant, leaving a husband and two children, one of whom died before the life tenant. It was held that the surviving child of the daughter, subject to the life interests of the widow and father, took the lapsed share as heir, and the residue as sole devisee. In the opinion of the court below in that case, which we adopted, it is said (page 301 of 185 Pa.): "But the intention to effect a sale was auxiliary to another and paramount intention,—to effect a convenient transmission of testator's property to the devisees. The one intent affected the means, and the other the end, and if, for any reason, the means were useless towards attaining the end, the lesser intent should be discarded. The purpose of a sale, and therefore of a conversion, was that the estate might be divided. If there was no necessity for a division, the purpose fell, and the estate remained unconverted." In Morrow v. Brenizer, 2 Rawle, 185, Mr. Justice Huston, speaking of the admitted limitations or qualifications of the doctrine of equitable conversion, said (page 193): "The rule does not apply where the object for which the sale was to be made ceases. The power to sell is then at an end, and lands continue lands. . . . The power to sell ceases when the object ceases. It ceases when the right to the money and the land unite in the same person. It always ceases where one of the devisees dies so that the legacy lapses; and so far the heir takes. And, where the money to be raised is to go to the heir, the descent is never broken for a moment." In Nagle's Appeal, 13 Pa. 260, Mr. Justice Bell, in delivering the opinion, after giving the rule as stated by Mr. Cox in his note to Cruse v. Barley, 3 P. Wms. 20, that the question of conversion out and out depends on whether the testator meant to give to the produce of real estate the quality of personalty to all intents, or only so far as respected the particular purpose of the will, said (page 265 of 13 Pa.): "The authorities from which he deduces this doctrine, to be sure, have relation to lapsed bequests; but I take it the principle is equally applicable where, from any cause, conversion to meet the exigencies of a will is prevented." In Luffberry's Appeal, 125 Pa. 513, 17 Atl. 447, the bequest to the charities in the will failed by reason of the testator's death within one calendar month after the execution of the will. For this reason it was held that the power to sell to pay these bequests became inoperative, and the land remained unconverted and descended to the testator's heirs at law. In that case it is said in the opinion of the court below, approved by this court, that "conversion, as is well settled, is an equitable doctrine, and founded upon some good and sufficient reason for declaring land to be money and money land. Where this fails to apply, the doctrine is inapplicable, and equity refuses its aid, because it would be unreasonable and consequently inequitable."

In Lindsay v. Pleasants, 39 N. C. (4 Fred. Eq.) 320, Mr. Justice Daniel, delivering the opinion of the supreme court of North Carolina, said (page 323): "It is a clear rule in equity that, where real estate is directed to be converted into personal for any express purpose which fails, to consider the disappointed interest as realty (although the land has been sold), and resulting to the heir. The rule equally applies to cases where the real proceeds are blended and bequeathed with the personalty (after answering particular objects), and the context of the will affords no manifestation of the testator's intention to convert the real into personal estate out and out." And in Wood v. Cone, 7 Paige, 471, Chancellor Walworth says (page 476): "Upon the principles of equitable conversion, the proceeds of the real estate directed by the testator to be sold is only considered as converted into personalty for the purposes of the will. And, if any estate or interest in this converted fund was not legally and effectually disposed of by the will, there was a resulting trust as to such estate or interest in favor of . . . the heir at law." Judge Hare, in his notes to Ackroyd v. Smithson, in 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. 1171, says, after a review of the numerous authorities on the subject: "It may be regarded as well settled that a direction to sell for a particular object, or with a view to a contingent event, will not work a conversion, if the object cannot be accomplished, or the contingency does not happen, unless the testator plainly intended that the sale should be an end, and not merely a means." The Supreme Court of the United States recognizes the same limitation of the doctrine of equitable conversion. In an elaborate opinion in Craig v. Leslie, 3 Wheat. 563, 4 L. ed. 460, Mr. Justice Washington says (page 582): "The whole of this doctrine proceeds upon a principle which is incontrovertible, that, where the testator merely directs the real estate to be converted into money for the purposes directed in his will, so much of the estate, or the money arising from it, as is not effectually disposed of by the will (whether it arise from some omission or defect in the will itself, or from any subsequent accident, which prevents the devise from taking effect), results to the heir at law as the old use not disposed of."

In England the limitation upon the doctrine is well settled. The leading case is Ackroyd v. Smithson, 1 Bro. Ch. 503, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. 1171. The elaborate argument of Mr. Scott, afterwards Lord Eldon, convinced Lord Chancellor Thurlow, and firmly settled the doctrine in that jurisdiction, that, where a testator directs his real estate to be sold and the proceeds to be applied to a special purpose, which wholly or partially fails, the undisposed of beneficial interest will go to his heir at law, and not to his next of kin, although the land may have been actually converted into money. In Ripley v. Waterworth (1802) 7 Ves. Jr. 425, in the opinion it is said (page 435): "There is an obvious difference from all the cases which establish this general principle, that, where a person dealing upon his own property only has directed a conversion for a particular special purpose, or out and out, but the produce to be applied to a particular purpose, when the purpose fails the intention fails, and this court regards him as not having directed the conversion." In stating the principle announced in the adjudicated cases in his opinion in Hill v. Cock (1813) 1 Ves. & B. 173, Lord Eldon said (page 175): "Where a testator means, with regard to a particular purpose, to convert his real estate into personal, if that purpose cannot be served the court will not infer an intention to convert the estate for any other purpose not expressed." In Taylor v. Taylor (1853) 3 De G. M. & G. 190, it was held that, where one of the beneficiaries died in the lifetime of the testator, his share of the proceeds of sale was to be decreed real estate, and went to the heir at law. Lord Cranworth, delivering the opinion, said (page 195): "The rule is established by the cases of Digby v. Legard, 3 P. Wms. 22, note, and Ackroyd v. Smithson, that, if a testator disposes of his property, realty and personalty, as a mixed fund, and as to part of it his will cannot take effect,—the heir at law will take so much as was the produce of real estate, upon the principle that the heir at law cannot be disinherited without express words." And in 1864 it was determined by the House of Lords, in Bective v. Hodgson, 10 H. L. Cas. 656, that in the application of the principle ruled in Ackroyd v. Smithson it is immaterial whether the conversion directed by the will has or has not actually taken place; that, so far as the beneficial purpose fails, the real estate or the money, as the case may be, retains its original character for the purpose of ascertaining the ownership of it. The same rule prevails in New York, and is announced in Read v. Williams, 125 N. Y. 560, 21 Am. St. Rep. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

748, 26 N. E. 730, where Andrews, Ch. J., speaking for the court, observes: "The case falls within the general principle declared in many cases, that a power of sale in a will, however peremptory in form, if it can be seen that it was inserted in aid of a particular purpose of the testator, or to accomplish his general scheme of distribution, does not operate as a conversion, where the scheme or purpose fails by reason of illegality, lapse, or other cause. In that case the property retains its original character, and it goes to the heir or next of kin as real estate or personalty, as the case may be." The same rule is universally recognized by text writers. Mr. Jarman (1 Jarman, Wills, 6th. ed. 589) says: "Every conversion, however absolute in its terms, will be deemed to be a conversion for the purposes of the will only, unless the testator distinctly indicates an intention that it is, on the failure of those purposes, to prevail as between the persons on whom the law casts the real and personal property of an intestate, namely, the heir and next of kin." Says Mr. Bispham (Eq. § 315): "Where the purposes of the conversion have totally failed, the property will devolve according to its original character." Mr. Pomeroy (3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1170) says: "Where a conversion . . . is directed, . . . and the purposes and objects for which such conversion was intended totally fail before the directions for a conversion are carried into effect, the property . . . will remain in its original condition, . . . [and] will result in its original unchanged form to the heirs, or to the personal representatives of the testator, . . . as the case may be."

It is clear, therefore, that, under all the authorities, when the purpose of the testator as disclosed by his will has failed or is incapable of accomplishment, the operation of the rule of equitable conversion ceases, the property retains its original character, and goes to the heir or next of kin, as the case may be. It is conceded, as held in Ackroyd v. Smithson, 1 Bro. Ch. 503, and Taylor v. Taylor, supra, that, where real estate is directed to be sold and the proceeds to be paid to certain individuals, and one of the beneficiaries dies in the lifetime of the testator, as to his share a conversion does not take place, and it goes to the heirs at law. We are unable to distinguish between such a case and where the purpose fails subsequent to the death of the testator and prior to the time when the actual conversion can take place. The reason of the rule would clearly extend it to the one case as well as to the other. If the conversion fail because the purpose of the testator fails, and hence cannot be carried out, it logically follows, we think, that there is no conversion if the purpose of the testator fail prior to the time when the actual conversion of the property can take place. The doctrine is a fiction to aid the testator in the accomplishment of his purpose; and, when the purpose ceases for any cause and at any time, it necessarily follows that the fiction becomes inoperative, and cannot be invoked to accomplish something which cannot be done. It is clearly not the purpose of the doctrine of equitable conversion to effect results antagonistic to the law in whose realm it has no abiding place. To hold, however, that the doctrine is applicable where the purpose of the testator fails subsequent to his death is to permit it to defeat the intestate laws of the state, and to establish another and different channel for the transmission of estates of intestate decedents. It would strike down the declared policy of the state as embodied in the statute wherein it is provided that no person who is not of the blood of the ancestor or other relative from whom any real estate descended, or by whom it was given or devised, shall take any estate of inheritance therein. Such would frequently be the manifest result of applying the doctrine of equitable conversion in cases where the purposes of the testator or settlor had failed at a period subsequent to his death. It would produce such a result in the present case. We cannot assent to give it this effect. The legal consequences of so holding, as well as the reason for the rule itself, imperatively demand that the application of the doctrine cease whenever the purpose that commands its intervention has ceased. Our conclusion as to the application of the doctrine of equitable conversion does not impair or defeat the doctrine itself. It simply limits its enforcement to cases where the facts warrant its intervention. In the cause for invoking it in any particular case exists,—that is, if its application is necessary to effectuate the intention of the testator or settlor,—then it may be invoked. If such cause does exist, but has ceased before the actual conversion takes place, then it cannot be applied.

The obvious intent which George W. Painter had in converting his real estate into money after his widow's death was, as expressed in his will, that he might give it to his "two daughters, Minnie R. and Helen M. Painter, to be equally divided between them, share and share alike." His widow was to retain possession of the land during her life, permitting, however their two daughters to reside there while single; and, for the purpose of making a division between his two daughters after her death, he directed the land to be converted "as my daughters aforesaid shall see proper." The necessity for converting it for this purpose entirely failed upon the death of the two daughters prior to their mother's death, when the actual conversion was to take place by a sale of the land. With the death of his two daughters, the purpose he had in converting the land ceased to exist, and thereafter there was no purpose or intent of George W. Painter with regard to his land which the doctrine of equitable conversion could operate upon. It was still land, and whoever took it took it unconverted and in its original character. Equity will not, under such circumstances, interpose to defeat the intestate laws of the commonwealth, and declare that the land shall be considered as personality, so as to vest its title in the next of kin of the widow, who is not of the blood of the party through whom it came. It may be argued that the construction we put upon the doctrine of equitable conversion will frequently defeat the rights of creditors. Equity, however, never enforces the doctrine for the protection of creditors. It acts solely in the interest of the testator or settlor to carry out his intention, and can never be invoked for the purpose of placing title to property in anyone in order that his creditors may be benefited. It may be suggested in this connection that it is a well-established rule that a beneficiary may accept the property in its unconverted condition. This may and frequently does prevent the creditor of the beneficiary from enforcing his claim.

It follows from what has been said that at the death of the survivor of the daughters of George W. Painter, the legatees to whom the proceeds of the real estate were to be distributed, the purpose for which the testator directed conversion of the real estate ceased, and that thereafter, on the death of the widow, who had a life estate therein, it descended as real estate to the heirs of George W. Painter. They, therefore, being the owners of the real estate, have a right to have it partitioned among themselves.

The decree of the court below dismissing the bill is reversed, and the bill is reinstated with a procedendo.

Stewart, J., dissenting:

The will in this case contains an imperative and unconditioned direction for the sale of testator's real estate upon the death of the widow, to whom a life estate is given. With nothing to countervail or qualify this positive direction, the undoubted effect would be a conversion of the real estate into money. The contention is that the direction to sell, though imperative, has regard to a conversion for a limited special purpose, that is to say, for convenience of division and distribution between testator's two daughters, to whom the will gives the entire proceeds of the sale; that, inasmuch as both daughters died without issue, one unmarried, during the widow's life tenancy, a sale is not required for the purpose of the will; in other words, that the direction to sell was but a means to a definite end, and, the object failing, the incident fell with it.

The doctrine of equitable conversion is undoubtedly subject to the qualification here expressed. Whether the present case falls within the qualification is the determining question here. A conversion directed by a testator is conversion only for the purposes of the will. When the purpose is limited and special, the conversion takes place only so far as it may be consistent with, and is related to, the purpose indicated. It is universally allowed that, when the purpose or object of the conversion fails, the estate remains unconverted to the extent of such failure. But what is meant by failure of purpose or failure of object? Both by text writers and in the adjudicated cases these terms are used interchangeably, and each may be regarded as the other's equivalent. We can perhaps turn to no authoritative definition of either, yet an examination of the cases will show a fixed and definite meaning which has never been departed from. This much may be safely affirmed,—that in every adjudication where failure of purpose or object has been allowed to defeat a positive direction to sell, failure was held to mean failure in the gift itself by lapse or other certain avoidance, the payment of which was the object and purpose of the direction. In no case has the qualification been applied where the gift had become effective by the vesting in the donee. In the leading and initial case of Ackroyd v. Smithson, 1 Bro. Ch. 503, the disposition of money to arise from the sale of the real estate was originally completed, but lapse by the death of two of the residuary legatees in the lifetime of the testator caused the failure of the disposition as to their two shares, which, although actually converted into money, resulted to the heir at law as undisposed real estate. This case established the rule, since invariably followed, in cases of lapsed gifts. It was in turn followed by cases where the qualification was applied to defeat the general rule, on the ground that the gift was illegal and therefore failed, as where the gift offended against the rule relating to perpetuities. It was applied, also, where the gift failed because it was made to depend on a contingency that never happened, and to cases where the direction was to sell for the purpose of paying debts, which the testator, subsequent to the making of his will, had himself paid. These cases define the limits of the qualification as fixed by English authorities, and nothing can be found in our 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) own cases that gives countenance to any wider application. While the qualifying doctrine has frequently been recognized in our cases it has rarely happened in Pennsylvania that the qualification has been applied to defeat or avoid a positive direction to sell. Luffberry's Appeal, 125 Pa. 513, 17 Atl. 447, is an instance where it was applied, on the ground that a charitable gift for the payment of which the property directed to be sold was void, because the testator did not survive the statutory period required in such case. Re Rudy, 185 Pa. 359, 64 Am. St. Rep. 654, 39 Atl. 968, is another. This latter case is supposed to make for appellants' contention; but an examination will show that it is in no respect a divergence from the rule as we have stated it to be. In that case, following the direction to sell upon the death of the widow, was a gift of the proceeds of the sale to testator's two children, Sarah K. and George W., "if they be living, or the issue of such of them as may be deceased." George W. died in the lifetime of the testator. Sarah survived the testator, but died during the life tenancy leaving a husband and two children. The husband, as life tenant of the undivided fourth in the realty, petitioned for an order of sale and a division of the proceeds agreeably to the provisions of the will. The petition was denied because the admitted purpose of the direction to sell was to effect a convenient division and transmission of testator's property, and, inasmuch as the share of George W. had lapsed, he having died in the testator's lifetime, with the result that the entire estate passed to Sarah K., there was an entire failure of purpose, and the conversion was therefore avoided. The lapsing of the gift to George W. was the determining factor, as is fully indicated in the opinion of the court below, upon which the decree dismissing the petition was affirmed. Referring to the fact that the retention of the quality of the estate which the testator intended to transmute into another different quality may work a radical change in the interests of his beneficiaries, the learned judge says: "But that consideration can have no weight when we reflect that what has happened was outside of his contemplation altogether. He supposed that more than one person would share the residue. . . . How can we, with any show of propriety, speculate upon what, if he had foreseen the actual event, he would or would not have done either by way of preferring the heir on the one hand or the next of kin on the other? The share which is in controversy lapsed by operation of law. Its disposition cannot be referred to the intention of the testator, because he had no intention with regard to it." The case of Yerkes v. Yerkes, 200 Pa. 419, 50 Atl. 186, also relied upon by the appellants, is not in point. The ground upon which the decision there rests is that the direction to sell was not imperative and peremptory, and consequently did not work a conversion. Whatever other cases there are in Pennsylvania where a direction to sell has been avoided because of failure of purpose, it may confidently be affirmed that upon examination each will be found to rest upon the insufficiency of the will to make effective some particular disposition of all or part of testator's estate. In the present case there was no failure of the gift, and therefore no failure of purpose, notwithstanding the fact that before actual conversion of the land others had succeeded to the rights of the beneficiaries named in the will. Immediately upon the death of the testator the gift which was the proceeds of the sale vested in the two daughters. It comes to nothing that they never had actual enjoyment of it. It vested in them, and was theirs to do with as they pleased. As was said of a similar bequest in Morrow v. Brenizer, 2 Rawle, 185, it vested as money, not by the magic of a fiction, and contrary to the dictates of common sense, but by the express provisions in the will which impressed upon it that particular character. Here, as there, it requires a fiction to make it anything else. It is a mere assumption to say that the testator's purpose contemplated nothing but equality of division between his two daughters. Had they or either of them died leaving issue, it would hardly be pretended that the testator's provision did not have regard to division among such issue. Neither gift nor the incident of sale was made dependent upon their having issue. Admitting that the purpose of the direction was for distribution of the proceeds of sale, there is nothing in the will that gives support to the theory that no distribution was intended except in the event of the two daughters surviving the period of sale.

It is idle to contend that the decision in the present case does not mark a wide departure from long-established principles. The plain logic of it is that, notwithstanding a testator has directed in unequivocal and unconditional terms that his real estate be sold, this direction is to be wholly disregarded if, by reason of the happening of certain events after testator's death, a sale is unnecessary to effectuate a purpose not expressed in the will, but one which to the judicial mind seems to have been the purpose the testator had in view in directing the sale. If there be any authority for so conditioning the application of the doctrine of conversion, my attention has not been directed to it.

I dissent from the view expressed in the majority opinion in this case.

Statute — title — subject.

1. Where the subject embraced in the body of an act is less comprehensive than, but is included within, the subject expressed in the title, the provision of the Constitution that each law shall embrace but one subject and matter properly connected therewith, which subject shall be expressed in the title, may not be violated, when the subject expressed in the title is not misleading.

Due process of law — corporate property — protection.

2. The provision of the state Constitution that no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law, and the provisions of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States as to property right, extends to the property held and

Headnotes by WHITFIELD, J.

Case Note. — Constitutionality of legislation affecting the amount of liability or penalty for delay in delivery, or for destruction, of freight.

For other cases on the question of the validity of state statutes imposing penalties upon common carriers for a failure to settle claims for delay or destruction of freight as an interference with interstate commerce, see the case note to Morris v. Southern Exp. Co. 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 983.

It was held in Morris-Scarboro-Moffitt Co. v. Southern Exp. Co. 146 N. C. 167, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 985, 59 S. E. 667, that a statute imposing a penalty upon common carriers for a delay of ninety days after demand to adjust and pay a valid claim for damages to goods shipped from points without the state does not deny common carriers equal protection of the laws by arbitrarily discriminating against them.

As such act imposes a burden upon common carriers for a local default arising after the termination of transportation, it does not impose a burden on interstate commerce, and is a valid exercise of the state legislative power. Ibid.; Raleigh Iron Works v. Southern R. Co. 148 N. C. 469, 62 S. E. 595; Frasier v. Charleston & W. C. R. Co. 73 S. C. 140, 52 S. E. 904.

Neither does such act infringe the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution. Raleigh Iron Works v. Southern R. Co. supra.

And, as Congress has not attempted to regulate such matters, the act does not violate the interstate commerce clause. Bagg v. Wilmington, C. & A. R. Co. 109 N. C. 279, 14 L.R.A. 596, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 803, 26 Am. St. Rep. 569, 14 S. E. 79, followed and applied in Currie v. Raleigh & used by corporations, since the beneficial ownership of such property is in natural persons, and the law forbids the doing by indirection that which is forbidden to be directly done.

State courts — due process of law — Federal laws.

3. The legality of classifications adopted for legislative regulation may be determined with reference to the due process of law provision of the state Constitution; but, as such determination involves a Federal question, the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States control.

Constitutional law — class legislation — classification — validity.

4. Classifications adopted for legislative regulation should have some just relation to, or reasonable basis in, essential differences of conditions and circumstances with reference to the subject regulated, and should not be merely arbitrary; and all similarly situated, or having similar legal duties and obligations in regard to the subject regulated, should be included in one class,—at least where there are no practical differences that are sufficient to legally warrant a further or special classification in the interest of the general welfare.

Same — class legislation — railroads.

5. The legal duties of persons, firms, or corporations operating railroads may be of a peculiar nature and essentially different from the duties of other common carriers, and, as to such matters, they may be sepaately classified for purposes of legislative regulation.

Same — railroads — unreasonable classification.

6. Where the subject of regulation, as in chapter 5424, p. 104, Acts of 1905, is payment for goods lost in transit by a common carrier, a subject as to which the legal duties of all common carriers are similar, and there appears to be no reasonable basis for imposing the burden of the regulation upon railroads alone, a statute making such regulation applicable to railroads only provides for an unreasonable classification, that, in effect, denies to those operating railroads due process of law and the equal protection of the laws, in violation of constitutional rights, and such statute is inoperative.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Jefferson County to review a judgment in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover for sugar lost while being transported by defendant. Judgment modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George P. Raney for plaintiff in error.

Mr. T. M. Puleston, for defendants in error:

As the statute classifies the subjects of its penalty, not as certain corporations or persons, but those conducting a certain

A. Air Line R. Co. 135 N. C. 535. 47 S. E. 654.

In Lexington Grocery Co. v. Southern R. Co. 136 N. C. 396, 48 S. E. 801 (an intrastate shipment), and Reid v. Southern R. Co. (N. C.) 63 S. E. 112 (an interstate shipment), it was held to be within the police power to impose a penalty upon a railway company for each day's delay in shipping, or neglect to ship, or refusal to receive freight for shipment.

But it was held in Hickory Marble & Granite Co. v. Southern R. Co. 147 N. C. 53, 60 S. E. 719, that a statute imposing a penalty for delaying freight, which seeks to deal with the entire transit from time of shipment until destination is reached, must be limited to intrastate traffic.

In Branch v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 77 N. C. 347, a statute imposing a penalty of $25 per day for a delay of local shipments of freight beyond five days was held a valid exercise of police power. It may be noted that this decision was rendered prior to the passage of the interstate commerce act.

As a failure of a carrier to notify a consignee of the arrival of freight is the neglect of a duty occurring after transportation of an interstate shipment is completed, an act imposing a penalty for such delay is not an interference therewith. Hockfield v. Southern R. Co. (N. C.) 64 S. E. 181.

A statute imposing a penalty upon a railroad company for delay in the delivery of 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

freight does not deprive it of property without due process of law by reason of singling out railroad companies from all common carriers engaged in such business. McCutchen v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 81 S. C. 71, 61 S. E. 1108. The court distinguishes this case from that of Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, infra, in that the statute under consideration sought to enforce a public duty, while in the Ellis Case this was not so. The court, in the course of its opinion, further said: "The evil sought to be remedied was the frequent delay in the transportation of freight by railroads, and all such carriers are included within the statute. It is manifest that regulations which would be entirely reasonable with respect to transportation of freight by railroads would be unreasonable as applied to express companies and carriers by water, due to the difference in the conditions and instrumentalities. Express companies in this state employ the rapid service of passenger trains, and delays which would be regarded as reasonable and excusable with regard to ordinary freight would not be reasonable or excusable with respect to express. On the other hand, carriage by water is subject to many contingencies which do not affect carriage by railroads, and it would not be reasonable to subject both alike to the same regulations as to time."

Neither does such statute violate the equality clause of § 1, art. 14, of the United business, to wit, operating a railroad, it is clearly not such a classification as would make the statute conflict with the state or United States Constitution.

Whitfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In an action in the circuit court for Jefferson county to recover for sugar lost while being transported by the railroad company in March, 1907, the court, at the request of the plaintiff, gave the following instruction to the jury: "The court instructs you to find for the plaintiffs the value of the sugar, to wit, $145, and allow them, in addition thereto, 25 per cent per annum on said sum from the date when plaintiffs' claim was filed with defendant." The defendant excepted thereto. Verdict and judgment were rendered for the plaintiffs in accordance with the instruction above quoted. A motion for new trial covering the charge was overruled. The defendant excepted and took writ of error.

The only question presented for determination is whether the statute authorizing the allowance of 25 per cent per annum in addition to the value of the goods is not un-

States Constitution or of the state Constitution. Sanford v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 79 S. C. 519, 61 S. E. 74.

A statute imposing a penalty upon railroad companies for a refusal to deliver freight upon payment or tender of freight charges, as shown by the bill of lading, is not repugnant to the Texas Constitution and Bill of Rights, by reason of being confined to railroads and excluding other common carriers. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McCown (Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 435.

Neither does such statute discriminate by reason of not applying to all carriers under like circumstances and conditions; nor does it deprive a railroad company of property without due process of law. Ibid.

And such legislation is a valid exercise of the police power. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dwyer, 75 Tex. 572, 7 L.R.A. 478, 16 Am. St. Rep. 826, 12 S. W. 1001.

And such statute is justified under constitutional authority to "pass laws to correct abuses and prevent unjust discrimination and extortion in" freight and passenger rates. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Harry, 63 Tex. 256.

But such statute, when applied to interstate shipments originating in another state, is an unlawful interference with interstate commerce. Houston, E. & W. T. R. Co. v. Peters, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 515, 40 S. W. 429. Contra, Hockfield v. Southern R. Co. supra.

A statute providing that, in actions against railroad companies, inter alia, for damages to or overcharges on freight, when 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

not exceeding $50, which was not paid within thirty days after a verified claim was served upon the railroad company, an attorney's fee may be recovered by the claimant in addition to the actual damages and cost, was held, in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 660, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255, reversing 87 Tex. 19, 26 S. W. 985, to deprive railroad companies of their property without due process of law by an arbitrary classification. The court said: "It is simply a statute imposing a penalty upon railroad corporations for a failure to pay certain debts. No individuals are thus punished, and no other corporations. The act singles out a certain class of debtors, and punishes them when, for like delinquencies, it punishes no others. . . . Further, the penalty is imposed, not upon all corporations charged with the quasi public duty of transportation, but only upon those charged with a particular form of that duty. So, the classification is not based on any idea of special privileges by way of incorporation, nor of special privileges given thereby for purposes of private gain, nor even of such privileges granted for the discharge of one general class of public duties."

However, a statute was held constitutional in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Simonson, 64 Kan. 802, 57 L.R.A. 765, 91 Am. St. Rep. 248, 68 Pac. 653, which imposes an attorney fee in favor of one successfully prosecuting an action, for the failure of a common carrier safely to transport goods.

constitutional. because the classification adopted is such that it deprives the company of property without due process of law and denies to it the equal protection of the laws.

Chapter 5424, p. 104, Acts 1905, provides "that any person, firm, or corporation operating any railroad in this state" shall, within ninety days after the filing of a claim for the loss of, or damage to, any shipment, pay the claim, and, upon failure to so pay, "then they shall pay to said claimant the sum of 25 per cent per annum on the principal sum of said claim, and, when the said claimant shall bring suit and recover for his claim, . . . he shall be allowed in said suit the said 25 per cent per annum in addition to the principal sum of said claim, and have judgment therefor;" provided the recovery is greater than the sum that had been tendered in settlement of the claim before the expiration of the said ninety days.

The title to the chapter is "An Act Providing that Any Common Carrier Transporting Freight shall Pay Claims for a Loss or Damage to Any Shipment Received by Said Common Carrier within a Certain Time from the Filing by the Shipper of Said Claim with the Common Carrier, and when, under Certain Conditions, They Fail so to Pay Said Claim, the Said Common Carrier shall Pay Interest on the Said Claim at the Rate of 25 per cent per Annum, and, under Certain Conditions, shall be Allowed Judgment for the Said Interest in Addition to Said Claim."

While the title of the statute extends to the comprehensive class of "any common carrier," the body of the act covers only "any person, firm, or corporation operating any railroad in this state."

Where the body of a statute covers a subject affecting a class not covered by the title, the constitutional provision that "each law enacted in the legislature shall embrace but one subject and matter properly connected therewith, which subject shall be briefly expressed in the title," may be violated; but, where the class affected by the subject contained in the body of the act is not as broad as, but is included within, that expressed in the title, the quoted provision of the organic law may not be violated. The body of the act should not contain and operate upon a subject affecting a class that is broader and more comprehensive than the one expressed in the title of the act; but the subject covered by the body of the act may be more restricted, if included within the subject expressed in the title, when the title is not misleading. The title may be broader than the act; but the act should not be broader than the title. Otherwise, the subject embraced in the act may not be expressed in the title, as required by the provision of the organic law.

Common carriers of goods ordinarily include all persons, firms, or corporations operating a railroad; but persons, firms, or corporations operating a railroad do not ordinarily include all common carriers of goods. The class affected by the subject embraced in the statute is not as broad as, but is included within, that expressed in the title. See Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 124; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 582; State ex rel. Moodie v. Bryan, 50 Fla. 293, 39 So. 929.

The legality of classifications adopted for legislative regulation may be determined with reference to the due process of law provision of the state Constitution; but, as such determination involves a Federal question, the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States control.

The provision of the state Constitution that "no person shall . . . be deprived of . . . property without due process of law" extends to the property held and used by corporations, since the beneficial ownership of such property is in natural persons, and the law forbids the doing by indirection that which is forbidden to be directly done. Upon the same principle of law, the provisions of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, relating to due process of law and the equal protection of the laws, being intended to be complete in its effectiveness, apply to the property held and used by corporations. State v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (Fla.) 47 So. 969.

The requirements of due process of law relate to rights, as well as to remedies, and extend to all the powers of government. The guaranty of due process of law afforded by the Constitution forbids the arbitrary exercise of governmental power by the legislature.

An unreasonable classification of persons or corporations for the purposes of a legislative regulation that will be burdensome to those included in the class regulated, leaving others who are similarly conditioned with reference to the subject regulated free from the regulation and burden, may be an arbitrary exercise of governmental power.

The language of the statute in this case is explicit in limiting its operation to only one class of common carriers of goods, to wit, persons, firms, or corporations operating railroads; and the validity of the act with reference to the classification must be determined by a consideration of its plain and unambiguous terms. The subject regulated is not peculiar to railroads, but is equally and similarly applicable to all common carriers of goods, whether the service is rendered by the use of railroads, boats, or other means.

If this statute is enforced, and two entirely similar shipments are made at the same time between the same points, one by means of a railroad and the other by means of a steamboat, and both shipments are lost in transit, the shipper may, under the circumstances stated in the act, recover from the operators of the railroad 25 per cent per annum in addition to the value of the goods lost by it; while, under exactly similar circumstances, only the value of the goods may be recovered from the operators of the steamboat. This is clearly an unjust discrimination against those operating the railroad, since there is apparently no real difference between the two common carriers with reference to the subject regulated, which is the payment of goods lost in transportation by a common carrier.

The more general use of railroads as common carriers of goods, the absence of steamboat or other competition in some portions of the state, and the amount of business done by railroads, do not appear to furnish a sufficient difference for a reasonable separate classification, including only those who operate railroads, for the purposes of the regulation here considered.

Authority to fix the rate of interest or additional compensation to be paid upon contractual or legal obligations because of delay in settlements is properly exercised by the lawmaking department of the state government; and the power of the legislature in the premises is limited only by applicable provisions of the state and Federal Constitutions. The organic law contains no express limitations upon the power of the legislature to fix compensatory rates; but this governmental function must be so exercised as not to violate any provision or principle of organic law for the protection of property rights. Like all other statutes imposing regulations, such laws should be based upon a just classification of persons and corporations with reference to the subject regulated, and such classification should not be purely arbitrary.

Great latitude should be accorded to the legislature in the exercise of its proper powers. Billings v. Illinois, 188 U. S. 97, 47 L. ed. 400, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 272. But, if a statute clearly violates any limitation upon the lawmaking power contained in the state or the Federal Constitution, it is the duty of the courts to so announce when it is duly made to appear. State ex rel. Loftin v. McMillan, 55 Fla. 246, 45 So. 882.

Where persons or corporations engaged in the same character of business under practically the same legal duties and obligations are subjected to different restrictions or burdens with reference to the duties and obligations of such business, and there are no legal or natural, practical, and reasonable differences of a material or substantial nature in the duties owed by them in the subject regulated, which justify a difference in regulations of the duties and obligations with reference to the business engaged in by all, the different restrictions or burdens imposed on some and not on all similarly conditioned may operate as a deprivation of property without due process of law and as a denial of the equal protection of the laws. See 8 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1073.

The constitutional guaranties of due process of law and of equal protection of the laws do not prevent the making of just and reasonable classifications of persons and corporations with reference to subjects for legislative regulation. See Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357; Hayes v. Walker, 54 Fla. 163, 44 So. 747.

In determining the legality of classifications for legislative regulation, the subject to be regulated, the character, extent, and purpose of the regulation, the classes of persons legally and naturally affected by the regulation, and the particular classification and regulation adopted by the statute, should be considered. Difficulty is often experienced in determining whether all those belonging to the classes legally and naturally affected by the regulation are included in the classification made, or whether any are illegally excluded from the particular classification adopted by the statute.

The classification adopted should have some just relation to, or reasonable basis in, essential differences of conditions and circumstances with reference to the subject regulated, and should not be merely arbitrary; and all similarly situated, or having similar legal duties and obligations in regard to the subject regulated, should be included in one class,—at least where there are no practical differences that are sufficient to legally warrant a further or special classification in the interest of the general welfare. See McGehee, Due Process of Law, 56 et seq.; Jones v. Brim, 165 U. S. 180, 41 L. ed. 677, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 282; Re Van Horne (N. J. Ch.) 70 Atl. 986; Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Kinney (Ind.) 85 N. E. 954.

The legal duties of persons, firms, or corporations operating railroads may be of a peculiar nature, and essentially different from the duties of other persons, firms, or corporations, or even different from other common carriers, such, for example, as the fencing of tracks, the operation of trains, construction of tracks, maintenance and operation of terminals, depots, or crossings, protection of employees, and the like. As to such matters peculiar to railroads, they may be separately classified for purposes of legislative regulation. See Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Beckwith, 129 U. S. 26, 32 L. ed. 535, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 207; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 32 L. ed. 107, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1161; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. May, 194 U. S. 267, 48 L. ed. 971, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 638; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Matthews, 174 U. S. 96, 43 L. ed. 919, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609; Tullis v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. 175 U. S. 348, 44 L. ed. 192, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Ohio, 173 U. S. 285, 43 L. ed. 702, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 465; Calvert, Regulation of Commerce, 163 et seq.; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Lighthouse, 168 Ind. 438, 78 N. E. 1033; Johnson v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 43 Minn. 222, 8 L.R.A. 419, 45 N. W. 156; Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Harrington, 85 Miss. 366, 37 So. 1016, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 181, and cases cited; 8 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1069.

Because of the peculiar rights, duties, and responsibilities applicable to all common carriers of goods, their obligations to compensate for failure to properly discharge their contractual or legal duties to the public are regarded as being sufficiently different from others to justify a classification including only common carriers. See Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Seegers, 207 U. S. 73, 52 L. ed. 108, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 28; Morris-Scarboro-Moffitt Co. v. Southern Exp. Co. 146 N. C. 167, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 983, 59 S. E. 667.

There appears to be no real difference between the legal duty of those who operate railroads and those otherwise engaged as common carriers of goods to pay for goods lost or injured in transportation.

The rights, duties, and responsibilities of all common carriers of goods as to compensating for goods lost in transit are in law practically the same, whether the service is rendered by the use of a railroad, a boat, or other instrumentality. The loss of goods to the shipper is the same, and the usual remedies afforded by law are the same.

While courts will not needlessly inquire into the legislative motives or policy, and will not hold a statute to be inoperative because unconstitutional, unless it is clear beyond a reasonable doubt that the organic law has been violated, yet, where constitutional provisions have been violated in the enactment or in the provisions of a statute, it is the duty of the courts to so declare in a proper proceeding. The constitutional guaranty of due process of law requires that statutes shall operate upon all alike under practically similar conditions; and if a statute, in providing a regulation, arbitrarily or unjustly discriminates between persons or corporations that are similarly conditioned with reference to the duties regulated, the organic provisions securing property rights may be violated. No greater burdens should be laid upon one than are laid upon others in the same calling and condition with reference to the subject regulated. See Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357.

In State ex rel. Ellis v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 52 Fla. 646, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 500, 41 So. 705, the subject of regulation pertained exclusively to railroads. In State ex rel. Lamar v. Jacksonville Terminal Co. 41 Fla. 363, 27 So. 221, the subject of regulation was appellate proceedings in cases subject to reasonable classification. In Dell v. Marvin, 41 Fla. 221, 45 L.R.A. 201, 79 Am. St. Rep. 171, 26 So. 188, the subject of regulation could reasonably be applied to a peculiar class of cases. In Bloxham v. Florida C. & P. R. Co. 35 Fla. 625, 17 So. 902; Florida C. & P. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 183 U. S. 471, 46 L. ed. 283, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 176, the subject was taxation, and the peculiar character of railroad properties justified a separate classification of them. In other cases cited by counsel the subject of regulation was peculiar to the limited class covered by the regulation.

The subject of regulation in this case is not the operation of railroads, but it is the payment for goods lost in transportation by a particular kind of common carrier. The character and purpose of the regulation are fairly and naturally applicable to the legal duties and obligations of all common carriers of goods as a comprehensive class, though the advantages of the regulation may be more pronounced in regard to railroads, because of their more general use, or otherwise. The particular classification adopted by the statute is limited to those operating railroads. If the nature and the purpose of the regulation are naturally and logically applicable alike to the legal duties and obligations of all common carriers of goods, and there is no practical and essential difference between railroads and other common carriers of goods with reference to the subject of regulation, so as to make a separate classification of railroads for the purpose of such regulation reasonable and necessary for the public welfare, the classification made, being limited to railroads, may not be warranted by law.

The practical advantages possessed by those who operate railroads may enable them to more successfully defer the discharge of their legal duties and obligations with reference to compensation for goods lost in transit; but this difference is only in degree, and it does not now appear to be sufficient to justify a separate classification of railroads for regulating duties that are applicable alike to all common carriers of goods. The more general use of railroads and the greater volume of business done by them do not appear to justify a separate classification of railroads for the purpose of regulating the payment for goods lost in transit. If so, then railroads could be classified for this purpose with reference to the amount of business done by each of them.

There appears to be no valid reason for making regulations for railroads materially different from those made for express companies, steamboats, and perhaps other common carriers of goods in a subject that is legally and naturally and universally applicable to all common carriers alike.

In the particulars where the legal duties of those who operate railroads essentially differ from other common carriers, they may be separately classified for legislative regulation without offending the due process of law and the equal protection of the laws clauses of the organic law; and in cases of doubt the legislative will should be enforced in deference to the lawmaking power. But, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, where there appears to be no just basis for a classification adopted, and the regulation imposes a material burden upon a part only of a comprehensive class with reference to legal duties and obligations that pertain in substantially the same manner to all of the class, the classification is not in accord with the requirements of the Constitution as to due process of law and the equal protection of the laws. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 41 L. ed. 666, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255.

The principles announced in the last-cited case have not been rejected, but have been recognized or approved in many later cases. See Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Matthews, 174 U. S. 96, 43 L. ed. 909, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609; Fidelity Mut. Life Asso. v. Mettler, 185 U. S. 308, 46 L. ed. 922, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 662; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Paul, 173 U. S. 404, 43 L. ed. 746, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419; Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1037, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594; Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Seegers, 207 U. S. 73, 52 L. ed. 108, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 28; Dell v. Marvin, 41 Fla. 221, 45 L.R.A. 201, 79 Am. St. Rep. 171, 26 So. 188; Efland v. Southern R. Co. 146 N. C. 135, 59 S. E. 355; State v. Ide, 35 Wash. 576, 67 L.R.A. 280, 102 Am. St. Rep. 914, 77 Pac. 961, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 634; Standard Oil Co. v. Spartanburg, 68 S. C. 37, 44 S. E. 377. St. Rep. 236, 82 Pac. 956, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 475.

A common carrier has possession of goods it is transporting, has a right to compensation for the transportation and a lien therefor, and has other privileges and advantages with reference to the public service that warrant valid regulations affecting the legal duties and obligations of common carriers as a distinct and comprehensive class. Chapter 5618, p. 101, approved June 30, 1907, appears to be designed for this purpose.

In providing for the regulation of settlements for goods lost in transportation, a subject applicable alike to all common carriers of goods, chapter 5424, p. 104, Acts 1905, makes a separate classification of persons, firms, or corporations operating railroads that is not based upon legal or natural, practical, and reasonable differences in conditions with reference to the subject regulated. The regulation does not cover a subject in which the duties of those who operate railroads legally differ from other common carriers of goods, and there appears to be no natural, practical, and substantial difference between railroads and other common carriers of goods with reference to the duty to pay for goods lost in transit that is a reasonably sufficient basis for the classification.

In making this special classification for the purposes of this regulation the constitutional guaranties of due process of law and the equal protection of the laws are violated, and the statute for this reason must be held to be inoperative. Without a valid statute, 25 per cent per annum cannot be allowed on a recovery from a common carrier for goods lost in transit. As the statute is invalid, the instruction given at the request of the plaintiff was not authorized by law. For this reason the judgment is erroneous.

The loss of the goods by the carrier and their value being admitted, and the amount added to the verdict and judgment by virtue of the statute herein declared inoperative being capable of definite ascertainment, it is ordered that, if the defendants in error do, within thirty days, enter a remittitur for the amount so added under the statute, the judgment will be affirmed; otherwise, the judgment stands reversed. The costs on this writ of error will be taxed against the defendants in error.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

LOUISVILLE RAILWAY COMPANY,
Appt.,
v.

WILLIAM JOHNSON, Admr., etc., of Alonzo Dow Johnson, Deceased.

Evidence — res gestæ — statements of motorman.

1. The statement of a motorman in charge of a car which killed a person on the track, immediately after the accident when he had reached the body of deceased, that he saw the man and tried to stop, but could not, is admissible in an action against the street car company to recover damages for the death as part of the res gestæ, when one controversy in the case is whether deceased was struck by the front of the car, or fell, or was pushed against the side of it.

Same — statement by conductor.

2. The statement by the conductor of a car which kills a man on the track, made when he and the motorman had reached deceased, admonishing the motorman to make no statements, is not admissible as res gestæ.

Case Note. — Does the fact that one was not a participant or actor in an accident or affray render his statements or exclamations inadmissible as res gestæ.

It will be noted that the question which is the subject of this annotation presupposes the existence of all the other conditions and elements essential to make the statements or exclamations in question admissible as res gestæ. Therefore, cases holding that certain statements or declarations were not admissible as res gestæ, for reasons other than that they were made by one not an actor or participant, although they were in fact made by such a person, are not strictly in point. Many of these cases, however, have been referred to for the purpose of distinguishing them and showing that they lend no support to any general doctrine excluding the declarations or exclamations of nonactors or participants, merely because they are such, from the rule as to res gestæ. The particular reason assigned for the exclusion of the statements or exclamations in these cases is referred to merely for the purpose of showing that the decisions do not rest on any such doctrine, and there is no intention to indicate any opinion as to the soundness or unsoundness of the particular reason assigned, or to gather the authorities as to any reason, except the single reason that the declarant was not a participant or actor.

The note is further confined to declarations or exclamations the admission of which as res gestæ would—to employ Professor Wigmore's phrase (3 Wigmore, Ev. § 1745)—involve "a real exception to the hearsay rule;" in other words, statements or declarations the testimonial value of which in in an action against the street car company to recover damages for the death, since it does not tend to throw light upon any phase of the controversy.

Appeal — erroneous evidence — error.

3. The erroneous admission, in an action against a street car company to recover damages for the death of a person killed on the track, of evidence of a statement by the conductor at the time of the accident admonishing the motorman to make no statement, is not sufficiently prejudicial to require a reversal of a judgment against the company.

Evidence — res gestæ — statements of bystanders.

4. Statements of bystanders at the time of the killing of a person by a street car are not admissible in evidence as part of the res gestæ in an action to hold the street car company liable for the death.

Street railway — lookout.

5. A motorman in charge of a street car must keep a lookout for persons on the track, and for those so near thereto as to be in danger of being injured by the car.

elucidating the issue depends upon their truth or falsity, and not upon the bare fact that they were uttered or made. To illustrate the distinction in its bearing upon the scope of the note: If the issue is whether a passenger jumped from the platform of a street car or was pushed therefrom by the conductor, and the case deals with the admissibility of the declarations or exclamations of a bystander tending to elucidate that point, it is within the scope of this note,—assuming that the decision turned upon the point that the declarations or exclamations were made by one who was not an actor or participant; whereas, if the issue is whether a passenger acted negligently in jumping from a car in apprehension of a threatened collision, and the case merely deals with the admissibility of declarations or exclamations of bystanders as tending to show the influences operating on the plaintiff's mind and the reasonableness of his conduct in the premises, it is not within the scope of the note. In the former case the statements or declarations are entirely irrelevant except as they tend to establish the existence of the facts which they affirm; in the latter case the very fact that they were made, irrespective of any question as to truth or falsity, may be relevant. The importance of the distinction, of which many other concrete illustrations might be given, in connection with the subject under discussion, is obvious.

Questions as to admissibility of statements or declarations of bystanders for the purpose of corroborating or impeaching the testimony of a witness, or their admissibility as tending to show an implied admission of a party in whose presence they were made, are, of course, beyond the scope of the note.

There is a sense in which it is clear that the person from whom the statements or exclamations proceed must be an actor or participant in the transaction to which they relate in order to make them admissible as res gestæ, since a statement or exclamation, by whomever made, to be admissible as res gestæ, must be so close in point of time to the event or transaction of which it speaks, and of so spontaneous and unreflective a character, that it may, in a figurative or rhetorical sense at least, be regarded as a part of that event or transaction, as distinguished from a mere narrative or account of it; and in the same sense, of course, the person by whom the statement or exclamation is uttered must be an actor or participant. The necessity that the declarant be an actor or participant in this sense does not involve any external requirements or conditions, but is inherent in the other conditions essential to the applicability of the rule as to res gestæ. It is obvious, however, that the doctrine of LOUISVILLE R. CO. v. JOHNSON and other cases hereinafter cited, that the person uttering the declarations or exclamations must be an actor in the occurrence in order to make them admissible as res gestæ, has reference to something quite different, and mean for practical purposes that the declarant must be either a victim of the act or event to which his declarations or exclamations relate, or have some part in bringing the same about, or at least some responsibility with respect to the matter; and it is in this sense that the question is treated in this note. But even this doctrine, of course, does not require that the declarant be a party to the action.

While, as subsequently shown, there is clear authority, not only in the earlier Kentucky cases, but also in cases from other jurisdictions in support of the doctrine of LOUISVILLE R. CO. v. JOHNSON, that exclamations or declarations, to be admissible as res gestæ, must proceed from an actor or participant in the practical sense just referred to, that doctrine appears to be against the clear weight of authority, when the distinctions already referred to are observed and the cases in which the declarations or exclamations, though made by one not a participant or actor, were excluded, not for that reason, but for other reasons, are eliminated. So far as the latter cases are in point at all, they would seem to bear against, rather than in favor of, that doctrine, since, if the mere fact that the declarations or exclamations were made by one not an actor or participant were sufficient to exclude them as res gestæ, there would be no necessity for invoking any other ground to justify their exclusion; hence the implication, which in some of the cases is quite strong, that their exclusion could not have been justified on that ground alone.

It may, perhaps, be questioned whether the notion that the declarant must have been an actor or participant in the transaction in the practical sense intended in LOUISVILLE R. CO. v. JOHNSON, and other cases which support the doctrine of that case, did not grow out of a misapprehension of the language employed by the earlier cases and text writers to express the inherent necessity that the declarations must have been so close in point of time and of so spontaneous and unreflective a character as to make the declarant, as it were, an actor or participant in the transaction. There seems to be but little real reason for such a condition—at least as a universal condition—in any other sense.

Assuming that the subject-matter of declarations or exclamations was equally within the knowledge or observation of both persons, if there is any difference at all, it would seem that the apparently involuntary, spontaneous, and contemporaneous declarations or exclamations of a bystander who had just witnessed an accident or affray in which he had otherwise no part or connection would be entitled to greater credence than similar exclamations or declarations by one who was an actor or participant therein, and who might therefore have had an interest in giving a particular aspect or color to the event, because of the greater Messrs. Fred Forcht, Jr., and D. W. Baird also for appellant.

Messrs. Marion W. Ripy and Bennett H. Young, for appellee:

The evidence as to the motorman's and conductor's statements admitted as part of the res gestæ was clearly competent.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the night of August 11, 1907, Alonzo Dow Johnson was struck and killed by one probability in the former case than in the latter that the exclamations or declarations which were in appearance spontaneous and involuntary were in fact such, and not the products of rapid reflection and consideration. It may happen, of course, that the declarations or exclamations are of such a nature, or the facts which they affirm of such a character, that, coming from an actor or participant, they are properly regarded as spontaneous declarations as to a matter of fact and as such admissible as res gestæ, whereas, coming from a mere bystander, they would necessarily be mere expressions of opinion, and therefore inadmissible for that reason. To illustrate: If the question is whether one jumped from a platform of a car, or fell therefrom during a momentary attack of vertigo, his own spontaneous declaration or exclamation that he had a sudden attack of vertigo and fell would apparently relate to a matter of fact, and therefore perhaps be admissible as res gestæ, whereas a similar declaration by the third person would necessarily be a mere matter of opinion, and, for that reason, not admissible as res gestæ. It is apparent, therefore, that a decision excluding as res gestæ the declarations or exclamations of one not an actor or participant, even if the opinion concedes that similar declarations or exclamations proceeding from an actor or participant would have been admissible, is not necessarily an authority for the general doctrine that the mere fact that one was not a participant or actor will necessarily, under all circumstances, exclude his exclamations and declarations as res gestæ.

In spite, however, of the various possible ways of reconciling the exclusion of declarations or exclamations of nonactors under particular circumstances with their admission under other circumstances, there are quite a number of cases, especially from Arkansas, Kentucky, and Louisiana, which apparently sustain the doctrine of Louisville R. Co. v. JOHNSON, by which the mere fact that declarations or exclamations of the kind that fall within the scope of this note as above outlined were made by one not an actor or participant will exclude them as res gestæ although all the other conditions necessary to make them admissible as such are present.

The Arkansas supreme court, in Flynn v. State, 43 Ark. 293, clearly sustains the doctrine of Louisville R. Co. v. JOHNSON, as applied to declarations or exclamations within the scope of this note. The court says: "It often becomes difficult to determine when declarations shall be received as part of the res gestæ. In cases like this words uttered during the continuance of the main action, or so soon thereafter as to preclude the hypothesis of concoction or premeditation, whether by the active or passive party, become a part of the transaction itself, and, if they are relevant, may be proved as any other fact without calling the party who uttered them. And, if the assaulted party should flee, as it is argued that Pruitt [the party alleged to have been assaulted] did here, what he says in his flight under the apprehension of immediate danger is admissible for the same reason. All declarations, however, must come from a participant in the transaction which the declarations are intended to explain or enlarge, to come within the rule. [Citing authorities.] The declarations of a bystander are not admissible in evidence." In this case a witness, to sustain the issue that the shots were fired by defendant at Pruitt, testified that, immediately after the shots were fired, he and some other persons ran back into a little alleyway to keep out of line of the shots, and that a man (identified as Pruitt) came up scared and excited and declared that defendant was shooting at him. These declarations were held inadmissible for the reason that it did not appear where Pruitt was at the time the shots were fired, or that he was a party, passive or otherwise, to the assault. The court said, in effect, that, if he had been connected with the main fact of the assault by testimony tending to show a participation in of appellant's street cars just outside the city limits of Louisville, while on his way to the city in company with a large crowd of people who had been spending the evening at Fountain Ferry park, a pleasure resort near the city. For some reason, street-car traffic was delayed, and a number of persons started to walk into the city in the road over which the street cars run. They had gone some distance, when a large motor car carrying a trailer came along. These cars were crowded with people, and, according to the testimony of several witnesses, were running at an unusually high rate of speed at the time Johnson, who was in the road with the other people, was struck. The theory of appellee is that Johnson was struck by the front end or fender of the first car; while appellant contends that he was walking on the roadway adjacent to the track and in no danger from the cars, but that, after the front end of the car had passed him in safety, he ran into, or fell or was pushed by one of his companions against, the side or middle of the motor car, causing him to fall between the motor car and the trail car attached to it. Each party introduced evidence in support of its theory of the accident, and, the jury having found against the appellant, it prosecutes this appeal from the judgment entered on the verdict.

It is complained that the court erred in admitting incompetent evidence and in rejecting competent evidence, in giving instructions to the jury, and that the verdict or connection with it, his declarations would have been admissible as res gestæ; but that until linked with the affair in some way he was only a bystander, and what he said was hearsay.

Statements (apparently made by a bystander) with respect to a collision between a street car and a team, made after the car had left the scene and the injured person had been carried across the street, to a witness who had traveled several blocks to the scene of the accident after hearing of it, were held, in Hot Springs Street R. Co. v. Hildreth, 72 Ark. 572, 82 S. W. 245, not admissible as res gestæ, but only for the purpose of contradicting the testimony of the person by whom they were made. The ground of the decision does not appear, and, if the case stood alone, the decision might, perhaps, be accounted for on the ground that the statements were too remote in time.

Exclamations made by the wife of the defendant at the time of the affray: "Quit! Don't shoot;" whereupon defendant ordered her to let him alone and fired one more shot,—were held admissible in Appleton v. State, 61 Ark. 590, 33 S. W. 1060. The decision, however, was upon the ground that the declarations were not admitted to prove certain facts and to supply the place of other testimony, but only to explain and throw light upon the subsequent words and conduct of defendant; and therefore, for reasons given at the beginning of the note, the case is not in conflict with the Flynn Case, which dealt with another class of declarations.

The same is true of St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Murray, 55 Ark. 248, 16 L.R.A. 787, 20 Am. St. Rep. 32, 18 S. W. 50, holding that the language and acts of other passengers before the plaintiff jumped from a train in apprehension of danger from a collision were admissible as showing the situation as it appeared to him at the time.

It is not so easy, however, to reconcile with the Flynn Case the decision in Beale-Dovle Dry Goods Co. v. Carr, 85 Ark. 479, 108 S. W. 1053, that the excited declarations of a child to his father while plaintiff was lying injured at the bottom of an elevator shaft and before he had been discovered, that a man had pushed the elevator door open and walked in, were admissible as res gestæ on the issue whether the door was left open. It is to be noted, however, that the declarations were objected to upon the grounds that they merely narrated a past incident, and that the child was of too tender an age to be competent as a witness, and there seems to have been no objection on the broad ground that the declarant was not an actor or participant in the transaction.

With the possible exception of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Carothers, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1675, 65 S. W. 833, 66 S. W. 385, which is commented upon in the opinion in LOUISVILLE R. Co. v. JOHNSON, the Kentucky cases seem quite consistently to support the doctrine of LOUISVILLE R. Co. v. JOHNSON. Thus, in Bradshaw v. Com. 10 Bush, 576, the court said: "Contemporaneous expressions or exclamations of the assailant, or of his coadjutors, or of the deceased, in cases of homicide, may be proved for the purpose of illustrating the character or quality of the act. . . . We are aware of no case in which it was held that the cries or exclamations of persons in no way connected with the main fact were admissible as part of the res gestæ." The question in this case was whether the deceased was shot and then thrown from the platform of a car, or accidentally fell therefrom; and declarations of persons on the platform at the time, to the effect that defendant had shot the deceased and thrown him off, were held not admissible as res gestæ, for the reason that they did not proceed from either of the parties engaged in the affray, or from anyone acting in concert with either of them.

So, what is said by a participant during a transaction is a part of the res gestæ; but the statement of a bystander is not a part of the res gestæ. French v. Com. 7 Ky. L. Rep. 748.

And, in a prosecution for homicide, exclamations coming from mere bystanders, giving expression to the opinion that defendant ought to be hung, are not admisis not sustained by the evidence. Taking up these points in the order named, the first error assigned is in permitting W. H. Kahl and F. J. Owens to testify as to the statements made by the motorman and conductor in charge of the car immediately at the time of the accident. These witnesses said they were present in the crowd that was walking up the street when the accident occurred, and were among the first persons to go to Johnson after he was struck; that, about the same time they reached the body, the conductor and motorman came up, and they said to the motorman, "You have killed a man back there," and the motorman said, "Well, I seen the man, I seen his fate and all, and tried to make the stop, but couldn't make it," and the conductor said to the motorman, "Keep your damned mouth still, and don't make any statement until you are called upon to make one." The conductor and motorman both denied that they made the statements attributed to them, which were admitted as evidence over the objection of appellant; the trial court holding that the testimony was competent as a part of the res gestæ. It is not seriously contended that these statements were not made close enough to the time of the accident to be admissible as a part of the res gestæ; but it is insisted that the statement of the motorman threw no light on the accident, and did not explain or illustrate how it occurred, but was merely a narrative of what had happened, while the remark attributed to the conductor is said to have no connection sible as res gestæ. Kaelin v. Com. 84 Ky. 366, 1 S. W. 594.

And the fact that the person whose declarations were admitted as res gestæ was an actor or participant in the transaction was emphasized in Colley v. Com. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 346, 12 S. W. 132, the court remarking incidentally that the "statement of a bystander in no way acting in concert with either of the parties to a transaction does not constitute a part of the res gestæ."

So, in admitting as res gestæ exclamations of the deceased's son at the time of and immediately after the shot, "Don't shoot pap," the court remarked that the son evidently tried to prevent defendant from shooting his father, and "in that sense he was a participant, though a peaceable one, in what occurred." Kennedy v. Com. 30 Ky. L. Rep. 1063, 100 S. W. 242.

And in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Molloy, 122 Ky. 219, 91 S. W. 686, holding declarations of the driver of a vehicle in which deceased was riding at the time he was killed in a collision with a train admissible as res gestæ, the court remarked that the declarant "was an actor in the transaction."

So, in Selby v. Com. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2203, 80 S. W. 221, where it appeared that defendant, while intoxicated, was handling a pistol, and another member of the party grabbed it, whereupon it instantly fired killing a third member of the party, the court, in holding that the remark of such second party as he rose with the pistol in his hands, "Boys, you see that it was an accident," was admissible as res gestæ, said that the declarant was a party to the occurrence, and, upon that ground, distinguished the case from others holding that the declarations of bystanders are not admissible.

In O'Donnell v. Louisville Electric Light Co. 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1362, 55 S. W. 202, an action for the death of a lineman, it was said that the evidence of what the foreman said just at the time the decedent fell was admissible. It does not appear, however, what the foreman said, nor what his connection with the occurrence, if any, was, nor even that his declarations were admitted on the ground that they were res gestæ.

Remarks made by persons who arrested plaintiff during and immediately after an assault upon him by employees of the carrier were held admissible in Sherley v. Billings, 8 Bush, 147, 8 Am. Rep. 451; but these remarks were apparently of the nature of verbal acts and therefore not of the class that fall within the scope of this note.

The exclamations of the wife and daughter of the person alleged to have been shot and wounded by defendant, immediately after the shooting, were held admissible as res gestæ, in Collins v. Com. 24 Ky. L. Rep. 884, 70 S. W. 187; but the nature of the exclamations does not appear.

There is an apparently irreconcilable conflict among the Louisiana decisions on the point, and the cases from that state will therefore be cited chronologically.

Exclamations, tending to identify accused charged with burglary, made by a person who was in the house at the time, and immediately after an assault upon another person, were held admissible as res gestæ in State v. Horton, 33 La. Ann. 289.

And exclamations of a child who had been left to mind a store while the proprietor momentarily stepped to the rear, "You are robbed," were held admissible as res gestæ, in State v. Moore, 38 La. Ann. 66, in a prosecution for entering a store with intent to steal, and for petty larceny.

And in State v. Corcoran, 38 La. Ann. 949, the court expressly said: "Nor is it true that only the acts and declarations of the actual participants in a combat or melee can be proved as part of the res gestæ. The res gestæ may also embrace the contemporaneous acts and declarations of others present." It was specifically held in this case that it was improper to exclude a question of the witness as to what he and another did at the time and place of the affray between defendant and decedent.

But in State v. Oliver, 39 La. Ann. 470, 2 So. 194, it was expressly declared that declarations by a bystander at a homicide are not admissible as res gestæ.

And again, in State v. Riley, 42 La. Ann. 995, 8 So. 469, the court said: "While the whatever with the transaction, and, for this reason, was clearly incompetent.

No hard and fast rule can be laid down as to the admissibility of evidence as a part of the res gesta. The facts and circumstances of each case are different, and the courts have come to the point of adjudging this question as it is presented by the particular case under consideration. This is well illustrated in the numerous decisions that may be found on the subject, as is the further fact that the courts are not harmonious in their treatment of the principle upon which the admissibility of the evidence rests. In some jurisdictions a liberal practice prevails, while in others the ancient rule has not been relaxed. But, generally speaking, the rule in this state is acts and sayings of participants in the transaction at the time of the homicide form part of the res gesta, and, as such, may be proved by third persons, the comments and criticisms of mere observers cannot be so proved, but such persons must be themselves called and examined."

In State v. Desroches, 48 La. Ann. 428, 19 So. 250, however, the court held that the impulsive exclamation of a little child while a man was in the house shooting her father, and in his presence: "That is (naming defendant)" was admissible, apparently as res gesta.

The syllabus by the court in State v. Ramsey, 48 La. Ann. 1407, 20 So. 904, apparently goes back to the doctrine of State v. Riley, being to the effect that the court affirms the rule that the statements of observers not participants in the act, the subject of investigation, are not admissible as res gesta. And it is said in the opinion: "The statement in this case was that of an observer. It announced his opinion. In either view his statement was inadmissible." The declaration referred to was that "Nick Ramsey had shot Jim Moffitt, and shot him down for nothing." In another part of the opinion, however, the court expressly said that it was not required to lay down the rule with respect to declarations of parties present at the time, not participants, for the reason that the declarations sought to be given in evidence announced the declarant's opinion of the guilt of the accused, and that it was not the narration merely of the fact itself, but the expression of an opinion as to its character.

Whatever may be thought of the last case, the doctrine of State v. Riley is clearly reaffirmed in State v. Bellard, 50 La. Ann. 594, 69 Am. St. Rep. 461, 23 So. 504. The court there said: "While there are expressions in some of the text writers that seem to favor the admissibility of the statements of third persons, as constituting res gesta, when accompanying the crime under investigation, it must be conceded the general rule is against the admissibility of such statements."

that declarations which would otherwise be incompetent to be admissible as a part of the res gesta must be made by one of the actors in the affair, contemporaneous in point of time with the principal transaction under consideration, be made at or near to the place of its occurrence, and illustrate or explain how or what caused it to happen; but, if a declaration is so far removed in point of time from the main fact under investigation as to make it a mere narrative of a transaction that has happened, or if it does not illustrate or explain the principal fact, or was made at some distance from the place of its occurrence, or by a bystander or third party, the declaration is not admissible as substantive evidence or as a part of the res gesta.

cent case of State v. Howard, 120 La. 311, 45 So. 260. In this case the court said: "The question is, Is the evidence offered that of the event speaking through the participants, or that of the observers speaking about the event? In the first case what was said can be introduced without calling those who said it; in the second case they must be called." It was accordingly held that declarations of a bystander made immediately after and within 100 feet from the scene of the affray were not admissible. The court remarked that the ruling in State v. Corcoran, supra, was not, when considered in connection with the facts, in conflict with this view; but does not otherwise undertake to reconcile the two cases.

While, as above shown, there is some apparent conflict among the Arkansas and Louisiana decisions, the three jurisdictions, Arkansas, Kentucky, and Louisiana, may fairly be said to be committed to the doctrine that the declarations or exclamations of a bystander, or one not a participant or actor in the transaction to which the declarations or exclamations relate, are not admissible as res gesta. There are also intimations to the same effect in Georgia, but the decisions as a whole in that state do not seem to support the doctrine.

Thus, in excluding, in Macon & W. R. Co. v. Davis, 27 Ga. 113, declarations made by one not an actor in the occurrence, a considerable time after the occurrence, the court said that it was extending the principle a great way to allow declarations made at any point of time, by one who is not a party nor an agent of a party, and who is living, and whose evidence may be procured by reasonable diligence.

In excluding, in Marsh v. South Carolina R. Co. 56 Ga. 274, the declarations of an employee of a railroad company who was a spectator of a fatal injury to another employee, as to its cause, the court said: "He [the declarant] was a mere spectator. His conduct was not to be illustrated, but the conduct of other persons. What he said immediately afterwards could give character to nothing that happened,—could neither qualify nor explain it."

Greenl. Ev. § 107; Elliott; Ev. § 542; Floyd v. Paducah R. & Light Co. 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1077, 64 S. W. 653; McLeod v. Gintner, 80 Ky. 399; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Houchins, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 93, 101 S. W. 924; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Ellis, 97 Ky. 330, 30 S. W. 979; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Molloy, 122 Ky. 219, 91 S. W. 685; Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Evans, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 596, 110 S. W. 844; Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 119 U. S. 99, 30 L. ed. 299, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 118; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 660. Tested by this rule, we have no doubt that the statements of the motorman were competent as substantive evidence. It was coincident in time with the accident. It was made at the very place where the accident occurred, by one of the principal actors,

And in Carr v. State, 76 Ga. 593, in excluding the remark of a bystander that it was his impression that defendant was not trying to hurt the prosecutor, the court said, in effect, that what a disinterested bystander who witnesses a conflict going on between the defendant and the party assaulted may say during the heat of the engagement is not in evidence,—especially when the declarations amount to nothing more than the declarant's opinion as to the defendant's motive or purpose for engaging in and prosecuting the fight: such declarations from such a source and such a case not being part of the res gestæ. The effect of this language is considerably qualified, however, by the remark that, had the declarant been present and sworn in court, he would not have been allowed to testify to his impression, at least without stating the facts on which it was found—indicating that the declarations were excluded not so much because they proceeded from a third person as because they merely expressed his opinion.

But a remark by a bystander while a fight was going on, that he knew defendant had a knife, was held admissible as part of the res gestæ in Barrow v. State, 80 Ga. 191, 5 S. E. 64.

And declarations by the father of prosecutrix in a prosecution for assault with intent to rape, made at the time he discovered defendant and his daughter together, suggestive of voluntary intercourse, were held admissible as part of the res gestæ, in Merritt v. State, 107 Ga. 675, 34 S. E. 361.

And declarations of a child too young to testify as a witness, made immediately after a shot was heard: "Huss (referring to defendant), you have shot mamma,"—were held admissible as res gestæ, in Grant v. State, 124 Ga. 757, 53 S. E. 334.

And in Fuller v. State, 127 Ga. 47, 55 S. E. 1047, evidence was held admissible that, just after the shooting took place, a person present said to the accused that he had made a mistake and ought not to have shot the boy, to which accused replied that he had done wrong. The court does not and illustrated or explained a material point in the case by showing that the deceased was struck by the front end of the motor car, and not thrown or pushed against the side of it. The remark of the conductor was not competent, because it did not illustrate or explain how or what caused the accident; but neither was it prejudicial. It was addressed to the motorman. The admonition of the conductor that the motorman ought not to make a statement until he was called on to make one could not have influenced the jury either one way or the other. It was an idle speech that had no connection with the case and did not throw any light on any phase of it. In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Watson, 117 Ky. 374, 78 S. W. 175, the court said: "The [trial] say, however, whether the evidence was admissible as an implied admission by the accused, or as res gestæ.

Apparently some support for the doctrine of LOUISVILLE R. CO. v. JOHNSON is furnished by Morello v. People, 226 Ill. 388, 80 N. E. 903, where, in holding that what a brother of deceased said at the time he was disarmed and after deceased had been shot was not admissible as res gestæ, the court said that it did not appear that deceased and his brother were acting in concert, and that the activities of the brother seem to have been directed, not against the defendant, but against a third person.

But declarations of persons surrounding defendant at the time of the alleged assault, the nature of which does not appear, were held admissible as part of the res gestæ. Davids v. People, 192 Ill. 176, 61 N. E. 537.

And in Haines v. People, 138 Ill. App. 49, it is held that oral statements or declarations made either by defendant or by those standing by, referring to the commission of a crime, contemporaneously with or immediately before the commission of such crime and in any way connected with or explanatory thereof, are admissible as part of the res gestæ.

In Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Whitaker, 160 Ind. 125, 66 N. E. 433, it was held that a witness should not be allowed to testify that, just after plaintiff had fallen, she (witness) stated to the conductor that it would not have occurred if he had stopped the car and let her off. The court said: "Utterances and exclamations of participants, or of persons acting in concert, made immediately before or after or in the execution of an act, which go to illustrate the character and quality of the act, are usually admissible on the ground that they are a part of the res gestæ, and provable like any other fact that elucidates the issue. The rule, however, seems to be exclusive, that, to render the expression or declaration of another admissible, the party making it must have been so related to the occurrence as to make his declaration a part of it. The test seems to be that, to render the utterance or declaration of another admissible, court erred in allowing the plaintiff to prove by Fred Collins that he said to the engineer, about two minutes after the accident, 'It looks like that engine could have been stopped before that,' and that the engineer said, 'Well, damn it, that won't bring the boy back.' What Collins thought about the stopping of the engine was immaterial, and the answer of the engineer was a statement of no fact and was incompetent." If the remark made by the conductor was prejudicial, its admission over the objection of the defendant would be reversible error; but, although incompetent, the error is too trifling to justify a reversal upon this ground. In the Watson Case a reversal was had, not because the court admitted the evidence mentioned in the excerpt from the opinion, but upon the ground that the verdict was palpably excessive.

The defendant company offered to prove by a witness that, immediately after the accident, he got off the car before it stopped and went to the place where the body of deceased was lying, and heard a man who was in the crowd surrounding the body, but whom he did not know, say, not in answer to any question, but as a spontaneous exclamation, "No wonder he was hurt, the way you fellows were wrestling." The trial judge refused to admit the statement heard by this witness, and of this ruling appellant complains. In support of the proposition that this evidence was competent, our attention is called to Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Carothers, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1675, 65 S. W.

it must flow from one of the actors, or from one sustaining some relation to the transaction, and be so intimately connected with the litigated act as to be the act speaking of itself through the witness, and not the witness speaking the words of another, employed concerning the act." It is doubtful, perhaps, whether the court meant anything more than that the declarations or exclamations must be closely connected with the event, and of such a character as to be in a sense parts of the event itself, and the declarant in the same sense an actor or participant in the event.

Upon the authority of the last case, it was held in Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Taylor, 164 Ind. 155, 72 N. E. 1045, the question being whether a car which struck plaintiff was run without lights, that it was not competent for witness to testify that, immediately after the accident, he talked to the motorman, "You ran without lights; you were running dark."

But it is declared in Surber v. State, 99 Ind. 71, that what a bystander says during an occurrence and in the presence of the actors is competent as part of the res gestæ.

In Kupersmidt v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 47 Misc. 352, 94 N. Y. Supp. 17, the court, in excluding the declarations of a bystander addressed to the driver of the car, "Why don't you stop the car," the issue being whether plaintiff's injury was received immediately upon a collision between a street car and his wagon, or whether it resulted from the persistence of the motorman in pushing the wagon ahead, said that the declarant did no act which contributed to the accident, and was in no wise associated with its happening, but was a mere spectator.

There is a conflict among the Texas cases on the point, though it is clear that as a whole they are opposed to the doctrine which excludes as res gestæ the declarations or exclamations merely because they are made by one not an actor or participant.

In Felder v. State, 23 Tex. App. 477, 50 Am. Rep. 777, 5 S. W. 145, it was held that the declarations of a bystander just after a shooting, "There is the man that did the shooting," not shown to have been overheard by the defendant, were not admissible, apparently on the broad ground that the declarations of bystanders not connected with the transaction are not admissible as res gestæ.

And a similar position was taken in Holt v. State, 9 Tex. App. 571, holding that the remarks or observations of a crowd present at the commission of an offense were not admissible as res gestæ.

And in Casey v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 392, 97 S. W. 496, the court declared that declarations of bystanders are not admissible as part of the res gestæ, and accordingly excluded the declarations of a boy, the son of defendant, made within 15 feet of the place of the killing, and about one and one half minutes thereafter, and while he was greatly agitated and crying, that deceased snapped his pistol at his father twice, and that the latter then grabbed the gun away from him and shot deceased.

But in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Moore, 69 Tex. 157, 6 S. W. 631, the court said that declarations of a stranger are sometimes admissible; but they should be shown to be a part of the thing done, contemporaneous with it or so connected with it as to give it character.

And in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Coopwood (Tex. Civ. App.) 96 S. W. 102, it was held competent, in an action against the carrier for mistreatment of a passenger, to show that while the employees of defendant were carrying her to the baggage car a stranger walked up and told them not to put the lady in the baggage car, such declaration being admissible as part of the res gestæ. The court said: "This was a declaration or exclamation uttered by a bystander or person present at the time of the transaction to which it related, and calculated to throw light upon the purposes and intention of the parties to it, and was clearly admissible as a part of the res gestæ."

And in Missouri K. & P. R. Co. v. Vance (Tex. Civ. App.) 41 S. W. 167, upon the issue whether or not the train stopped before entering upon a crossing, it was held competent for one who lived near the crossing 833, 66 S. W. 385. That was an action brought by a passenger on a train to recover damages for personal injuries received in a collision, and it was said: "The fact that there were exclamations, outcries, or screams by the other passengers may be shown as part of the res gestæ; but the particulars of what they said do not seem to have been material to any issue in the case. The opinion in the Simpson Case was intended to go no further than this, and the opinion in this case is modified to this extent." In the Simpson Case (Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Simpson, 111 Ky. 754, 64 S. W. 733), which was an action to recover damages for injuries sustained in the same collision in which Carothers was injured, the court said: "It was also shown by some of the witnesses that outcries and screams were made by passengers in this coach when the collision occurred, and that in the darkness great confusion reigned. None of this was objected to by appellant, so far as the record shows. The outcries and exclamations by others than appellee were not relevant matters to go to the jury, but we cannot reverse for errors not excepted to at the time." In Louisville & C. Packet Co. v. Samuels, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 979, 59 S. W. 3, also cited by counsel for appellant, which was an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by the breaking of a plank, the plaintiff was permitted to prove that, just before the plank broke, some one holloed, "Look out, that plank is cracked." In commenting on this evidence, the court held it to be incompe-and in sight thereof, and who testified that the train did not stop, to state that when he saw it approaching the crossing without stopping, and before the collision, he remarked to his wife that the train had entered upon the crossing without stopping, and that there would be a collision there some day; as the statement is admissible as res gestæ.

Other Texas cases, some admitting and some excluding exclamations or declarations of third persons, are subsequently cited.

In State v. Robinson, 12 Wash. 491, 41 Pac. 884, the majority, though expressing some doubt upon the point, held that it was competent for witnesses, in connection with their testimony as to conditions surrounding the place of the homicide, to state what was said as to such surroundings by persons who were present at the time of the examination; or at least that there was no prejudicial error in admitting such testimony.

And the same court, in Dixon v. Northern P. R. Co. 37 Wash. 310, 68 L.R.A. 895, 107 Am. St. Rep. 810, 79 Pac. 943, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 620, held that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding statements made to a witness by a stranger at the time and place of an accident as to the manner of its occurrence, there being nothing to show that the stranger, who could not be found at the time of the trial, was in any way connected with the accident, or prompted by any circumstances to speak the truth in regard to it.

And in Sullivan v. Seattle Electric Co. (Wash.) 97 Pac. 1109, the court, in excluding declarations of a bystander upon the ground that they were mere matters of opinion, expressly refrained from deciding whether exclamations of a mere bystander, in no way connected with the principal transaction, are ever admissible as res gestæ.

Most of the cases that have held the declarations or exclamations of one not an actor or participant admissible as res gestæ have apparently assumed, without discussing the point, that the mere fact that they proceed from one not a participant or actor, is not in itself a sufficient reason for excluding them as res gestæ. These cases will be subsequently cited. In the meantime, however, attention is called to a number of cases which have expressly declared that the exclamations and declarations of bystanders, not otherwise actors or participants in the transactions; may, if otherwise proper, be admissible as res gestæ.

Thus, the Missouri supreme court, in State v. Walker, 78 Mo. 386, expressly declares that exclamations made at the time of the occurrence or immediately thereafter, and immediately and naturally connected therewith, form part of the res gestæ whether such exclamations proceed from one of the participants to the transaction or from a bystander. In this case the exclamations of a bystander, directed to defendant in a prosecution for homicide, "Don't strike him (deceased) for you have shot him now," were held admissible as res gestæ. The same principle is expressly declared in State v. Gabriel, 88 Mo. 631.

And in State v. Elkins, 101 Mo. 344, 14 S. W. 116, the court, while excluding declarations because the declarant was not present at the time of the shooting, incidentally said that remarks of bystanders may be admissible as res gestæ.

So, exclamations of third persons present are as much a part of the res gestæ as those of the parties themselves. State v. McCourry, 128 N. C. 594, 38 S. E. 883 (admitting declarations in the immediate presence of accused at the very time of the fatal blow, charging him with having given it); Seawell v. Carolina C. R. Co. 133 N. C. 515, 45 S. E. 850 (admitting testimony of witness that, just after an assault upon plaintiff at a railroad station, he told plaintiff that he saw one of the defendant's employees throw an egg at him).

In Coll v. Easton Transit Co. 180 Pa. 618, 37 Atl. 89, holding that declarations made by a lineman in the employment of defendant who was riding upon the front platform of a car and jumped off and ran ahead before the deceased was struck, that he had run ahead to pull the deceased off the track and did not have time to do it, were admissible, they having been made immediately tent, although its admission under the circumstances was not a reversible error. With the exception of the rather misleading statement in the Carothers Case, we know of no Kentucky case holding that the exclamations of bystanders are admissible. In Stroud v. Com. 14 Ky. L. Rep. 179, 19 S. W. 976, the court, in considering a question like this, said: "Whatever is said by a party to the occurrence or a coadjutor, in cases of homicide, is competent to show the character or quality of the act; but the statement of a bystander, who is in no way acting in concert with the parties to the transaction, does not constitute a part of the res gestæ." In Bradshaw v. Com. 10 Bush, 576, the court, in holding evidence of this character incompetent, said: "It is clearly hearsay, and does not fall within any of the exceptions to the general rule that hearsay evidence is incompetent to establish any specific fact which in its nature is susceptible of being proved by witnesses who can speak from their own knowledge. . . . The cries or exclamations allowed to be proved did not proceed from either one of the parties engaged in the transaction, nor from anyone acting in concert with either of them. They do not constitute part of the res gestæ." To the same effect is Kaelin v. Com. 84 Ky. 354, 1 S. W. 594.

In our opinion, it would be a dangerous enlargement of the res gestæ rule to permit the declarations of bystanders in cases like this to be received as evidence. It would open wide the door for the admission of

after the accident and before the body of deceased had been removed from the track, the court said that it was not necessary that the declarant should have been in the employment of defendant for the purpose of running its cars, or for any purpose, in order to make the declarations admissible as part of the res gestæ, and, in this connection, quoted from Wharton on Evidence, 2d ed. § 259, to the effect that res gestæ "may consist of speeches of anyone concerned, whether participant or bystander; . . . their sole distinguishing feature is that they should be necessary incidents of the litigated act."

So, sudden exclamations and outbursts of bystanders, as well as of participants, are parts of the res gestæ, and as such may be properly brought forward in evidence whenever an occurrence producing them is undergoing judicial investigation. O'Rourke v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 103 Tenn. 124, 46 L.R.A. 614, 76 Am. St. Rep. 639, 52 S. W. 872, admitting cries of children offered to corroborate testimony of a passenger's violent expulsion from a car.

While, as already stated, and as subsequently shown in detail, there are many cases excluding exclamations or declarations of one not an actor or participant as res gestæ, which lend no support to the general doctrine that declarations or exclamations, to be admissible as res gestæ, must proceed from an actor or participant, it, of course, is true that all the cases which have held that declarations or exclamations of the class that fall within the scope of this note were admissible, although made or uttered by one not otherwise a participant or actor in the transaction, are opposed to that doctrine. In addition to the cases already cited to the same effect, declarations or exclamations, though proceeding from one not an actor or participant, were held admissible in the following cases, under the circumstances indicated, the list of cases being by no means exhaustive:

Upon an issue whether insured committed suicide, declaration of a person, since deceased, made while coming out of the room where deceased was found, to the effect that a man had shot himself. Newton v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 2 Dill. 154, Fed. Cas. No. 10,191, reversed in 22 Wall. 32, 22 L. ed. 793, on another ground.

Exclamation of a bystander, after defendant had shot deceased and the rest of the crowd had run off a few steps, "Come back, it was an accident." Young v. State. 149 Ala. 16, 43 So. 100.

Declarations of the mother of the plaintiff (an infant), within thirty or sixty seconds after the accident, that it was all her fault. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Crosby. 53 Fla. 400, 43 So. 318. (The mother may, however, have been regarded as an actor or participant.)

Declarations of woman found with deceased and defendant immediately after she had cried out to the witness to come out that defendant had knocked deceased in the head. The declarations were held admissible both as an implied admission by defendant and as res gestæ. McUin v. United States. 17 App. D. C. 323.

Exclamations addressed to defendant by his mother, immediately after the occurrence, "Now see what you have done." People v. McArron. 121 Mich. 1, 79 N. W. 944.

A remark made by defendant's wife in his presence shortly after his affray with deceased: "Joe, don't let George go at the old man any more." People v. Hossler. 135 Mich. 384, 97 N. W. 754.

Acts and outcries of other passengers and bystanders at the time a passenger jumped from a street car in apprehension of a collision with a train, not only to show reasonable apprehension of danger, but also as descriptive of the occurrence and as part of res gestæ. Kleiber v. People's R. Co. 107 Mo. 240, 14 L.R.A. 613, 17 S. W. 946.

Declarations of third persons, made at the time they heard a revolver fired, although they were in the house at some distance from the occurrence. State v. Sexton. 147 Mo. 89, 48 S. W. 452.

The remark of the proprietor of the saloon in which the homicide occurred, to an officer, at the same time pointing out defendant, "There is the man that did it."

reckless or thoughtless or ill-considered exclamations, and at the same time would put it out of the power of the party whose interest they adversely affected to investigate, impeach, contradict, or explain the situation, temperament, character, or position of the declarant. To permit a person to testify that he heard a bystander state how or what caused an accident would sanction the admissibility of hearsay evidence of the most unreliable and unsatisfactory character. The declarations of agents and servants of a corporation, for whose acts the principal is responsible, when brought within the res gestæ rule, are permitted to be introduced for the purpose of fixing liability upon the principal, and upon these statements, if they are sufficient to sustain a verdict, the jury may rest their finding. And so the declarations of a party injured, if brought within this rule, are competent in his behalf; but to these actors in the occurrence the admissibility of evidence as a part of the res gestæ should, except in rare cases, be limited. The bystander in this case, who made the remark attempted to be introduced as evidence, was not a party to the transaction. He had no connection with it. The declaration was merely an expression of opinion on the part of the declarant. It did not describe anything he saw or did. If he had been introduced as a witness, it would not have been competent to have permitted him to make the statements attributed to him, and its inherent incompetency would have been aggravated by permitting another person to

State v. Duncan, 116 Mo. 288, 22 S. W. 689.

Exclamations by a bystander while assailants were yet in sight and just leaving their victim. "Hurry up; they have about killed this man." State v. Kaiser, 124 Mo. 651, 28 S. W. 182.

Exclamations of persons with deceased just before the shooting, "There he (referring to defendant) comes with a gun." State v. Biggerstaff, 17 Mont. 510, 43 Pac. 709.

Remarks by bystanders at the time of an affray. Castner v. Sliker, 33 N. J. L. 97.

Upon the question of negligence of an engineer killed in an attempt to run his engine over a trestle at the time of a flood, exclamations of a bystander just before the trestle gave way. "Jake is safe." Harrill v. South Carolina & G. Extension R. Co. 132 N. C. 655, 44 S. E. 109.

A statement addressed to deceased by a bystander just after defendant, following some words with deceased, had passed around to the other side of a wagon, and immediately before he returned and shot deceased. "You had better keep your eyes open. That man is going to hurt you." Baysinger v. Territory, 15 Okla. 386, 82 Pac. 728.

In action for injury to passenger struck by a car, held competent for a bystander to testify that he "hollered" when he saw the imminence of the danger, and his reasons therefor. Oliver v. Columbia, L. & N. R. Co. 65 S. C. 1, 43 S. E. 307.

Upon issue as to speed of train just before it was derailed, exclamations of fellow passengers as to short period consumed in passing between two points. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Collier, 62 Tex. 320.

Statements of persons present at the time of an accident, to an employee, as to the defective condition of an appliance which he was using. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Schuler (Tex. Civ. App.) 102 S. W. 783.

Upon issue as to insulting conduct of negro employee of carrier to female passenger while in a station, the exclamation of her small children, "Mamma, let's get out 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of here." Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Luther, 40 Tex. Civ. App. 517, 90 S. W. 44.

Exclamations of conductor a few seconds after an accident in which a brakeman was killed, to another brakeman, "My God! Go back and see if you can find Leach. The bridge knocked him off." (The conductor, may, however, have been regarded as an actor or participant in the transaction, in view of the fact that he had ordered the injured brakeman to go on top of the car.) Leach v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 29 Utah, 285, 110 Am. St. Rep. 708, 81 Pac. 90.

The act of an eyewitness in pointing out to another the exact place of an accident, a few minutes after it occurred. Reed v. Madison, 85 Wis. 667, 56 N. W. 182.

An exclamation by one who, so far as appears, was not an actor or participant, "The hook hit him," when a boy fell through the hatch of a vessel. Johnson v. St. Paul & W. Coal Co. 126 Wis. 492, 105 N. W. 1048.

It will be noted that the cases next cited, while excluding declarations or exclamations of third persons under the particular circumstances, either admit, or expressly refrain from denying, that declarations or exclamations may be admissible as res gestæ under some circumstances though they proceed from one not an actor or participant.

Thus, Benjamin v. State, 148 Ala. 671, 41 So. 739, while conceding that acts and declarations of third persons are often admissible, held that cries of "Murder, murder," by persons who pursued defendant after an affray were not admissible as res gestæ.

So, in Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Moore, 148 Ala. 63, 41 So. 984, the court, while remarking that there were authorities holding that, under some circumstances, exclamations of bystanders are admissible as res gestæ, said that requests made by passengers to a conductor to remove another passenger did not come within the rule.

So, Ganaway v. Salt Lake Dramatic Assn. 17 Utah, 37, 53 Pac. 830, while holding that the exclamation of a disinterested onlooker amounting to no more than a mere opinion upon the very question to be decided was incompetent, cited Wharton on Evidence, § 200, to the effect that ex-repeat it. Third parties are permitted to testify concerning what they saw, or what they did; but their declarations are not admissible. Although there is authority from other courts holding a contrary view, the cases in which declarations of bystanders have been admitted will generally be found to be actions against common carriers by passengers to recover damages for injuries received in jumping off of cars in anticipation of a collision or other imminent peril. In this class of cases the outcries and exclamations of other persons are properly admitted to show the danger that confronted the passengers, and that they acted with reasonable prudence in escaping. Kleiber v. People's R. Co. 107 Mo. 240, 14 L.R.A. 613, 17 S. W. 946; Twomley v. Central Park, N. & E. River R. Co. 69 N. Y. 158, 25 Am. Rep. 163; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Murray, 55 Ark. 248, 16 L.R.A. 787, 29 Am. St. Rep. 32, 18 S. W. 50; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 684; Senn v. Southern R. Co. 108 Mo. 142, 18 S. W. 1007; Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Ashcraft, 48 Ala. 15; Indianapolis Street

R. Co. v. Whitaker, 160 Ind. 125, 66 N. E. 433. But, whatever may be the practice in other jurisdictions, we are satisfied with the soundness of the rule laid down by this court excluding the declarations or statements of bystanders, and are not disposed to depart from it in cases similar to the one under consideration.

The next complaint is that the court erred in saying to the jury, as a part of instruction No. 1, that it was the duty of the motorman "to keep a lookout ahead for persons on the track, or so near thereto as to be in danger of being injured by the car." There is no merit in this criticism. It is the duty of a motorman, from the time and immediately before the car starts, until it comes to a stop, to be constantly on the lookout for persons and vehicles on the track, or so near thereto as to be in danger of being injured by the car; and this duty has been repeatedly declared by this court.

There was sufficient evidence to support the verdict, and the judgment is affirmed.

clamations of bystanders, if instinctive, are admissible as res gestæ.

In Kehan v. Washington R. & Electric Co. 28 App. D. C. 108, the majority of the court, while stating that they were not prepared to say that there may not be instances in which immediate exclamations by bystanders, or remarks addressed to an actor in the occurrence, are admissible as part of the res gestæ, held that, upon the question whether a car had stopped before the plaintiff had attempted to alight, the statements of her brother at the time she was being picked up, to the effect that the car had not stopped, were not involuntary exclamations made during the occurrence, but were mere expressions of opinion relating to a past occurrence, and so not admissible as res gestæ. McComas, J., was of the opinion that the statements were admissible as part of the res gestæ whether the plaintiff's brother be regarded as an actor or merely a bystander. The majority opinion emphasizes the fact that he was not a party to the actual occurrence.

So, while the declarations or exclamations which were held in the following cases not to be admissible as res gestæ were in fact made by persons who were not actors or participants, their exclusion does not appear to rest upon that ground, but upon other grounds, which in some instances are expressly indicated and in others may be inferred from the nature of the declarations or the circumstances under which they were uttered. (The list of cases does not purport to be exhaustive.)

In an action for death of a person struck by a train, remarks by person who saw the train on the morning in question, about its running fast, it not being shown that the remarks were made contemporaneously with the passing of the train. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Ashcraft, 48 Ala. 15; Indianapolis Street

Co. v. Gesswine, 75 C. C. A. 214, 144 Fed. 56.

Statement, by a bystander to the captain immediately after the drowning of a member of the crew, intimating his opinion that the failure to save the man was due to the fault or negligence of the crew. Puget Sound Nav. Co. v. Lavender, 160 Fed. 851. (Not admissible.)

Remark of wife of decedent, addressed to her husband some time after he was shot, to the effect that he said he would kill defendant. Dean v. State, 105 Ala. 21, 17 So. 28.

Statement of "transfer agent" from two to five minutes after an accident that "he (the conductor) would get in trouble," and "that he started without my authority." Metropolitan R. Co. v. Collins, 1 App. D. C. 383.

Declarations of a bystander who witnessed an accident to a boy who jumped from a street car while in motion, made to the conductor about one minute after the accident and while the boy was being carried to the sidewalk. The reason assigned was that the declarations were in the nature of history, and were not a part of the incident itself. Chicago City R. Co. v. White, 110 Ill. App. 23.

Declarations of driver of vehicle in which plaintiff was riding at the time of collision with a street car,—not shown to have been made at or immediately after the accident. Edwards v. Foote, 129 Mich. 121, 88 N. W. 404.

Statement by defendant's wife after the arrival of the police on the scene, that the victim of the homicide had a knife in his hand which she had seen during the transaction. The decision was on the ground that the statement was the narration of a past transaction. State v. Gallehugh, 89 Minn. 212, 94 N. W. 723.

Exclamation of a child just after the affray and while deceased was lying where he had fallen, "Mr. Long (deceased) had a knife in his hand." State v. Brown, 64 Mo. 367.

Cries of "murder" by a woman upon seeing a crowd gathering around a street car after it had struck a boy. Lenhey v. Cass Ave. & F. G. R. Co. 97 Mo. 165, 10 Am. St. Rep. 300, 10 S. W. 58.

Remarks by miner three quarters of an hour after injury to another miner by the falling of the roof of the mine, abusing the pit boss and charging him with failure to provide props. Wojtylak v. Kansas & T. Coal Co. 188 Mo. 260, 87 S. W. 506.

Conversation by bystanders after an accident at a railroad crossing about the absence of a flagman, and declarations by one of them "that he did not attend to his business good." So far as appears the declarant in this case did not witness the accident and that was perhaps the ground for the exclusion. Felska v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 152 N. Y. 339, 46 N. E. 613.

Remark of bystander after plaintiff had been helped out of the basement of defendant's building, addressed to the defendant's employee: "That is a very careless way to leave that (referring to the trapdoor), young fellow." The decision was apparently upon the ground that the remark was not made until after the accident, and was merely an expression of opinion. Kirkpatrick v. Briggs, 78 Hun. 518, 29 N. Y. Supp. 532.

Statements of unknown man to conductor before latter ejected plaintiff, that he had no right to eject him, and that he (declarant) saw plaintiff get off one car and take the next car that passed. The court said that the statement was not that of a third person characterizing an act occurring at the time, but a mere statement of an alleged past fact. Woods v. Buffalo R. Co. 35 App. Div. 203, 54 N. Y. Supp. 735.

Exclamations of one sitting at a window at the time of an accident in which a street car passenger was fatally injured, "Oh! I have seen a woman thrown from a car." Ehrhard v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 69 App. Div. 124, 74 N. Y. Supp. 551.

Statements as to origin of fire, made fifteen or twenty minutes after it started, by persons unknown to witness. Lyman v. Southern R. Co. 132 N. C. 721, 44 S. E. 550.

Declarations of person driving the vehicle in which the injured person was riding at the time it was struck by a railroad train. The decision seems to be upon the ground that the declarations were not intimately enough connected with the accident. Gosa v. Southern R. Co. 67 S. C. 347, 45 S. E. 810.

Declarations of the companion of one fatally injured while attempting to board a moving train, that no one was to blame but themselves. The decision was on the ground that the declarations were not shown to have been so intimately connected with the transaction as to be part of the res gestæ if otherwise admissible for that purpose. Galveston H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Le Gierse, 51 Tex. 189.

Upon an issue whether insured caused his property to be set on fire, declarations by bystanders at the time of the fire about arresting all of the insured's clerks for complicity in the fire. The court said that the declarants were not shown to have been so connected with the transaction or with the persons whose interests were affected as to make them admissible as res gestæ. Dwyer v. Continental Ins. Co. 63 Tex. 354.

Declarations of bystanders at a fire as to the origin of the fire. Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Bellar (Tex. Civ. App.) 112 S. W. 323.

Statements made an hour or two after railroad collision by railroad men and others, as to cause of accident,—too remote. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Ivy, 71 Tex. 409, 1 L.R.A. 500, 10 Am. St. Rep. 758, 9 S. W. 346.

Remark of a passenger to a companion at the time of the alleged misconduct of the conductor toward another passenger, to the effect that his conduct was uncalled for and rude. Eddy v. Lowry (Tex. Civ. App.) 24 S. W. 1076.

Declarations by bystanders at the time of and subsequent to homicide, as to the sanity of defendant. Carlisle v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 56 S. W. 365.

Remarks of bystanders, not heard by participants in a difficulty. Baker v. State, 45 Tex. Crim. Rep. 392, 77 S. W. 618.

Remark of bystander to the effect that defendant shot deceased. Ex parte Kennedy (Tex. Crim. App.) 57 S. W. 648.

Cry of cab driver, "There he goes," referring to the defendant, when an officer went to make the arrest. Evers v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 318, 18 L.R.A. 421, 37 Am. St. Rep. 811, 20 S. W. 744.

Upon the question whether car was moving when plaintiff attempted to board it, or started just as she put her foot on the step, conversation between stranger and motorman. The decision was apparently on the ground that there was too long a delay between the incident and the declarations. Blue Ridge Light & P. Co. v. Price, 108 Va. 652, 62 S. E. 938.

The decisions in the cases just cited, having been rendered upon grounds other than that the declarant was a nonactor or non-participant, if they bear either way, must be regarded as opposing rather than supporting the doctrine of LOUISVILLE R. CO. v. JOHNSON.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

T. M. SMALL et al., Appts.,
v.

COUNCILMEN OF EDENTON.

(146 N. C. 527, 60 S. E. 413.)

Municipal ordinance — reasonableness — removal of awnings.

1. A municipal ordinance requiring the removal of stationary awnings from over its sidewalks is reasonable.

Trial—reasonableness of ordinance—court.

2. The court, and not the jury, must determine the question of the reasonableness of a municipal ordinance requiring the removal of stationary awnings from over the sidewalks where the question of the good faith of the municipal authorities is not involved.

Highway—awning—removal—owner.

3. The power of a municipal corporation to remove stationary awnings from over its sidewalks is not dependent upon their being found to be nuisances, but upon the power of the municipality to make such a requirement under its authority over its streets, and upon the reasonableness of the requirement.

(February 19, 1908.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Chowan County in defendant's favor in a suit to enjoin the removal, under a municipal ordinance, of a certain stationary awning extending over the sidewalk. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. S. Vann, Aydlett & Ehringhaus, and W. M. Bond for appellants.

Messrs. Pruden & Pruden and Shepherd & Shepherd for appellee.

Case Note.—Puicer of municipal corporation to compel removal of awnings or signs encroaching on streets.

As shown by the cases cited in the notes to Augusta v. Burum, 26 L.R.A. 340, and Hagerstown v. Witmer, 39 L.R.A. 667, the power of a municipal corporation to require the removal of awnings which encroach upon a street or sidewalk is generally sustained, except in Missouri, where it is held that it is necessary, in order to justify the removal of an awning, to show that it is a nuisance per se.

It was held in Augusta v. Burum, 93 Ga. 68, 26 L.R.A. 340, 19 S. E. 320, that a municipal corporation possesses power to require the removal of wooden awnings maintained over the city streets.

But it was further held that an awning erected under an express or implied license from the municipality could not be removed until such time as the licensee had realized in the way of use and enjoyment a fair return from his outlay in the construction thereof. Ibid.

But the municipality may require the removal of a wooden awning erected under such a license after its use has been enjoyed from nine to twenty years. Ibid.

In Hilbard v. Chicago, 173 Ill. 91, 40 L.R.A. 621, 50 N. E. 256, affirming 59 Ill. App. 470, the power of a municipality to require the removal of an awning was upheld notwithstanding it was erected with Clark, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The councilmen of the town of Edenton, after full notice and full public discussion, and after hearing petitions for and against it, adopted the following ordinance: "All stationary awnings (that is, awnings with posts resting on the sidewalks) in the town of Edenton be removed by February 1, 1907. Any person, firm, or corporation owning such awning who fails to comply with said ordinance shall be fined $50, and the constable of Edenton shall remove such awning." The plaintiffs were a firm who had a stationary awning in front of their store extending over the sidewalk. This is an action seeking a perpetual injunction against the town to restrain it from removing plaintiffs' awning under the authority of said ordinance.

It was contended here that the posts upon which the awning rested were placed beyond the edge of the sidewalk; but the testimony of Mr. Bond, one of the plaintiffs, was that the sidewalk was 15 or 16 feet wide, and that the posts were set in the ground 14 feet from the wall of the plaintiffs' store, and it is admitted in the record by plaintiffs that Mr. Bond's testimony on this matter is correct. The plaintiffs asked no instructions based on a contrary state of facts. Besides, it would not be a material circumstance, for the ordinance is clearly the permission of the municipality at an expense of $3,000, such license being revocable at any time.

An ordinance declaring a swinging sign or stationary awning across the whole or any portion of a sidewalk within designated limits of a city to be a nuisance is not open to the objection of being unreasonable, special in its character, and discriminatory in its effect, because limited to a portion only of a city, such restriction being necessary for the public convenience in a crowded city. Ivins v. Trenton, 68 N. J. L. 501, 53 Atl. 202, affirmed without opinion in 69 N. J. L. 451, 55 Atl. 1132.

Such ordinance is justified under authority to prevent or regulate the erection of any signpost or projection in, over, or upon any street, and to remove the same when already erected. Ibid.

And in Sands v. Trenton (N. J. L.) 57 Atl. 267, a writ of certiorari to review such ordinance was refused the owner of a swinging sign projecting over a sidewalk, upon authority of Ivins v. Trenton, supra.

It was held in Brown v. Carrollton, 122 Mo. App. 276, 99 S. W. 37, that power "to prevent and remove nuisances," being applicable only to such as were nuisances per se at common law, would not justify a municipality in requiring the removal of a wooden awning supported by posts resting upon the sidewalk or curb, as an awning is not a nuisance per se unless so con-intended to require the removal of "stationary awnings" extending over the sidewalk, because of their obstruction in putting out fires, and the often dilapidated condition and unsightliness of many of them, and for other reasons; and whether the posts were placed just inside or just outside the edge of the sidewalk does not affect the scope and purpose of the ordinance or its application. The ordinance was within the powers of the governing board of the town, and was properly held by his Honor to be reasonable. If it does not meet the approval of the citizens of the town, they can secure its repeal by instructing their town council to that effect, or by electing a new board. Such local matters are properly left to the people of a self-governing community to be decided and determined by them for themselves, and not by a judge or court for them. The true rule is well stated by Burwell, J., in Tate v. Greensboro, 114 N. C. 399, 24 L.R.A. 671, 19 S. E. 768: "It is not for a court and jury to review the conduct of the proper municipal authorities in such a matter as that now under consideration. In Barnes v. District of Columbia, 91 U. S. 540, 23 L. ed. 440, it is said: 'The authorities state, and our own knowledge is to the effect, that the care and superintendence of streets, alleys, and highways, the regulation of grades, and the opening of new, and the closing of old, streets, are peculiarly municipal duties. No other power can so wisely and judiciously control this subject as the authority of the immediate locality where the work is to be done.' The wisdom of this rule is well illustrated by this action. Complaints were made, it seems, by citizens, that these trees were injurious to the public way, and in their effects, perhaps, to the public health. The proper authorities of the city, clothed with the power to repair the streets and protect the public health, listened to these complaints, and in the exercise of their best judgment, so far as appears, decided that the interest of the community required their removal. The proposition of the plaintiff is that a jury shall judge of the correctness of this conclusion, and, if they find that the officials committed what they think was an error, they and the city shall be mulct in damages. 'The maintenance of such an action would transfer to court and jury the discretion which the law vests in the municipality, but transfer them, not to be exercised directly and finally, but indirectly and partially by the retroactive effect of punitive verdicts upon special complaints.'" Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 255. Suppose another owner on this street with similar awnings were to bring suit, and it was left to a jury; the jury in each case might decide differently, and here would indeed be structed or maintained as to interfere with the public easement, or become a menace to the public safety; and even then it cannot be summarily abated.

A municipal ordinance preventing the placing of show boards and signs upon sidewalks so as to obstruct them was upheld in Com. v. McCafferty, 145 Mass. 384, 14 N. E. 451, under authority conferred upon a municipality to make necessary orders and by-laws for the direction and management of their prudential affairs, preserving peace and good order and maintaining the internal police thereof, as may be judged most conducive to the welfare of the town, as the tendency of displaying such signs may be to collect crowds, and interfere with the public use of sidewalks, and lead to disaster.

An ordinance declaring it a misdemeanor to erect or thereafter to maintain any sign, sign box, illuminated sign, lettered lamp, or other fixture extending over or upon any sidewalk for more than 18 inches from the building line or inside of a sidewalk is reasonable and valid upon its face; as it is for a municipality to determine what the interests of the public are in a crowded city. St. Louis v. St. Louis Theatre Co. 202 Mo. 620, 100 S. W. 627.

Such ordinance is not rendered unreasonable by reason of the fact that such illuminated sign lighted the entrance of one's place of business. Ibid.

No vested right which cannot be destroyed by the subsequent passage of such an ordinance, to maintain illuminated signs over a sidewalk, is acquired by reason of the fact that it was erected at a considerable expense. Ibid.

A billboard erected without municipal permission, at the side of a street, and encroaching thereon 4½ inches, is a nuisance under an ordinance declaring that every obstruction of any street, alley, or walk, except by authority of an ordinance or permission granted by the municipality, shall be deemed a common nuisance. Wilkes-Barre v. Burgher, 7 Kulp, 63.

But in State v. Higgs, 126 N. C. 1014, 48 L.R.A. 446, 35 S. E. 473, it was held that an ordinance making it a penal offense to maintain a sign suspended or projecting over a sidewalk was not justified by charter power to open streets and keep streets and sidewalks free and clear from obstructions.

And such ordinance was held to be unreasonable, oppressive, and void as applied to a sign which does not impede, delay, obstruct, or in any way endanger the use of the sidewalk. Ibid.

The power of a municipal corporation to abate as a nuisance a sign board attached to a shed erected over a sidewalk, in order to protect pedestrians during the demolition of a building, is recognized in C. J. Sullivan Advertising Co. v. New York, 61 Misc. 425, 113 N. Y. Supp. 893.

an anomaly in government. Revisal 1905, § 2930, provides that the town council "shall provide for keeping in proper repair the streets and bridges in the town, in the manner and to the extent they may deem best." The reasonableness of an ordinance is for the court; the jury only being called in to find the facts, when in dispute. Abbott, Mun. Corp. § 545; Smith, Mun. Corp. § 1133.

Upon the whole testimony in this case, the court properly instructed the jury that this ordinance was reasonable. As there was not the slightest evidence of malice or bad faith, the reasonableness of the ordinance was purely a matter for the court. The town authorities are vested with large discretionary powers, and especially in respect to streets; and, if every ordinance were subject for approval upon the verdict of juries, it would be impossible to regulate the streets and sidewalks so as to secure uniformity, convenience, protection from fire, proportion and sightliness, and other necessary things incident to the growth and development of modern municipalities. These views are distinctly declared in Tate v. Greensboro, 114 N. C. 399, 24 L.R.A. 671, 19 S. E. 767, which case is really decisive of this. That authority has often been cited, and we adhere to it. State v. Higgs, 126 N. C. 1026, 48 L.R.A. 446, 35 S. E. 473, relied on by plaintiffs, is in conflict with it, and is overruled. The latter case was based, as this is, upon the assumption that the removal of the sign projecting into the street was dependent on it being a nuisance. If so, the conclusion would have followed that the issue of nuisance should have been found by the jury. But the real question was as to the power of the city authorities to pass such ordinance and its reasonableness. These were matters for the court, and, under Tate v. Greensboro, the authorities of the town were within their right. The only fact was whether the defendant had violated the ordinance, which was not disputed.

No error.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

PIERCE M. GREGG et al., Apts.,

v.

GEORGE H. MITCHELL et al.

(— C. C. A. —, 166 Fed. 725.)

Bankruptcy — dairymen.

A farmer is not taken out of the class engaged principally in farming, which cannot, under the provisions of the bankruptcy act, be subjected to involuntary bankruptcy proceedings, by the fact that he maintains cows from the produce of his farm and that bought elsewhere, and sells the milk at retail, although he also purchases and distributes milk of other producers.

(January 20, 1909.)

A PPEAL by defendants from an order of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio, Eastern Division, adjudging defendant Henry C. Wilson a bankrupt. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Lurton and Severens. Circuit Judges, and Knappen, District Judge.

Messrs. Murray & Emery and Booth, Keating, & Peters, for appellants:

Defendant was a person chiefly engaged in farming, within the meaning of the bankruptcy act.

Bank of Dearborn v. Matney, 132 Fed. 75; Hoffschlaeger v. Youngnap, 12 Am. Bankr.

Case Note. — Engaging in other business as affecting exemption of farmer from involuntary proceedings in bankruptcy.

The question being almost wholly one of fact, it is not practicable to define with precision the facts which will in all cases determine whether one is engaged chiefly in farming, and each case must be decided on its own circumstances. Re Mackey, 110 Fed. 355.

The generally accepted test, however, is. Which business is of paramount importance to the defendant, and on which he chiefly relies for his livelihood or as the means of acquiring wealth?

In Wulbern v. Drake, 56 C. C. A. 643, 120 Fed. 493, it is said: "It does not matter . . . if the person may have other business or other interests, if his principal occupation is that of an agriculturalist, if that is the business to which he devotes more largely his time and attention, which he relies upon as a source of income for the support of himself and family, or for the accumulation of wealth, although, as before suggested, he may have other interests or other investments, yet the conclusion must be that his chief business is that of farming or tillage of the soil."

The question is also discussed in Re Mackey, supra, as follows: "A person engaged chiefly in farming is one whose chief occupation or business is farming. The chief occupation or business of one, so far as worldly pursuits are concerned, is that which is of principal concern to him, of some permanency in its nature, and on which he chiefly relies for his livelihood or as the means of acquiring wealth, great or small. That one may principally devote his physical exertions or his time to a given pursuit, while one of the factors entitled to consideration, is not in all cases determinative of the question whether that pursuit is his chief occupation or business. One may own,

Mr. J. H. Dyer for appellees.

Severens, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

On March 12, 1907, certain creditors of Henry C. Wilson filed a petition in the district court, praying that he be adjudged a bankrupt upon the allegations contained in reside on, and operate a farm, and at the same time be engaged in the business of buying and selling stocks and other securities. The latter occupation may consume only an hour or two and the balance of the day be devoted by him to his farm, yet it does not follow that his chief occupation or business is not dealing in stocks or other securities. If such dealing is of principal concern to him and chiefly relied on by him for his subsistence and financial advancement, and if he treats it as of paramount importance to his welfare, he would not be within the category of persons chiefly engaged in farming, even were his farm to yield him some profit. Nor does the amount of capital invested necessarily determine in all cases what one's chief occupation or business is. It, like the amount of time devoted, is undoubtedly a factor to be considered, but often is not conclusive. One may erect a palatial residence in the country, and own the farm on which it stands. It becomes part of the farm, and the farm may be skillfully operated and yet not yield in profits a hundredth part of the interest on the investment. The owner may be engaged in profitable manufacturing or mercantile pursuits which enable him to pay in full the cost of his house, and thereafter maintain it from the profits on his business capital, though less than such cost. No one would in such case contend that the owner of the farm was chiefly engaged in farming because most of his capital was invested in it. It is evident that it is impracticable, if not impossible, to define with precision the facts which will in all cases determine whether one is engaged chiefly in farming, and that each case must be decided on its own circumstances. It may, however, legitimately be stated, generally, that, if it appears in a given case that one's occupation or business which is of principal concern to him, not ephemeral, but of some degree of permanency, and on which he mainly relies for his livelihood and financial welfare, be other than farming, he is not 'a person engaged chiefly in farming.'

One who had been engaged in farming 830 acres of land, of which 330 were under plough and devoted to the production of corn, wheat, and other small grains, the re-said petition, among which was one averring that he was "by occupation a trader, grain and feed merchant, and dairyman," "and is neither a wage-earner nor a person engaged principally in farming or the tillage of the soil." In his answer Wilson denied this allegation, and said that "he avers the truth to be that he is a person engaged chiefly in farming and the tillage of the soil, and has been so engaged for many years next preceding the time of filing the petition herein, and that he should not be declared a bankrupt for any cause in said petition alleged." But he was nevertheless adjudged bankrupt upon the proof produced before the referee and a review thereof of the district judge, mainder being used for hay and pasture lands, upon which farms he had 250 head of cattle which he was fattening for sale upon the market by feeding to them the grass, hay, and corn produced upon the farm, buying from others whatever was needed over and above that produced by himself, was held to be engaged chiefly in the business of farming. Re Thompson, 102 Fed. 287.

One who managed and controlled plantations containing over 1,100 acres, part of which was cultivated by hired labor and the remainder by tenants, residing on the farm and superintending all the farming operations, as well those of the croppers and tenants as those conducted by himself, and attending personally to gathering and selling the crops, and whose principal income was derived from his farming operations, was "engaged chiefly in farming," although he maintained a supply store, almost all of the patronage of which was from his tenants and employees, no trade being solicited outside of those on his farms, although he sold goods to such persons as applied. Wulbern v. Drake, 56 C. C. A. 643, 120 Fed. 493, affirming Re Drake, 114 Fed. 229.

The finding of a referee that one was chiefly engaged in farming, notwithstanding he was also a private banker, was sustained in Couts v. Townsend, 126 Fed. 249, in which it is said that the conclusion reached could fairly be drawn from the testimony, the nature of which, however, is not indicated.

One who conducted a farm of 470 acres from which the gross income during an unfavorable year was over $1,800, was held to be chiefly engaged in farming, although he also maintained an office in a neighboring town for the purpose of conducting a law and collection business from which his total earnings for two years did not exceed $450, and were little, if any, above his expenses, where he at all times directed the work on the farm and spent a good deal of his time there, and the great bulk of his indebtedness was incurred in the purchase of improvements and stocking of his farm, and little, if any, was incurred in connection with his law or collection business. Re Hoy, 137 Fed. 175.

One owning 240 acres of land which he and he has appealed from the adjudication. Both sides agree "that the sole question for adjudication here, as in the court below, is: Was Henry C. Wilson, in the month of February, 1907, and prior thereto, a person chiefly engaged in farming?" And we agree that this is a question of fact, and we also agree to the statement of the rule quoted by counsel for appellees as substantially correct, as follows: "Where the trial court has considered conflicting evidence, and made its finding and decree thereon, it will be taken as presumptively correct, and will not be disturbed on appeal unless an obvious error managed himself, employing such help as he needed, upon which he raised wheat, oats, corn, and sold milk, the total farm products being valued at from $1,000 to $1,200, was chiefly engaged in farming, although he had a small store from which his income was only about $60 or $70 a year, and which, when the farm demanded his attention, he gave over to the care of his wife, and though he also sold, as an agent, $200 or $300 worth of fertilizers. Rise v. Bordner, 140 Fed. 566.

Reference may also be made to Re Rugsdale, Fed. Cas. No. 12,123, in which it was held that one engaged in farming and buying and selling live stock was not a tradesman, within a provision of a bankruptcy act making the failure of a merchant or tradesman to keep proper books of account a ground for refusing a discharge in bankruptcy.

On the other hand, one owning and operating a farm the total value of the produce of which for sale did not exceed $1,700, and who devoted two and one-half days each week to the conducting of a market stall in a neighboring city, from which he sold calves and lambs purchased and slaughtered by him, and other farm produce, some of which was sold on commission, the value of which during the year in question was not less than $6,000, and not more than $850 of which was the produce of his farm, and a large proportion of whose indebtedness, aside from amounts representing purchase money for his farm, was incurred in the other branches of his business, was not "a person engaged chiefly in farming" in the sense of the bankruptcy act. Re Mackey, 110 Fed. 355.

One whose time and energies of body and mind were principally devoted to the matter of buying and marketing live stock as the chief source of his livelihood, and to which he chiefly looked for financial success, and whose crops cultivated bore comparatively little relation, in proportion, to the amount he paid for live stock or feed, and the great bulk of whose indebtedness was for moneys borrowed for cattle speculation, was held not to be engaged chiefly in farming, in Bank of Dearborn v. Matney, 132 Fed. 75, where the question of the extent to which a farmer may engage in the business of feeding and marketing live stock is discussed as follows: "If he find it more profitable to feed his agricultural products or his grasses to live stock than to rely upon marketing the surplus, he may not be limited to the quantity of live stock for such purpose to what he may breed or rear on his farm. For this purpose he may rely entirely upon the purchase of such live stock from his neighbors or on the market, and utilize his farm products in feeding and fattening such 'feeders' for market. Neither, in my opinion, should the act be so construed as to restrict the farmer entirely, under all circumstances and conditions, to the corn and hay and grasses he may produce for rearing such feeders and preparing them for market. In other words, where he relies largely upon his pasture lands for grazing his cattle, and his crops of corn may not be sufficient to carry them through the particular winter and the feeding season, he may supplement these by purchasing from without sufficient corn, and the like, to meet the requirement. But certainly there should be apparent such relation between his method of farming and the buying and feeding of cattle, hogs, and the like, for market, as to reasonably indicate that his farming is not made principally subsidiary to the business of buying and selling cattle. So that, if his chief business is that of thus trading in cattle, using his lands as a mere feeding station, relying upon the purchased feed from the market for preparing them for sale much more than on his agricultural products, he may cross the dividing line between farming as his chief business and trading in cattle as his chief source of livelihood. No hard and fast rule can safely be laid down by the courts indifferently applicable to all cases. Each must depend more or less upon its own particular facts."

One who resided on a farm of 300 acres, to which he held the legal title, but on which he had paid little or nothing, cultivating about 80 acres of it, renting some and having the rest in pasture, and who has been accustomed to buy finely bred cattle, take them to the farm, and, after keeping them for a time, to sell them at auction sales, in which business a large part of his indebtedness was incurred, is not engaged chiefly in farming. Re Brown, 132 Fed. 706.

In Flickinger v. First Nat. Bank, 76 C. C. 132, 145 Fed. 162, it was held that one actively engaged in the business of a manufacturing corporation of which he was a stockholder, director, president, general manager, and who also owned and cultivated a farm, which was managed by him, to which he went once or twice a week, and telephoned his orders when he was otherwise engaged, buying whatever was bought on the farm and selling all his products, was engaged in two kinds of business, manufacturing and farming, of which the former was the chief, until he ceased to be actively occupied with the affairs of the manufacturing concern, when farming became his chief occupation.

has occurred in the application of the law, or a serious and important mistake has been made in the consideration of the evidence."

But we are constrained to hold that the case before us falls within the proviso. There was no material conflict in the testimony. Wilson had lived for many years on a large farm owned by him near a village 14 miles west of Columbus, and, for as many as five years previous to these proceedings, he had been occupying that farm and other farming lands belonging to his mother and sister, and leased by him from them. The whole amounted to some 1,700 acres. He had some other small parcels which he leased to others on shares. These 1,700 acres were improved land, which he devoted to cultivation and grazing. He had and used thereon about 20 horses, and an equipment of farming tools, wagons, and machinery in quantity corresponding to his operations, and employed from 7 to 15 men; and he supervised and controlled all the operations of raising the ordinary crops of agriculture. He had a large number of cattle and hogs, and during the preceding year raised 80 calves, and he kept about 100 cows. This live stock was maintained upon the crops which he raised. But at times he bought malt from breweries for his cows. The crops not so used were sold. He kept the cows principally for their milk, which he sent by his wagons to Columbus, where it was sold part of the time on the street at retail, and afterwards he provided a large refrigerator at Columbus, in which he stored his milk and employed men to retail it. Sometimes he bought milk from others and mingled it with his own. He built silos on his farm, and used them for storing and preserving forage raised on it, which he fed to his cows and other stock, and sometimes he bought stock from others, which he fattened on the grain and other produce from the farm, and then sold it off.

The foregoing are samples of his business operations. To enumerate all the details of it would require the statement of the particulars of the operations of diversified farming on a large farm. The only exception to this that we can see is his buying of milk from other parties and selling it. This was a comparatively small matter, and bore no considerable proportion to his other business. From the best information that we can get, we judge that the total value of the yearly products of his farm, other than from his dairy business, was about $17,500, and from that not more than $10,000. He had no other occupation than that of farming, unless it be that his keeping a dairy was another occupation. The court below thought that he was more of a dairyman than a farmer. We should think otherwise, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) even if all he did in carrying on the dairy business was to count as a distinct business from farming.

But it seems to us, that the court took an overnice distinction between the business of operating a farm and carrying on a dairy. In the vast majority of cases the keeping of a dairy is a mere incident, or, at most, a branch, of farming business; and in such cases it is a misdescription to classify the man as a dairyman, and not as a farmer. The general name of the latter includes the former. It is well known that all over the country farmers from time to time are changing their lines of industry, the uses to which they put their lands, and give their attention, sometimes principally to raising grains, sometimes to grazing, sometimes to the production of milk, butter, and cheese, all according to their judgment as to what is the most profitable way of using their farms.

Doubtless a man might be a dairyman, and not be a farmer, as if he were to build a barn, buy a herd of cows, and buy from others the grain and other forage to feed them, and sell their milk or other products; and, if this was his principal business, he would not be exempt from proceedings in bankruptcy because he was a farmer. But if, while farming, he establishes, as one of the departments of his industry, a dairy to utilize the products of his farm and convert them to profitable uses, he is none the less a farmer; nor does he cease to be one until he reaches the end by disposing of the ultimate product. His farming business includes all this. He may sell it at wholesale or at retail, as he finds to his best advantage. We do not think that, in storing his milk and selling it at retail, as he did, or if he sold his other products of his farm at retail, he was out of his legitimate sphere as a farmer. He did this, we must suppose, because it was the most profitable way of disposing of his products. We know of no reason for putting a strained construction upon this provision of the act, or restricting it within narrower bounds than the language imports when read in its common meaning. It exempts a certain class of persons, those engaged principally in a certain business, and that business is one which is not restricted to the simple raising of crops or other common products of farms, but extends to the results of turning them to account.

These views we think are in accord with the general trend of decisions. Re Thompson (D. C.) 102 Fed. 287; Re Mackey (D. C.) 110 Fed. 355; Bank of Dearborn v. Matney (D. C.) 132 Fed. 75; Re Drake (D. C.) 114 Fed. 229, and in circuit court of appeals sub nom. Wulbern v. Drake, 56 C. C. A. 643, 120 Fed. 493; Re Hoy (D. C.)

137 Fed. 175; Rise v. Bordner (D. C.) 140 Fed. 566; Flickinger v. First Nat. Bank, 76 C. C. A. 132, 145 Fed. 162.

Certain cases are cited to support views slightly different. But no one of them goes so far from the lines we think correct as to sanction the order here appealed from. We add, however, that, if it were conceded that, in respect of the dairy business, Wilson was not engaged in farming, still the fact remains that he was principally engaged in farming.

The order must be reversed, with costs.

HENRY W. PUTNAM.

(— Vt. —, 71 Atl. 188.)

Ship — mooring — justification.

1. A shipowner may be justified by necessity in mooring to another's wharf to escape the fury of a tempest.

Pleading — sufficiency — negating exceptions.

2. The absence of other available mooring place is sufficiently pleaded by a declaration in an action to recover damages for casting off a vessel necessarily moored to defendant's wharf, by an averment that a tempest compelled mooring to the defendant's wharf.

Same — authority of agent — exceptions.

3. That the servant of the owner of a wharf was acting within the scope of his employment in casting off a vessel moored there is sufficiently alleged in a declaration for damages for injuries thereby caused, by allegations that the wharf was in charge of the servant, and that defendant, by his servant, wilfully and designedly, negligently, carelessly, and wrongfully unmoored the vessel.

Case Note. — May entry upon land which would otherwise constitute a trespass be justified by private necessity.

The justification which necessity may offer for trespassing upon the lands of another divides itself into two classes. These need no more definition than the terms themselves imply, viz., public and private necessity. In this note it is intended to deal only with the latter class of decisions although in some instances classification is to some extent a matter of personal opinion. Cases passing upon the question of the obstruction of a highway and the effect of the trespass in turning aside to avoid the obstruction base their holding in some instances upon the right of the general public to use the road, but they are included here 20 L.R.A. because the question of personal necessity would seem to be an important factor. Munson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is alleged as the ground of recovery that, on the 13th day of November, 1904, the defendant was the owner of a certain island in Lake Champlain, and of a certain dock attached thereto, which island and dock were then in charge of the defendant's servant; that the plaintiff was then possessed of and sailing upon said lake a certain loaded sloop, on which were the plaintiff and his wife and owners may enter upon the land of the other for the purpose of placing supports under the floors of the building preparatory to taking down the wall, without being guilty of trespass on the property. Buck v. Weeks, 194 Pa. 522, 45 Atl. 325.

It is held in Cool v. Crommet, 13 Me. 250, that persons engaged in constructing a road were not guilty of trespass because oxen used in scraping had necessarily entered upon the plaintiff's land.

An involuntary entry upon lands adjoining a highway, made necessary by the escape onto such lands of cattle driven along the highway by their owner, does not constitute a trespass. Rightmire v. Shepard, 36 N. Y. S. R. 768, 12 N. Y. Supp. 800; and see Richardson v. Anthony, 12 Vt. 273.

The fact that the flow of surface water is endangering the wall of one's house does not justify an entry upon a neighbor's property for the purpose of filling and grading thereon so as to turn the flow of water. Grant v. Allen, 41 Conn. 150.

To whomsoever the soil of the bank of a river may belong, every man of common right may justify the going of his servants or his horses upon the banks of navigable rivers for towing barges, etc.; and, if the water of the river impairs and decreases the banks, then he shall have reasonable way for that purpose in the nearest part of the field next adjoining the river. Young v. —, 1 Ld. A plea by the defendant that the plaintiff was violently assaulting his (plaintiff's) wife and child in his own house, and that the defendant entered to prevent plaintiff committing said breach of peace, was held not to constitute legal justification for the trespass. *Rockwell v. two minor children; that there then arose a sudden and violent tempest, whereby the sloop and the property and persons therein were placed in great danger of destruction; that to save these from destruction or injury, the plaintiff was compelled to, and did, moor the sloop to defendant's dock; that the defendant, by his servant, unmoored the sloop, whereupon it was driven upon the shore by the tempest, without the plaintiff's fault; and that the sloop and its contents were thereby destroyed, and the plaintiff and his wife and children cast into the lake and upon the shore, receiving injuries. This claim is set forth in two counts,—one in trespass, charging that the defendant, by his servant, with force and arms wilfully and designedly unmoored the sloop; the other in case, alleging that it was the duty of the defendant, by his servant, to permit the

In Absor v. French, 2 Shower, 28, the action was for trespass, and judgment was for the defendant where his plea was that the plaintiff stopped a highway so that he could not pass and was compelled to go over the plaintiff's close, doing as little harm as he could.

And it is held in Haley v. Colcord, 59 N. H. 7, 47 Am. Rep. 176, that, where a landowner obstructs a prescriptive right of way over his land, a reasonable necessity is created which justifies the owner of the private way in passing over the adjoining land without committing a trespass.

An action for trespass will not lie where one having a right of way over the land of another is compelled to go upon the latter's property by the stoppage of the way, which had been in common use, although the same had never been limited or defined. Farnum v. Platt, 8 Pick. 339, 19 Am. Dec. 330; Leonard v. Leonard, 2 Allen, 543.

But one using a private way over another's land by necessity in the absence of a specific grant may not go upon the adjoining land if the way is impassable, and excuse his trespass on the plea of necessity. Holmes v. Seely, 19 Wend. 507.

And, where a right of way is given by specific grant, the grantee who turns aside therefrom because the road is covered with water is a trespasser upon the adjoining land. Taylor v. Whitehead, 2 Dougl. K. B. 745; and see Williams v. Safford, 7 Barb. 309.

Again, in Bullard v. Harrison, 4 Maule & S. 387, the right to go on adjoining lands because of an obstruction of the road is held not to extend to private ways.

plaintiff to moor his sloop to the dock, and to permit it to remain so moored during the continuance of the tempest; but that the defendant, by his servant, in disregard of this duty, negligently, carelessly, and wrongfully unmoored the sloop. Both counts are demurred to generally. There are many cases in the books which hold that necessity, and an inability to control movements inaugurated in the proper exercise of a strict right, will justify entries upon land and interferences with personal property that would otherwise have been trespasses. A reference to a few of these will be sufficient to illustrate the doctrine.

In Millen v. Fandrye, Popham, 161, trespass was brought for chasing sheep, and the defendant pleaded that the sheep were trespassing upon his land, and that he with a little dog chased them out, and that, as soon as the sheep were off his land, he called in the dog. It was argued that, although the defendant might lawfully drive the sheep from his own ground with a dog, he had no right to pursue them into the next ground; but the court considered that the defendant might drive the sheep from his land with a dog, and that the nature of a dog is such that he cannot be withdrawn in an instant, and that, as the defendant had done his best to recall the dog, trespass would not lie. In trespass of cattle taken in A, defendant pleaded that he was seised of C and found the cattle there damage feasant, and chased them towards the pond, and they escaped from him and went into A, and he presently retook them; and this was held a good plea. 21 Edw. IV., 64; Vin. Abr. "Trespass," H. a., 4 pl. 19. If one have a way over the land of another for his beasts to pass, and the beasts, being properly driven, feed the grass by morsels in passing, or run out of the way and are promptly pursued and brought back, trespass will not lie. See Vin. Abr. "Trespass," K. a., pl. 1. A traveler on a highway who finds it obstructed from a sudden and temporary cause may pass upon the adjoining land without becoming a trespasser because of the necessity. Henn's Case, W. Jones, 296; Campbell v. Race, 7 Cush. 408, 54 Am. Dec. 728; Hyde v. Jamaica, 27 Vt. 443 (459); Morey v. Fitzgerald, 56 Vt. 487, 48 Am. Rep. 811. An entry upon land to save goods which are in danger of being lost or destroyed by water or fire is not a trespass. 21 Hen. VII., 27; Vin. Abr. "Trespass," H. a., 4, pl. 24, K. a., pl. 3. In Proctor v. Adams, 113 Mass. 376, 18 Am. Rep. 500, the defendant went upon the plaintiff's beach for the purpose of saving and restoring to the lawful owner a boat which had been driven ashore, and was in danger of being carried off by the sea; and it was held no trespass. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

See also Dunwich v. Sterry, 1 Barn. & Ad. 831.

This doctrine of necessity applies with special force to the preservation of human life. One assaulted and in peril of his life may run through the close of another to escape from his assailant. 37 Herf. VII., pl. 26. One may sacrifice the personal property of another to save his life or the lives of his fellows. In Mouse's Case, 12 Coke, 63, the defendant was sued for taking and carrying away the plaintiff's casket and its contents. It appeared that the ferryman of Gravesend took 47 passengers into his barge to pass to London, among whom were the plaintiff and defendant; and the barge being upon the water a great tempest happened, and a strong wind, so that the barge and all the passengers were in danger of being lost if certain ponderous things were not cast out, and the defendant thereupon cast out the plaintiff's casket. It was resolved that in case of necessity, to save lives of the passengers, it was lawful for the defendant, being a passenger, to cast the plaintiff's casket out of the barge; that, if the ferryman surcharge the barge, the owner shall have his remedy upon the surcharge against the ferryman, but that if there be no surcharge, and the danger accrue only by the act of God, as by tempest, without fault of the ferryman, everyone ought to bear his loss to safeguard the life of a man. It is clear that an entry upon the land of another may be justified by necessity, and that the declaration before us discloses a necessity for mooring the sloop. But the defendant questions the sufficiency of the counts because they do not negative the existence of natural objects to which the plaintiff could have moored with equal safety. The allegations are, in substance, that the stress of a sudden and violent tempest compelled the plaintiff to moor to defendant's dock to save his sloop and the people in it. The averment of necessity is complete, for it covers not only the necessity of mooring, but the necessity of mooring to the dock; and the details of the situation which created this necessity, whatever the legal requirements regarding them, are matters of proof, and need not be alleged. It is certain that the rule suggested cannot be held applicable irrespective of circumstance, and the question must be left for adjudication upon proceedings had with reference to the evidence or the charge.

The defendant insists that the counts are defective, in that they fail to show that the servant, in casting off the rope, was acting within the scope of his employment. It is said that the allegation that the island and dock were in charge of the servant does not imply authority to do an unlawful act, and that the allegations as a whole fairly indicate that the servant unmoored the sloop for a wrongful purpose of his own, and not by virtue of any general authority or special instruction received from the defendant. But we think the counts are sufficient in this respect. The allegation is that the defendant did this by his servant. The words "wilfully, and designedly" in one count, and "negligently, carelessly, and wrongfully," in the other, are not applied to the servant, but to the defendant acting through the servant. The necessary implication is that the servant was acting within the scope of his employment. 13 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 922; Voegeli v. Pickel Marble & Granite Co. 49 Mo. App. 643; Wabash R. Co. v. Savage, 110 Ind. 156, 9 N. E. 85. See also Palmer v. St. Albans, 60 Vt. 427, 6 Am. St. Rep. 125, 13 Atl. 569. Judgment affirmed, and cause remanded.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

M. LEVY, Appt.,
v.
WALTER NASH.

(87 Ark. 41, 112 S. W. 173.)

Surface water — damming back — liability.

The owner of city property has the right to improve it in such manner as to protect it from surface water flowing from adjacent land, even to the closing of a drain which he had constructed across it and which he discovers to be injurious to his land, without liability to the owners of adjoining lands for injury caused by the backing of the water upon them.

Case Note. — Obstruction of surface water in city.

This note is limited strictly to those cases passing on the question whether the owner of a servient tenement in a city has the right so to use his property as to obstruct the flow of surface water naturally passing over the same, causing it to be diverted or dammed back to the injury of adjoining property. It will be noticed that this includes, also, those cases which state the proposition from the view point of the rights of the owner of a dominant tenement, — that is, whether or not the latter has the right to have the surface water falling on his land flow uninterrupted over the servient tenement. It therefore, does not include those cases which merely pass on the question whether an upper owner is liable in damages because he, by the grading of his lot or erection of buildings, causes surface water not theretofore flowing in that direction to overflow the land of his neighbors, since, even conceding that in these cases the 20 L.R.A. owner of the servient tenement would not have the right to obstruct the flow of surface water naturally coming from other property onto his, there might still be a question whether the upper owner could so grade his land as to cause the surface water falling thereon to flow on that of his neighbors. Those cases have also been excluded which deal with the rights and duties of municipal corporations with respect to surface waters, they being gathered in a subject note to Johnson v. For cases on right to hasten flow of surface water along natural drain ways, see case note to Manteufel v. Wetzels, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 167.

The importance of the question whether a proprietor of a servient tenement in a city has the right so to grade or improve his property as to cause surface water naturally flowing thereon from adjacent and higher property to be dammed up to the injury of his neighbors depends to some extent at least upon the further question whether, within the particular jurisdiction, the rule of the common and civil law prevails. or the Massachusetts rule, which was subsequently enlarged by New Jersey into what is known as the common-enemy doctrine. Under the common, as well as under the civil, law, the rule was that water must be allowed to follow its natural drain way, and any stoppage or damming up of this drain way to the injury of the higher land gave a right of action. See Farnham, Waters, § 889b. The reason for the rule loses some of its force in cities where sewers are provided as convenient means for disposing of surplus water, and there has been a tendency on the part of some courts to relax the rule in consequence. The grounds upon which they have done so are not entirely uniform. Some courts have mistaken the Massachusetts rule for that of the common law, and have justified the ruling permitting interference with the drainage under the belief that they were following the common law. The extent of this mistake is illustrated by Garland v. Aurin (Garland v. Aurin) 103 Tenn. 555, 48 L.R.A. 862, 76 Am. St. Rep. 699, 53 S. W. 940, where the court said: "Two distinct rules have been administered in the various states of the Union with respect to the right of a lower proprietor to obstruct and repel surface water flowing from the land of a higher proprietor,—one being called the common-law rule, and the other the civil-law rule. Under what is known as the common-law rule, the holding is that the right of the lower proprietor to occupy and improve his land in such manner and for such purposes as he may see fit, either by changing the surface or by the erection of buildings or other structures thereon, is not restricted or modified by the fact that such improvements or occupation will obstruct and repel surface water that would otherwise naturally flow thereon from adjacent and higher land, even though the land of the upper proprietor may be injured thereby. . . . On the contrary, by the rule of the civil law, the proprietor of the lower land may not obstruct, by any means, the natural flow of surface water, and turn it back, to the 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) injury of the higher lands of his neighbor; the latter owner having, by the law of nature, an easement or servitude of drainage over the lands of the former for the flow of surface waters."

It will be noticed that in those jurisdictions where the Massachusetts rule prevails the question whether the property overflowed is urban property or agricultural lands is of very little importance, since, even in case of the latter, it is held that the owner of the lower premises may obstruct surface water naturally flowing thereon, and, if that rule is applied as to agricultural lands, there certainly can be no less reason for holding that the same rule would apply to urban property.

In the following cases, decided in jurisdictions cited in Garland v. Aurin, supra, as supporting the common-law rule, it has been held, or so recognized, that the proprietor of lower premises in a city has the right to embank against surface water naturally flowing thereon from adjacent and higher property, to protect his own property, although he thereby causes such water to remain on or flow over the lands of another to his damage. Bryant v. Merritt, 71 Kan. 272, 80 Pac. 600; Bangor v. Lansil, 51 Me. 521; Parks v. Newburyport, 10 Gray, 28; Mehonray v. Foster, 132 Mo. App. 229, 111 S. W. 882; Gross v. Among this class of cases would also seem to be the New York cases cited and sufficiently set out in Levy v. Nash. And see 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 331.

To the same effect is Chadeayne v. Robinson, 55 Conn. 345, 3 Am. St. Rep. 55, 11 Atl. 592, where it was held that the owner of a village lot may erect a permanent barrier against the passage onto it of surface water from higher land. Another case, evidently holding to the same effect, is Ostrom v. Sills, 28 Can. S. C. 485.

This rule was also accepted as the law by the court in Grant v. Allen, 41 Conn. 156, where the question arose whether a lot

Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought in the Pulaski chancery court by Walter Nash against M. Levy. He alleged in his complaint as follows: "That he is the owner of lot 6, in block 18, in Pope's addition to Little Rock, Arkansas, which is on the southwest corner of Fourth and Sherman streets; that he has built a house thereon fronting on Sherman street, and one on the alley, fronting Fourth street; that, about one year ago, Fourth street was graded between Sherman and Commerce streets, and at the end of said alley a large tile drain was placed under and across said Fourth street to carry off the water, said work of tiling and grading being done under the authority and direction of the city of Little Rock; that running down said alley, and for quite a distance from the south, is a natural drain or water course or swale, which carries off large quantities of water, being the outlet for the water falling on several acres of ground; and that, prior to the grading of said Fourth street, said drain ran across the same in a northerly direction, where the drain pipe is now situated.

"That defendant owns the property on the northwest corner of said Fourth and Sherman streets, lying on the opposite side of owner has the right to go upon his neighbor's land and so fill in a depression or change the grade as to prevent surface water from running upon his own land, the court saying: "The right of the owner of land to determine the manner in which he will use it, or the mode in which he will enjoy it, the same being lawful, is too high in character to be affected by considerations growing out of the retention, diversion, or repulsion of mere surface water, the result of falling rain or melting snow."

In Goodale v. Tuttle, 29 N. Y. 450, a case which involved the drainage of a couple of marshy lots in a village, Chief Justice Denio said: "And, in respect to the running off of surface water caused by rain or snow, I know of no principle which will prevent the owner of land from filling up the wet and marshy places on his own soil for its amelioration and his own advantage, because his neighbor's land is so situated as to be incommoded by it."

In Edwards v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. 39 S. C. 472, 22 L.R.A. 246, 39 Am. St. Rep. 746, 18 S. E. 58, where a railroad constructed a sand bank as a protection to its right of way, resulting in the backing up of surface water on plaintiff's lot, it was held generally that the rule that surface water is a common enemy which a landowner may, when necessary for the protection of his property, throw back on neighboring land to the damage of the owner thereof, exists in South Carolina, under a statute adopting the common law of England. Since the common-law rule was the exact reverse of this, the decision was plainly erroneous, the court being misled by the attempt of Massachusetts and New Jersey to denominate their rule the common-law rule.

The confusion with respect to the subject is well illustrated by a recent Wisconsin decision. In Johnson v. Chicago, 31 P. M. & O. R. Co. 80 Wis. 641, 14 L.R.A. 495, 27 Am. St. Rep. 76, 50 N. W. 771, it was held generally that surface water on one's premises, including that which has been thrown thereon from higher levels by embankments, ditches, drains, and culverts, may be lawfully turned and diverted from 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

his land to the land of another, and the only remedy of the latter is to pass it on again to other lands. The court seemed to be under the impression that it was applying the Massachusetts rule, while it was in fact applying the rule of the common and civil law as well as that of nature, that water naturally seeks a lower level and therefore each landowner may assist it along its natural course to its final resting place.

Where, however, what is called in Garland v. Aurin, supra, the civil-law rule, but which is also that of the common law, prevails, the question whether the property is urban or agricultural takes on considerable importance, since in many of these jurisdictions, because of the great difference in the conditions of the surroundings and in the use of the two kinds of property, the courts, among which is Levy v. Nash, have seen the necessity of making an exception to the rule in favor of urban property; and it is therefore held in these cases that the owner of a lot in a city or town, over which the surface water falling and accumulating upon an adjacent upper lot flows to a common outlet, has the right to fill his lot so as to render it fit for building upon or other purposes, without becoming responsible in damages to the upper lot owner for injuries sustained by the consequent backing of the water upon his lot.

Of this class of cases are Middlesborough Town Co. v. Helwig, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 430; Hall v. Rising, 141 Ala. 431, 37 So. 586; Kohn v. Moore, 4 Legal Gaz. 46; Bentz v. Armstrong, 8 Watts & S. 40, 42 Am. Dec. 265; and McMahon v. Thornton, 5 Pa. Super. Ct. 495. A possible exception to the application of this rule seems also to be recognized in favor of the city or village lots, in Nininger v. Norwood, 72 Ala. 277, 47 Am. Rep. 412, and Crabtree v. Baker, 75 Ala. 91, 51 Am. Rep. 424.

In Los Angeles Cemetery Asso. v. Los Angeles, 103 Cal. 461, 37 Pac. 375, the doctrine allowing a servitude in the lower tenement in favor of the upper or dominant tenement for the flow of surface water is said to have had no application to lots held in cities and towns where changes and alter-

Fourth street from plaintiff's property; and there is and has been for a long time a covered culvert running northeastwardly and under defendant's said property and the sidewalk adjoining, which for a long time carried off the water of said drain, whence it was carried across the adjoining property, and so on until it reached the town branch.

"That, for about two months after the grading and tiling of Fourth street, as aforesaid, the water was carried off by said tiling and culvert when defendant closed the end of said culvert at the curb line where it joined the said tiling by placing plank across the same, thereby completely obstructing the flow of the water of said drain. That with heavy rains large quantities of water accumulate at and about the end of said alley on the south side of Fourth street, submerging his sidewalk and backyard, and retaining wall, and frequently standing for several days before it evaporates or soaks up in the soil, creating a nuisance and obstructing the travel on said sidewalk on that side, and often rising high enough to run across Fourth street and the north sidewalk thereof, thereby injuring and obstructing the same.

"The defendant refuses and fails to open said culvert, though often requested to do so. Wherefore plaintiff prays for a mandatory injunction requiring defendant to remove said obstruction and open said drain for the free access and flow of the water through the same, and that he be permanently enjoined from again closing up or obstructing or in any way interfering with said drain or the water through the same, and for costs and all proper and general relief."

The defendant answered, and, among other things, said:

"(4) Defendant denies that there is any stream or channel or water course running across said block 18, or across the block on which defendant resides; but says that the only water flowing northwardly across or from said block 18 is surface water from rainfall or melting snows, and there is a slight depression through or near the center of said block 18, through and over which the greater portion of said surface water falling ations in the surface are essential to the enjoyment of such lots.

In Cedar Falls v. Hansen, 104 Iowa, 189, 65 Am. St. Rep. 439, 73 N. W. 585, it was held that an owner of a city lot through which there is a natural depression, and through which water has been discharged because of the digging of ditches by the city, has the right to bring such lot to grade, although the flow of surface water is thereby diverted to lots owned by other persons.

In Phillips v. Waterhouse, 69 Iowa, 199, 58 Am. Rep. 220, 28 N. W. 539, it was held that the owner of a city lot has the right so to construct the buildings thereon or to improve the lot as to cast the rain water falling upon them upon the adjoining street or alley at the established grade; and he will not be liable for injuries caused by the flow of such water upon a neighbor's lot below grade.

On the other hand, many cases have failed to see any difference in principle between the reciprocal rights and duties of adjacent urban proprietors and those of adjacent rural proprietors, and have refused to apply one rule to agricultural lands and a different rule to city lots.

Thus, in Garland v. Aurin (Carland v. Aurin) 103 Tenn. 555, 48 L.R.A. 862, 76 Am. St. Rep. 699, 53 S. W. 940, the court, in an exhaustive opinion, held that the owner of a city lot has not the right to fill in or raise the surface so as to prevent the natural flow upon it of surface water from the higher ground of an adjoining owner, but is subject to the same rule which governs rural property.

So, in Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Ahr, 13 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 1035, it was held that the principle announced by the supreme 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

court, that, where two parcels of land, belonging to different owners, lie adjacent to each other, and one parcel lies lower than the other, the lower one owes a servitude to the upper, to receive the water which naturally runs from it, provided the industry of man has not been used to create the servitude, applies to parcels of land in cities and towns as well as to such parcels in the country.

In Goldsmith v. Elsas, 53 Ga. 186, it was held that, where two city lots adjoin, the lower lot owes a servitude to the higher so far as to receive the water which naturally runs from it, provided the owner of the latter does no act to increase such flow by artificial means.

In Gormley v. Sanford, 52 Ill. 159, the rule applicable to agricultural lands was held, also, to be applicable to city property, although the court recognized that, where a city has established an artificial sewerage of which property owners can reasonably avail themselves, it will probably be held to be their duty to do so. It should also be noted that in this case the property was situated in a very thinly populated part of the city, and that one lot was used for purposes of fruit growing while the other was used for mining coal.

In Pickerrill v. Louisville, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 1239, 100 S. W. 873, the court, without calling attention to the fact that the property in question was city property, held that a railroad company owning property subject to the servitude of receiving the natural flow of surface water from an upper estate is not entitled to fill up its property in order to make it fit for the prosecution of business, if the effect is to retard the flow of on said block 18 passes northwardly toward the town branch; that it flows through no channel, but spreads over the lower land in a northerly direction until it reaches the town branch.

"(5) It is true that there has been a small culvert or underground drain across the rear of defendant's lot, as well as the ground north of his, extending northwardly to Third street, which culvert was inadequate to carry off the surface water coming across the street from the block above, and which underground drain was made for the sole purpose of subdrainage, and to prevent the rear yard's from being wet or marshy; but defendant says he is not obliged by law or otherwise to keep the same open to drain off the surface water that falls or flows upon plaintiff's land, and that he has closed and kept the same closed against said surface water, as he has a lawful right to do."

"(6) Defendant further says that the natural flow of said surface water would not be over or across the defendant's said land, but would be across the lands in rear of his, which are lower than his; that he has done and is doing nothing in respect thereof except protecting his said land from being overflowed by the surface water falling upon the land of the plaintiff and other owners of lands in block 18, and this he has a lawful right to do."

After hearing the evidence, the court ordered the defendant to remove at his own expense any and all obstructions to the free passage of water through the underground culvert on his land, and perpetually enjoined him from closing the same.

The evidence shows that the defendant was forced to close the underground culvert to protect his own lot against overflows by surface water on account of the obstruction of water flowing through the same by the owners of lots below him.

The lot of the defendant is in the midst of a populous city. The rule which governs the right to dispose of surface water in agricultural districts does not apply to such property. It is set apart, held, and owned for building purposes. To make it useful for this purpose the owner has the right to fill it up, elevate it, to ditch it, to construct such water and to turn it back on the upper ground.

In Rielly v. Stephenson, 222 Pa. 252, 70 Atl. 1097, while it was conceded that the owners of a lot in a city, as distinguished from rural property, had the right so to grade their property as to obstruct the flow of surface water naturally finding its way thereon, it was contended that in doing so the owner of the lot must take care not to injure or damage the other or adjacent landowners. The court said, however: "The owners of lots in cities and towns buy and own with the manifest condition that the natural or existing surface is liable to be changed by the progress of municipal development. All such owners have equal rights neither lessened nor increased by priority of improvement, and the primary right of each owner is to protect himself and his lot from loss or inconvenience from the flow of surface water. The owner at the foot of the slope is under no obligation to allow his lot to continue as a reservoir for the surplus water of the neighborhood. He may shut it out by grading or otherwise, and the fact that thereby he may incidentally increase the flow on the adjoining lot neither makes him answerable in damages, nor affects the adjoining owner's right, in his turn, to shut out the original, plus the increased flow on his lot. The owner cannot be coerced as to time or manner of improvement by risk of having put upon him the burden of providing for the flow upon others. Some things, of course, he may not do. He may not proceed negligently so as to do unnecessary damage to others. But, so far as he acts upon his right to protect his enjoyment of his own property, any incidental loss to his neighbor is damnum absque injuria."

In Whitney v. Sanders, 3 Pittsb. 226, it was not only recognized that a lower urban lot when built upon is not under a natural-flowage servitude for surface water from a higher adjoining lot, but at least part of the language of the court would seem to indicate that the owner of the higher lot is bound to see that the rain falling on his lot will not injure the lower lot or buildings.

In Franklin v. Durgee, 71 N. H. 186, 58 L.R.A. 112, 51 Atl. 911, it was held that the owner of land adjoining a highway in a city cannot fill depressions in his land, which are natural outlets to drain the water from the highway, if the effect will be to cast the water back onto the highway and injure it, and if such use of his land is unreasonable under all the circumstances. The court in this case evidently ignores the distinction between agricultural lands and city property in regard to the applicability of a different rule concerning the obstruction of surface water, but makes as its test the reasonableness, under all the circumstances of the case, of the use of the property.

In Beard v. Murphy, 37 Vt. 90, 86 Am. Dec. 693, it was held that, where filthy water is thrown from the kitchen and runs onto adjoining property, the owner of such property may peaceably erect an obstruction so as to prevent this injury, even if it results in turning back the surface water onto the guilty party's land; and he is not compelled to seek such redress as he can get by resorting to litigation.

On the general question regarding rights as to flow of surface water, see subject note to Gray v. McWilliams, 21 L.R.A. 593.

Buildings on it in such a manner as to protect it against the surface water of an adjoining lot. If in so doing he prevents the flow of surface water upon his lot, the owner of the higher lot has no cause of action against him. This is a necessary incident to the ownership of such property. A contrary rule would operate against the advancement and progress of cities and towns and to their injury, and would be against public policy.

Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations, says: "On the one hand, the owner of the property may take such measures as he deems expedient to keep surface water off from him, or turn it away from his premises onto the street; and, on the other hand, the municipal authorities may exercise their lawful powers in respect to the graduation, improvement, and repair of streets, without being impliedly liable for the consequential damages caused by surface water to adjacent property." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 1040.

In Barkley v. Wilcox, 86 N. Y. 140, 40 Am. Rep. 519, the syllabus is as follows: "The parties owned adjacent lots on a street near a village. The natural formation of the land was such that surface water from rain or melting snows would descend and accumulate in the street in front of plaintiff's lot, and in times of unusual accumulations would run off over a natural depression across defendant's lot and other low lands to a river. Defendant built a house on his lot, filled in the lot and graded up the sidewalk in front of it, so as to cut off the surface water, and thereafter, there being an unusually large accumulation in the street, it flowed upon plaintiff's premises and into his cellar. In an action to recover damages for the injuries, held, that defendant was not liable." Vanderwiele v. Taylor, 65 N. Y. 341.

In this case the defendant closed up an underground drain which he made on his own lot when he discovered it was injurious. He was in the legitimate exercise of his rights for his protection, and is not liable for damages.

Decree reversed and cause remanded with directions to the court to dismiss complaint for want of equity.

Case Note. — Constitutionality of "bulk sale" legislation.

The earlier cases on this subject are covered in a subject note to Everett Produce Co. v. Smith, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 331. The cases decided since that note disclose the same conflict of views as to the constitutionality of this class of legislation that is revealed by that note. The constitutionality of the Connecticut statute, as amended by the act of 1903, which is upheld by the Connecticut supreme court in YOUNG v. LEMIEUX, was also sustained by a decision of the Federal court in Re Paulis, 144 Fed. 472, as against objections based on the constitutional guaranties of due process of law and the equal protection of the laws. In the light of the distinction made in some of the other cases, it is to be noted that the Connecticut statute passed upon in these cases declares that a sale in violation of its terms shall be void as against creditors, and does not merely, as in some states, prescribe a rule of evidence by creating a rebuttable presumption of fraud.

It will be observed that the New York "bulk sale" act of 1902, which was held unconstitutional in Wright v. Hart, 182 N. Y. 330, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 338, 75 N. E. 404, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 263, declared that a sale in violation of its terms "shall be" fraudulent and void as against the creditors of the seller; and that the provision in this respect of the Oklahoma statute, the constitutionality of which was upheld in Williams v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 15 Okla. 477, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 334, 82 Pac. 496, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 970, is that a sale in violation of the act "will be presumed to be fraudulent and void as against the creditors of the seller;" it being expressly held in the latter case large part of his stock in trade, since it is to be regarded as the sale of an independent business.

Same—police power.

3. Requiring a retail merchant to file notice of intention to sell the whole or a large part of his stock seven days prior to the sale, under penalty of the sale being voidable at the instance of creditors, is within the police power of the state.

Same—property rights.

4. No unconstitutional interference with property rights is affected by requiring retail merchants to file notice of intention to sell the whole or a large part of their stocks, seven days before the sale, under penalty of the sale being voidable at the instance of creditors.

Same—replenishment of stock.

5. One who purchases a retail stock of goods from a merchant who has not complied with the statutory requirement as to notice of sale is not entitled to retain against creditors of the merchant articles placed in the stock by him after the purchase, if they merely replace the goods sold, and are purchased with the avails of such sales.

that the statutory presumption may be overthrown by evidence of good faith.

The provisions of the Georgia statute, the constitutionality of which was upheld in Jacques & T. Co. v. Carstarphen Warehouse Co. 131 Ga. 1, 62 S. E. 82, are substantially like those of the New York statute passed upon in Wright v. Hart, supra, and expressly declare that a sale made in violation of its terms "shall be conclusively presumed to be fraudulent." The court held that the statute neither deprives one of property without due process of law, nor abridges the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, nor denies equal protection of the laws; and that it is not class legislation. It was further held that the statute was not obnoxious to the rule that the legislature cannot, under the guise of prescribing a rule of evidence applicable to a given class of cases, deprive the courts of their exclusive power to decide when an essential fact has been proven, upon the ground that, notwithstanding the phraseology employed, the statute in reality prescribes a rule of substantive law and not a rule of evidence.

The Georgia court of appeals had previously, in Taylor v. Folds, 2 Ga. App. 453, 58 S. E. 633, expressed an opinion in favor of the constitutionality of the statute, without discussing the question further than to recognize the existence of a conflict of authority in other states.

The Michigan statute which is substantially like the Georgia statute and declares that a sale in violation of its terms "shall be void as against the creditors of the seller, etc." was upheld in Spurr v. Travis, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for New London County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover possession of assets alleged to belong to a bankrupt. Affirmed.

Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 85; State v. Main, 69 Conn. 135, 36 L.R.A. 623, 61 Am. St. Rep. 30, 37 Atl. 80; Walp v. Moear, 76 Conn. 520, 57 Atl. 277; John P. Squire & Co. v. Tellier, 185 Mass. 18, 102 Am. St. Rep. 322, 69 N. E. 312.

Hall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is the trustee of the estate of Philip E. Hendrick, who was adjudicated a bankrupt upon the petition of sundry creditors, dated September 19, 1904. On and for some years prior to August 31, 1904, said Hendrick conducted personally in his own name and in his building in Taftville, in 145 Mich. 721, 116 Am. St. Rep. 330, 108 N. W. 1090, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 250, against objections that it deprives one of property without due process of law, denies the equal protection of laws, and is class legislation because limited to merchants and not including farmers, manufacturers, etc., and because it does not relate to merchants who owe no debts. The court said that the Michigan statute was subject to neither of the objections—failure to exempt from the operation of its provisions persons acting in fiduciary or official capacity under judicial process, and the making it a criminal offense for both purchaser and seller to act in making a sale and purchase in disobedience or disregard of its provisions—which characterized the Utah statute declared unconstitutional in Block v. Schwartz, 27 Utah, 387, 65 L.R.A. 308, 101 Am. St. Rep. 971, 76 Pac. 22, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 550.

The decision in the Spurr Case was followed without further discussion in Muselman Grocer Co. v. Kidd, D. & P. Co. 151 Mich. 478, 115 N. W. 409.

The Minnesota statute, in other respects like the Georgia and Michigan statutes, declares that a sale in violation of its terms "will be presumed to be fraudulent and void as against creditors of the seller." The statute was construed in Thorpe v. Pennock Mercantile Co. 99 Minn. 22, 108 N. W. 940, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 229, merely to prescribe a rule of evidence by creating a rebuttable presumption, and, as so construed, its constitutionality was upheld. The court, however, stated that, even if the statute were to be construed as rendering a sale in viola-this state, a retail general store and meat market, and at the same time, in a store hired by him on the opposite side of the street, carried on a separate and independent retail drug business under the name of the "Taftville Drug Company," which was managed by a licensed druggist employed by him. The value of the stock in the general store was about $2,000, and of the stock, fixtures, and soda fountain in the drug store, about $3,500. There was no evidence at the trial of the separate value of the stock, fixtures, and soda fountain. On August 31, 1904, said Hendrick, at a single transaction, and not in the regular course of business, and without any written bill of sale, and without having caused to be recorded the notice of his intention to make such sale required by chapter 72, p. 49, of the Public Acts of 1903, sold and delivered to the defendant said drug store and the whole of his stock, fixtures, and soda fountain therein for the price of $3,500, receiving therefor from the defendant $50 in cash, a small indorsed check, one note for $2,000 payable in five days, and one for $1,400 payable in seven days, both being signed by the defendant as agent. It was understood between Hendrick and the defendant that payment of said notes would not be demanded before January 1, 1905. The defendant has never paid said notes, and it did not appear at the trial that payment thereof had ever been demanded. The defendant had been managing said drug business, as a clerk for Hendrick, for two months before such sale, with the expectation of eventually buying it. He had no property, had previously failed in business, and was owing debts on account thereof, and for that reason signed said notes as agent. After such purchase, the defendant continued to conduct said drug business, purchasing goods in small amounts from time to time from tion of its terms absolutely void, the weight of authority would sustain it.

The importance of the distinction between a statute which makes a sale in violation of its terms absolutely void and one which merely creates a rebuttable presumption in such case is emphasized by the decision in Sprintz v. Saxton, 126 App. Div. 421, 110 N. Y. Supp. 585, upholding the constitutionality of the New York act after it had been amended by substitution of the phrase "will be presumed to be fraudulent and void" for the phrase "shall be fraudulent and void," in the statute at the time it was declared unconstitutional in Wright v. Hart, supra. Another ground of distinction was that the amended statute contains a new provision taking out of its operation sales by executors, administrators, receivers, or a public officer conducting a sale in his official capacity.

The constitutionality of the Pennsylvania statute, was upheld, after a full discussion, in Wilson v. Edwards, 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 295, notwithstanding it declares that a sale in violation of its terms "shall be deemed fraudulent and voidable," and was construed by the court to render a sale voidable, and not merely to prescribe a rule of evidence. In addition to the fundamental constitutional objections that the statute denied the equal protection of the laws, and that it was an unwarrantable infringement of liberty and the right to acquire and dispose of property, the court overruled the objection that its purpose was not sufficiently indicated in its title, which reads: "An Act Relative to the Sale in Bulk of the Whole, or a Large Part of a Stock of Merchandise and Fixtures, or Merchandise or Fixtures, not in the Ordinary Course of Business; Providing Certain Requirements Therefor, Imposing Certain Duties upon the Seller, and Making Their Violation a Misdemeanor."

It was held in Fisher v. Herrmann, 118 Wis. 424, 95 N. W. 392, that the facts shown were sufficient to rebut the legal presumption of fraud predicated on want of notice to creditors, required by the bulk sale statute of that state, which provides that a sale in violation of its terms "shall be presumed fraudulent as against the creditors of the vendor, and shall be conclusive evidence of fraud, unless it shall be made to appear that the sale was made in good faith and without any intent to defraud such creditors." The court did not consider the question of constitutionality of the statute, for the reason that it was not questioned on the argument, nor presented in the briefs, of counsel.

It will be observed, however, that the Illinois supreme court, in Charles J. Off & Co. v. Morehead, post, 167, holds the Illinois bulk sales law of May 13, 1905, unconstitutional, notwithstanding that the act in terms merely declares that a sale in violation of its terms "will be presumed to be fraudulent and void as against the creditors of the seller." The decision rests upon the broad ground that there is no legitimate basis for the classification upon which the statute rests, and the court does not undertake to distinguish the statute in question from those of other states which have been upheld, by reason of any difference in terms. This decision was followed without further discussion in Pogue v. Rowe, 236 Ill. 157, 86 N. E. 207.

The general questions of construction arising under the bulk sales law are treated in the subject note to Everett Produce Co. v. Smith, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 331; and the specific questions as to the applicability of the statute to a transfer in payment of a creditor, in a case note to Compton v. Dietlein, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 174; and the question of its applicability to a chattel mortgage, in the case note to Hannah & Hogg v. Richter Brewing Co. 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 178.

the receipts of the business to keep up the stock, and drawing from the receipts about $16 a week for his living expenses until the goods were replevined by the plaintiff in January, 1905. At the time of said sale, Hendrick was largely indebted and was being pressed by his creditors, but he did not believe that he was in fact insolvent. His general store was closed by attachment on the 16th of September, 1904. The property in the hands of the plaintiff is insufficient to pay the claims of Hendrick's creditors.

The trial court held that the sale to the defendant was not made to hinder or defraud creditors, nor in contemplation of insolvency, but that it was void under chapter 72, page 49, of the Public Acts of 1903, and § 4869 of the General Statutes of 1902, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff. In his reasons of appeal the defendant claims that the trial court erred in holding, upon the facts above stated, that the sale of the drug business was a sale by Hendrick of "the whole or a large part of his stock in trade," within the meaning of chapter 72, page 49, of the Public Acts of 1903, and was void under said act and § 4869 of the General Statutes of 1902, and in not holding that said act of 1903 was in conflict with the state and Federal Constitutions. In this court the plaintiff pleaded in abatement of the defendant's appeal that the finding of facts for the appeal was filed and notice thereof given to the defendant on July 26, 1906, and that the appeal was not filed until August 11, 1906, and not within ten days after such notice of the filing of the finding. To this plea the defendant demurred upon the ground that he was not required to file his appeal within ten days after July 26th, since chapter 24, page 264, of the Public Acts of 1905 provides that "all proceedings to make or complete the record on such appeal shall be suspended during the months of July and August."

The plea in abatement is insufficient. The appeal was filed in time. The filing of the finding in July and of the appeal in August were effective, notwithstanding the provisions that all proceedings should be suspended during those months. That provision was not intended to prevent either court or counsel from filing the necessary papers to make or complete the record on the appeal, during the months of July and August, to become operative upon the expiration of that period.

As the drug store was not conducted as a part of the business of the general store, but as a separate and independent business, carried on in another building, and under another name, the decision of the trial court that the sale was within the statute is clearly sustainable upon the ground that it was a sale of Hendrick's whole stock in trade in an independent business.

Section 4868, as amended by chapter 72 of the Public Acts of 1903, is not invalid as conflicting with either the Federal or state Constitution. In 1901 an act entitled "An Act Concerning Sales of Personal Property" was passed, which provided, in effect, and as afterward stated in § 4868 of the General Statutes, that any sale by such dealer, at a single transaction, and not in the regular course of business, of the whole or a large part of his stock in trade, should be in writing, describing the property sold, and all the conditions of the sale, acknowledged before competent authority, and recorded within one day after the sale in the town clerk's office where the vendor has his place of business, and, as afterward stated in § 4869 of the General Statutes, that such sales made without these formalities should be void as against the creditors of the vendor at the time of the sale. Pub. Acts 1901, chap. 161, p. 1356. In 1903 the act was passed entitled: "An Act Concerning the Transferring of a Person's Business," which was in force at the time the sale in question was made, and which reads as follows: "Section 4868 of the General Statutes is hereby amended to read as follows: No person who makes it his business to buy commodities and sell the same in small quantities for the purpose of making a profit shall, at a single transaction and not in the regular course of business, sell, assign, or deliver the whole or a large part of his stock in trade unless he shall, not less than seven days previous to such sale, assignment, or delivery, cause to be recorded in the town clerk's office in the town in which such vendor conducts his said business, a notice of his intention to make such sale, assignment, or delivery, which notice shall be in writing describing in general terms the property to be so sold, assigned, and delivered, and all conditions of such sale, assignment, or delivery, and the parties thereto." Pub. Acts 1903, chap. 72, p. 49. Said act neither repealed nor changed § 4869 of the General Statutes of 1902. In 1905, § 4868 of the General Statutes was further amended so that, instead of absolutely prohibiting such sales without such notice, as the language of that section did, it should only render them void as against the vendor's creditors. Pub. Acts 1905, chap. 211, p. 408. In State v. Reynolds, 77 Conn. 131-134, 58 Atl. 755, in sustaining, as a valid exercise of the police power of the state, § 1358 of the General Statutes of 1902, prohibiting any person from exposing for sale from any wagon or temporary stand any article of provisions within 1 mile from the fair ground of any incorporated society, we expressly approved of the language of the courts of other jurisdictions describing the police power of the state as extending "beyond the protection of health, peace, morals, education, and good order," and as comprehending "all those general laws of internal regulation necessary to secure the peace, good order, the health, and comfort of society, and the regulation and protection of all property in the state," and as the "power to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people, and to legislate so as to increase the industries of the state . . . and add to its wealth and prosperity,"—citing State v. Harrington, 68 Vt. 622–626, 34 L.R.A. 100, 35 Atl. 515, and Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27–31, 28 L. ed. 923–925, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357. In Walp v. Mooar, 76 Conn. 515–521, 57 Atl. 277, we said of § 4868, as it read before it was amended in 1903, that it was not unconstitutional because it applied only to retail dealers, nor as depriving persons of their property without due process of law; that the purpose of the act was to prevent fraud; that the legislature had the undoubted power to adopt reasonable measures for regulating the sale of merchandise in this state so as to prevent fraud; and that the act then in question was clearly within that power.

No citizen has an absolute right to sell his property either in such manner or at such time as he may choose. Every person holds his rights, however fundamental they may be, subject to the exercise within constitutional limits of that governmental power vested in the legislature of the state in which he resides, which is commonly called the "police power." Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 34 L. ed. 620, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 13. While the exercise of such power by the legislature is only to be justified upon the ground that it is for the public good, that its purpose is the removal of an existing evil, that the provisions of the act bear a reasonable relation to the evil sought to be cured, and that they are such as are not usually oppressive upon individuals, and do not impose unnecessary restrictions upon lawful occupations, yet, when courts are required to pass upon the validity of such legislation, it is to be remembered that, in the exercise of such police power, "a large discretion is necessarily vested in the legislature to determine not only what the interests of the public require, but what measures are necessary for the protection of such interests" (Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 38 L. ed. 385, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499); that every such law is not to be held void "which may seem to the judges who pass upon it excessive, unsuited to its ostensible end, or based upon conceptions of morality with which they disagree" (Otis v. Parker, 187 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

U. S. 606, 47 L. ed. 323, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 168; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Matthews, 174 U. S. 86, 43 L. ed. 909, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609); that "every presumption and intentment is to be made in favor of its validity, and that, unless it appears beyond reasonable doubt to be 'a clear usurpation of power prohibited,' it must stand as a valid act." State v. Reynolds, supra; Booth v. Illinois, 184 U. S. 425, 46 L. ed. 623, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 425; State v. Main, 69 Conn. 123, 135. 36 L.R.A. 623, 61 Am. St. Rep. 30, 37 Atl. 80; State v. Feingold, 77 Conn. 326–331, 59 Atl. 211. The manifest purpose of the act in question is to protect creditors of retail dealers against a class of sales which are often fraudulent, and opportunities for making which are readily afforded by the nature of the retail business and the manner in which it is usually conducted. Walp v. Mooar, supra. Enactments to prevent such fraudulent transfers are clearly within that class of legislation generally denominated "police regulations." In considering whether, in passing this particular act, the legislature has transcended the limits of its constitutional authority, we are to inquire whether the methods provided by the act for curing the existing evil are reasonably appropriate for that purpose, and whether they unreasonably infringe upon personal or property rights. Section 4808 as originally enacted provided no other notice to creditors than by the recording of the bill of sale within one day after the sale. In enacting the amendment of 1903 the legislature probably believed that a notice before the sale would be a much more effectual means of enabling creditors to protect their rights than a notice after the sale had been made.

It may be that this act approaches the verge of legislative power, but we cannot say that its requirements as to the manner and time of giving notice of the sale are so clearly unreasonable or so unnecessarily burdensome as to compel us to hold that any constitutional rights have been infringed. It cannot be said that such notice as creditors would receive from the recording seven days before the sale of a notice of his intention to sell by the vendor, would give them an unnecessarily long time to take steps to protect their interests. Although, by the language of the amendment of 1903 taken strictly, sales of the character there described, made without the required notice, are absolutely forbidden, it is apparent, and especially from the fact that § 4869 was left unchanged, that they were only intended to be voidable at the instance of creditors. It does not seem to us, either from a consideration of the requirements themselves of the act, or of the facts of the case before us, that the restrictions placed by the legislature upon sales of the kind in question are such as will cause such serious inconvenience to those affected by them as will amount to any unconstitutional deprivation of property. A retail dealer who owes no debts may lawfully sell his entire stock without giving the required notice. One who is indebted may make a valid sale without such notice by paying his debts, even after the sale is made. Insolvent and fraudulent vendors are those who will be chiefly affected by the act, and it is for the protection of creditors against sales by them of their entire stock at a single transaction, and not in the regular course of business, that its provisions are aimed. It is, of course, possible that an honest and solvent retail dealer might, in consequence of the required notice before the sale, lose an opportunity of selling his business, or suffer some loss from the delay of a sale occasioned by the giving of such notice. But "a possible application to extreme cases" is not the test of the reasonableness of public rules and regulations. Com. v. Plaisted, 148 Mass. 375, 2 L.R.A. 142, 12 Am. St. Rep. 566, 19 N. E. 224. "The essential quality of the police power as a governmental agency is that it imposes upon persons and property burdens designed to promote the safety and welfare of the general public." Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. State, 47 Neb. 549-564, 41 L.R.A. 481, 53 Am. St. Rep. 557, 66 N. W. 624. Statutes imposing even more severe restrictions upon such sales than those of the act before us have been sustained in other jurisdictions in the cases cited in Walp v. Mooar, supra, of John P. Squire & Co. v. Telier, 185 Mass. 18, 102 Am. St. Rep. 322, 69 N. E. 312; McDaniels v. J. J. Connelly Shoe Co. 30 Wash. 549, 60 L.R.A. 947, 94 Am. St. Rep. 889, 71 Pac. 37; and Neas v. Borches, 109 Tenn. 398, 97 Am. St. Rep. 851, 71 S. W. 50.

The fact that some of the goods replevined were placed in stock by the defendant after his attempted purchase from Hendrick does not entitle the defendant to retain them. It appears that he merely replaced goods sold with others purchased with the avails of such sales.

There is no error.

Baldwin, Prentice, and Shumway,
JJ., concur.

Hamersley, J., dissenting:

Chapter 72 of the Public Acts of 1903, whose validity is challenged in this action, is in form an amendment of chapter 161 of the Public Acts of 1901 (Rev. 1902, §§ 4868, 4869, 4870), but is in substance and legal effect a repeal of the act of 1901 and the enactment of a new statute of a radically different character.

The former act required a sale of his stock in trade by a retail dealer to be made in writing and recorded within one day after the time of sale, under penalty of an unrecorded sale being void as against existing creditors of the vendor. The regulation as to what sales shall be made in writing and recorded is plainly a legislative power. The act did not affect the property of the vendor, nor restrict his freedom of action in his selling that property; and the penalty imposed for its disobedience, in view of the actual or constructive fraud against creditors, possible to be more easily accomplished through such sale if not in writing and immediately recorded, was sufficiently appropriate to the legitimate purpose of the regulation to make its wisdom and justness a purely legislative, and not a judicial, question. We therefore held that the act was not unconstitutional. Walp v. Mooar, 76 Conn. 515, 67 Atl. 277.

The act of 1903, read in connection with its amendment by chapter 211 of the Public Acts of 1905, requires every retail dealer, before making a sale of his stock in trade, to come to an agreement with his vendee as to all the conditions of the sale; to state these conditions in writing, together with a description of the property to be sold and the parties to the sale; and to cause this writing, signed by him, to be recorded at least seven days previous to making such sale, under penalty, in case of disobedience, of the sale being void as against existing creditors.

Do these limitations upon the owner's right to sell his property necessarily involve a substantial impairment of the value of that property? If they do, then the act takes private property without compensation, and it is immaterial under what form of words or pretense the result is accomplished. "The courts are not bound by mere forms, nor are they to be misled by mere pretenses. They are at liberty—indeed, are under a solemn duty—to look at the substance of things, whenever they enter upon the inquiry whether the legislature has transcended the limits of its authority." Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 661, 31 L. ed. 205, 210, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273. The validity of the act of 1903 turns upon the answer to this question. If the limitations upon sale involve no substantial impairment of the value of the owner's property, then the justification of the incidental annoyance to the owner may be regarded as a legislative, rather than a judicial, question; but, if the necessary effect of the act is destruction of private property without compensation, then the principles of the law applicable to such a case involve the invalidity of the act.

to these principles there is little, if any, controversy. They are settled by our own decisions in accordance with the weight of authority in other jurisdictions. The protection of the citizen in the equal enjoyment of personal freedom and private property are secured by our Constitution in terms as broad as those which yeast the legislative power in the general assembly. The power to destroy or substantially impair these rights is not included in the grant of legislative power, and a law purporting to be the exercise of legislative power, whether of the power of taxation, or of trade regulation, or of protective legislation (often called police power), or of any other legislative power, is void if in effect it is a substantial impairment of those rights secured by the Constitution against the operation of every manifestation of legislative power. State v. Conlon, 65 Conn. 478, 489, 31 L.R.A. 55, 48 Am. St. Rep. 227, 33 Atl. 519; State v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 73 Conn. 255, 265, 57 L.R.A. 481, 47 Atl. 299; McKeon v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 75 Conn. 343, 347, 61 L.R.A. 730, 53 Atl. 656; State v. McMahon, 76 Conn. 97, 102, 55 Atl. 591; State v. Feingold, 77 Conn. 326, 331, 59 Atl. 211.

In State v. Travelers' Ins. Co. supra, we say: "The legislative power in all its manifestations is limited. . . . If any exaction . . . in the form of taxation . . . is a seizure of the property of one for the benefit of another, or is an uncompensated confiscation of property, the law authorizing such exaction" violates the Constitution and is void.

In McKeon v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. supra, we say that a law authorizing acts which in effect constitute the taking of property without compensation is void, notwithstanding such acts are authorized in the exercise of the police power; that the phrase "police power" does not denote some transcendent form of legislative authority, but that the police powers of a state are simply the powers of government inherent in every sovereignty, and, if exercised by legislation which violates any right guaranteed by the state Constitution, they are to that extent invalid; and that "the legislation on which the defendant relies in the case at bar makes no direct provision for compensation for property taken. The Constitution does; and that is enough."

In State v. McMahon, supra, we say: Legislation is not exempt from constitutional guaranties because it relates to subjects commonly classed under the phrase "police power." The whole legislative power is committed to the general assembly subject to the constitutional restrictions, and no manifestation of that power is exempt from these limitations. A law which takes private property without compensation is equally void, whether classed as an exercise of educational power in building a school house, or of police power in the destruction of property dangerous to health. "Clothing infected with disease may be destroyed without compensation to its owner, not because the law authorizing it is a police regulation and so exempt from constitutional limitation, but because no right of property is invaded by such destruction." No law can authorize the taking of property without compensation, either for private or public use, because such legislation is outside the field of legislation included in the grant of legislative power of any nature. But the rights of property thus protected do not include a right to the possession or use of anything which is either in itself, or a particular use, inherently dangerous to others. The power to protect its citizens from such dangers is included in the grant of legislative power, and, when anything which may be the subject of private ownership thus becomes dangerous, menacing the health, peace, or morals of the public, the legislature may authorize unlimited restrictions in its use, or even the destruction of the thing itself, without compensation, and the law may be within the constitutional limits of this power of protective legislation, because the thing destroyed, when thus dangerous to the public, ceases to that extent to be the subject of ownership, and its destruction is not the taking of property but the destruction of a thing which no man has a right to own. The loose phrase "police power" is sometimes limited to this particular exercise of the power of protective legislation in respect to things which, by reason of their danger to the public, have to that extent ceased to be the lawful subject of private ownership; but more frequently its use covers as well the power of trade regulations and all regulations appropriate to promote public quiet, comfort, and prosperity. Referring to such regulations, we say, in State v. Reynolds, 77 Conn. 131, 134, 58 Atl. 755: "Every citizen holds his rights subject to the exercise, within constitutional limits, of this power." Among the constitutional limits are those provisions which except from the grant of all legislative power the power to take property without compensation. The legislature has full power in promotion of general public interests to enact laws regulating the use of property which do not substantially affect the protected rights of property and person; it has the power to regulate the use of, and even to destroy, anything which may be the subject of ownership, and which has become a menacing danger to the public; each kind of regulation is an exer-rise of that legislative power often called "police power," but the principles by which the two kinds of regulation must be governed are very different.

In the former case the controlling question relates to the wisdom and justice of the regulation, and this is a legislative question; in the latter, the question is, Has the protected right of property been lost by reason of the inherent danger to the public of the thing owned? and this is a judicial question. The distinction is vital. The efficacy of any limitation of legislative power in respect to property rights protected by the Constitution depends upon the conception and maintenance of this distinction. Such limitation must inevitably become a mockery if the courts hesitate to determine in each case as a purely judicial question whether or not the protected right of property exists. In determining this judicial question the courts ordinarily follow the legislative finding as to the dangerous nature of the property, but not when they are satisfied that there exists no reason for such a finding. For instance, when the legislature finds that the liquor distilled from wheat is a menacing danger to public peace and morals, which deprives the owner of any absolute right to sell such property, and thereupon prohibits its sale, the courts accept the finding even if there may be room for some difference of opinion. But, should the legislature find that wheat from which the dangerous liquor may be distilled is a menacing danger to public order, and thereupon prohibit its sale, it will hardly be contended that the strongest desire to maintain the validity of a legislative act could justify the court in accepting the finding and declaring the legislation valid. No more can it be seriously contended that the stock in trade of all retail dealers, whether used for sale in small quantities or in bulk, is in its nature such a menacing danger to the public that the owner has no right of property in such a dangerous use, so that a law destroying the stock in trade, or substantially impairing its value, does not appropriate property without compensation.

If, therefore, the restrictions of the act of 1903 do substantially impair the value of the property affected, there is no serious question as to its invalidity. Acts imposing somewhat similar restrictions, and apparently intended to accomplish a similar purpose, were in the same year (1903), through a strange coincidence, enacted by the legislatures of a large number of states. The courts of New York, Ohio, and Utah have held such legislation invalid. Wright v. Hart, 182 N. Y. 330, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 338, 75 N. E. 404, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 263; Miller v. Crawford, 70 Ohio St. 207, 71 N. E. 631, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 558; Block v. Schwartz, 27 Utah, 387, 65 L.R.A. 308, 101 Am. St. Rep. 971, 76 Pac. 22. 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 550. The courts of Massachusetts, Tennessee, and Washington have supported their validity. John P. Squire & Co. v. Teller, 185 Mass. 18, 102 Am. St. Rep. 322, 60 N. E. 312; Neas v. Borches, 109 Tenn. 398, 97 Am. St. Rep. 851, 71 S. W. 50; McDaniels v. J. J. Connelly Shoe Co. 30 Wash. 549, 60 L.R.A. 947, 94 Am. St. Rep. 889, 71 Pac. 37.

In this class of cases the primary question is, Does the law in its necessary practical effect appropriate property not dangerous to the public either inherently or in its particular use? This question determined, the application of the settled principles defining the limitation of legislative power is comparatively simple. As was said in State v. Feingold, 77 Conn. 326, 333, 59 Atl. 211: "In drawing the line which separates the field of arbitrary interference with protected rights of property and freedom in personal action, from that of protective legislation in behalf of public safety, each case must fall on one or the other side in accordance with its particular circumstances." The act of 1903 prohibits all retail dealers from selling their property, which is palpably not dangerous to public safety either inherently or in its particular use, without complying with certain antecedent requirements. Applying the rule of common sense to the commonly known conditions of trade, it seems to me that the necessary practical effect of these requirements is a substantial impairment of the value of the property affected, and, for this reason (without reference to the question whether the act also violates that equality under the law in the enjoyment of civil rights which is guaranteed by our Constitution), I am unable to concur in the decision of the court.

creditors, one about to sell a stock of merchandise in gross or in a manner out of the due course of business to make an inventory and list of his creditors and notify them of the proposed sale, which is not required of persons selling other kinds of property under similar circumstances, unconstitutionally deprives him of liberty and property.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Logan County Court dismissing an attachment to reach property for the satisfaction of a debt of defendant. Affirmed.

Statement by Vickers, J.:

This is an action in assumpsit and attachment brought by Charles J. Off & Company against Della I. Morehead. A writ of attachment was issued upon an affidavit alleging that the defendant had, within two years, fraudulently conveyed and disposed of her property so as to hinder and delay her creditors, contrary to the provisions of and act entitled "An Act to Prevent Sales of Merchandise in Fraud of Creditors," approved May 13, 1905, and in force July 1, 1905. This attachment writ was levied upon a stock of groceries which had formerly belonged to the defendant. To the declaration in assumpsit, which consisted of the common counts, a plea of the general issue was interposed. The affidavit for attachment was traversed and issue joined on the traverse. After the seizure of the stock of merchandise by virtue of a writ of attachment, Wilbur Gehres, by leave of court, interpleaded, and by his interplea averred that the said stock of merchandise attached and seized by virtue of the writ of attachment was at the time it was so attached and seized, and still was, the property of him, the said Wilbur Gehres, and not the property of the said Della I. Morehead. To the interplea Off filed a replication, denying that the property seized was the property of the interpleader, and averring the same to be the property of Della I. Morehead. This replication concluded to the country, and upon it issue was joined. A jury was waived by the parties as to the issues on the declaration in assumpsit and the issues on the affidavit in attachment, and these issues were tried by the court. A jury was impaneled to try the issue on the interplea. Upon the hearing of that issue the jury found a verdict in favor of the interpleader. The court found for the plaintiff in the action of assumpsit and assessed his damages at $288.81. Upon the issue as to the attachment the finding of the court was for the defendant. A judgment having been rendered upon the verdict of the jury finding Wilbur Gehres to be the owner of the stock of merchandise, the 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

plaintiff in the attachment suit and defendant in the interplea duly excepted, and has perfected his appeal direct to this court on the ground that the constitutionality of the act of May 13, 1905, known as the "bulk-sales law" (Laws 1905, p. 284), is involved.

The statute the constitutionality of which is involved in this case is as follows:

"Sec. 1. That a sale of any portion of a stock of merchandise, otherwise than in the ordinary course of trade or in the regular and usual prosecution of the seller's business, or a sale of an entire stock of merchandise in gross, will be presumed to be fraudulent and void as against the creditors of the seller unless the seller and purchaser shall, at least five days before the sale, make a full and detailed inventory showing the quantity, and, so far as possible, with the exercise of reasonable diligence, the cost price, to the seller, of each article to be included in the sale; and unless such purchaser shall, at least five days before the sale, in good faith, make full and explicit inquiries of the seller as to the names and places of residences or places of business of each and all of the creditors of the seller and the amount owing each creditor; and unless the purchaser shall, at least five days before the sale, in good faith, notify or cause to be notified, personally or by registered mail, each of the seller's creditors of whom the purchaser has knowledge, or can, with the exercise of reasonable diligence, acquire knowledge, of said proposed sale and of the said cost price of the merchandise to be sold and of the price proposed to be paid therefor by the purchaser. The seller shall, at least five days before such sale, fully and truthfully answer in writing each and all said inquiries.

"Sec. 2. Except as especially provided in this act, nothing therein contained nor any act thereunder, shall change or affect the present rules of evidence or the present presumptions of law."

The court below held the above statute unconstitutional, and refused to allow the appellant to prove that the sale in question had been made without complying with the provisions of said act.

The facts in this case are not in dispute. Della I. Morehead borrowed $500 from the First National Bank of Lincoln, Illinois, with which she bought a small stock of groceries and engaged in the retail grocery business. She became indebted to Off & Company, of Peoria, for merchandise, to the amount of $288.81. Her business appears to have been unsuccessful. She sold her entire stock of goods to Wilbur Gehres. An invoice of the stock was taken, and it was found that the stock was worth, at cost prices, $296. Gehres paid her for the stock $260. A horse and delivery wagon valued at $100 were included in the sale, bringing the total sale price up to $360. Gehres paid for the property by a check. Appellee applied the whole amount of the check on her note of $500 to the bank. Appellee testifies that she found her business was unprofitable, and that she desired to apply the proceeds of the merchandise on her debts, as far as the same would go. Appellee had mortgaged her homestead for the $500 which she borrowed of the bank.

There is no contention that the sale of the stock of merchandise was fraudulent in fact. Appellant's sole contention is that the sale was made in violation of the bulk-sales law, above set out, and for that reason it must be held fraudulent and void as to the creditors of appellee.

Messrs. Winslow Evans and George J. Jochem for appellant.

Mr. A. D. Cadwallader for appellee.

Vickers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The constitutionality of this statute is challenged on the ground that it is in conflict with §§ 1 and 2 of the Bill of Rights. These sections are as follows:

"Sec. 1. All men are by nature free and independent, and have certain inherent and inalienable rights. Among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. To secure these rights and the protection of property, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

"Sec. 2. No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

The statute in question singles out a particular class of persons, and imposes burdens upon them from which all other classes are exempt. The persons thus affected are deprived of both liberty and property, in that they are not permitted to contract in respect to a particular kind of property subject to the same laws that are applicable to all other classes of property. The privilege of contracting is both a liberty and a property right, and a law which deprives a man or a class of the right to acquire and enjoy property upon the same terms and in the same manner permitted to the community at large is in violation of the constitutional rights of the persons affected by such law. of private individuals or classes of individuals. Millett v. People, 117 Ill. 294, 57 Am. Rep. 869, 7 N. E. 631; Frorer v. People, supra. The legislature undoubtedly has the constitutional power to enact laws which, by reason of peculiar circumstances, may affect some persons or classes of persons only; but in such instances the class of persons upon whom the law is to operate must possess some common disability, attribute, or qualification, or must occupy some condition marking them as proper objects for the operation of special or class legislation. Gillespie v. People, 188 Ill. 176, 52 L.R.A. 283, 80 Am. St. Rep. 176, 58 N. E. 1007; Harding v. People, 160 Ill. 459, 32 L.R.A. 445, 52 Am. St. Rep. 344, 43 N. E. 624; Ruhstrat v. People, 185 Ill. 133, 49 L.R.A. 181, 76 Am. St. Rep. 30, 57 N. E. 41; Starne v. People, 222 Ill. 189, 113 Am. St. Rep. 389, 78 N. E. 61. The general principle running through all the cases is that a statute which arbitrarily selects a class of individuals and subjects them to peculiar rules or imposes upon them special obligations or burdens from which other persons are exempt is unconstitutional. In the language of Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, 6th ed. 481-483: "Everyone has a right to demand that he be governed by general rules; and a special statute which without his consent singles his case out as one to be regulated by a different law from that which is applied in all similar cases would not be legitimate legislation, but would be such an arbitrary mandate as is not within the province of free government."

Meadowcroft v. People, 163 Ill. 56, 35 L.R.A. 176, 54 Am. St. Rep. 447, 45 N. E. 303, was a prosecution under the act for the protection of bank depositors, which provided, among other things, that the "failure, suspension, or involuntary liquidation of the banker, broker, banking company, or incorporated bank within thirty days from and after the time of receiving such deposit, shall be prima facie evidence of an intent to defraud, on the part of such banker, broker, or officer of such banking company or incorporated bank." In that case the constitutionality of the statute was assailed on the ground that it was special legislation in that it established a rule of evidence applicable only to a particular class of persons. That contention was answered by this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Baker, by pointing out that the business of banking is not juris privati, but is, like that of an innkeeper or common carrier, affected with the public interest, and therefore subject to public regulation; and the law was sustained on the ground that there was manifest reason and necessity for protecting the community in their dealings with persons engaged in the banking business that do not exist with respect to their transactions with those employed in "the ordinary agricultural, manufacturing, merchandising, and mining pursuits." The only persons affected by this statute are persons who own "stocks of merchandise," and persons who may purchase a portion of such stock of merchandise in some manner other than in the ordinary course of business, or the entire stock of merchandise in gross. The words "stock of merchandise," in this statute, are used in the common and ordinary acceptance of those terms, and mean the goods or chattels which a merchant holds for sale, and are equivalent to "stock in trade" as ordinarily used and understood among merchants and tradesmen. The title of this act indicates its purpose to be the prevention of sales of merchandise in fraud of creditors. It cannot be seriously contended that a creditor of a merchant occupies a position of such peculiar public concern that the passage of this act can be justified because of the inability of creditors of merchants to take care of themselves upon an equal footing with creditors of persons engaged in other lines of business. There is, furthermore, no reason pointed out, and none suggests itself to us, why sales of stocks of merchandise should be placed under the protection of a special statute imposing onerous restrictions and conditions upon both seller and buyer from which persons dealing in all other classes of property are exempt. This law has no application to a sale by a manufacturer of all his machinery, tools, finished articles, and raw material; or by a farmer of all his live stock, farm implements, crops grown or growing, and household goods; or by a hotel keeper of his entire business and all the property therein; or by a livery or transfer company of all its rolling stock, harness, and horses owned and used in the business; or by a publisher of all his presses and printing machinery and appliances; or by a mine owner of all the property owned and used in the mining business; or to a sale by a miller who may sell his business, mill machinery, and the grain and its products on hand. On behalf of these and all others, the law indulges the presumption of honesty and fair intentions in making sales, either in or out of the ordinary course of business, with or without an inventory, and in bulk or by parts and parcels. If sales made of the various classes of property above referred to are presumed to be fair and honest, it is difficult to see why a sale of a stock of merchandise under similar conditions should be presumed to be fraudulent and void. There is no such actual, substantial difference between the members of the class of individuals upon whom this statute is intended to operate and the owners of other kinds of property as to warrant the legislature in passing an act applicable only to persons dealing in stocks of merchandise. The act in question is therefore special class legislation, which is prohibited by the Constitution of 1870.

Statutes bearing more or less similarity to the one now under consideration have been enacted in a number of other states. The validity of these statutes appears to have been questioned in the courts of last resort in eight states and one territory. These courts have reached widely different results. Thus, in John P. Squire & Co. v. Tellier, 185 Mass. 18, 102 Am. St. Rep. 322, 69 N. E. 312, Walp v. Moar, 76 Conn. 515, 57 Atl. 277, Neas v. Borches, 109 Tenn. 398, 97 Am. St. Rep. 851, 71 S. W. 50, McDaniels v. J. J. Connelly Shoe Co. 30 Wash. 549, 60 L.R.A. 947, 94 Am. St. Rep. 889, 71 Pac. 37, and Williams v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 15 Okla. 477, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 334, 82 Pac. 490, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 970, statutes of the same general character as the one here involved have been held constitutional; while in Block v. Schwartz, 27 Utah, 387, 65 L.R.A. 308, 101 Am. St. Rep. 971, 76 Pac. 22, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 550, McKinster v. Sager, 163 Ind. 671, 68 L.R.A. 273, 106 Am. St. Rep. 268, 72 N. E. 854, Miller v. Crawford, 70 Ohio St. 207, 71 N. E. 631, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 558, and Wright v. Hart, 182 N. Y. 330, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 338, 75 N. E. 404, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 263, the opposite conclusion was reached and the statutes declared unconstitutional. We do not regard the question involved here as one to be determined upon the weight of authority outside of this state. We have so often expressed our views in regard to the clause of our Constitution now under consideration that its interpretation is settled by the previous decisions of this court too firmly to be departed from out of regard for opposing views in other states, however highly we may esteem them. Without regard to the question of the weight to be given to the conflicting decisions of other courts upon the question now in hand, we think the reasoning of those courts which have held such statutes unconstitutional on the ground upon which we rest our judgment in this case are more in harmony with the views of this court as expressed in the numerous cases than are the reasons which are given by those other courts in which a different result has been reached.

Our conclusion is that the act in question is void in its entirety. It follows, therefore, that the court below committed no error in refusing the evidence offered to prove that the sale in question was not made in accordance with its provisions.

The judgment of the County Court of Logan County will be affirmed.

WILLIAM G. CLARKE, Plff. in Err.,

v.

MARY E. LYON et al.

(—Neb. —, 118 N. W. 472.)

Divorce — custody of children — jurisdiction.

1. Where the court of a sister state has granted a divorce and awarded the temporary custody of the children to the mother, who becomes a resident of this state and dies here, leaving such children in the hands of relatives who are appointed guardians by the county court, the fact that the court ren-Headnotes by CALKINS, C.

Case Note. — Effect of death of parent to whom custody of child was awarded upon rights of surviving parent.

In Re Robinson, 17 Abb. Pr. 399, note, it was held that, upon the death of the mother, to whom the custody of the children had been awarded in divorce proceedings, the father's rights over the children were restored; and he was entitled to their care and custody.

In Schammel v. Schammel, 105 Cal. 258, 38 Pac. 729, it was held that, where a decree of divorce awarded the custody of a minor child to the mother, and ordered the father to pay every month a certain sum of money to the mother, "or to the legal guardian of said minor" for the support and education of the minor, the part of the decree here quoted was beyond the power of the court and without any legal effect, since, upon the death of the mother, the father again became entitled to the custody of the child, and he was then obligated to furnish such support as the law, and not the decree, imposed upon him.

In Re Blackburn, 41 Mo. App. 622, it was held that a decree of divorce which awarded the custody of the child to the mother did not operate as a conclusive bar to the father's right to the custody of the child for all time; that it had that effect as between him and his divorced wife only while she lived; that upon her death his right to the custody of the child again became paramount, and that such right could not be defeated by her dying request that the child should remain in the keeping of its grandparents.

In Re Neff, 20 Wash. 652, 56 Pac. 383, it was held that a deceased wife could not, by testamentary disposition, deprive the 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

dering such divorce retained jurisdiction for the purpose of making further orders does not deprive the courts of this state of jurisdiction to determine the merits of a controversy between the divorced father and such guardians for the custody of such children,—especially where the court rendering the divorce has expressly refused to itself determine the material question in issue.

Same — decree — effect.

2. Where a court granting a divorce without finding the father unfit temporarily awards the custody of minor children to the mother, such decree does not deprive the father of the natural right to the custody of such children against any person except the mother; and, upon her death, such right ceases to be affected by such award.

Guardian — appointment — effect.

3. The appointment of a guardian by a county court is not conclusive as against a parent's right to the custody of his children, unless it appears that he had notice of the proceeding, and that the question of his competency and suitability was adjudicated.

Parent — custody of children — fitness.

4. The unfitness which deprives a parent of the right to the custody of his children must be positive, and not comparative; and the mere fact that the children would be bet-father of the custody of his children, although during her lifetime their custody had been awarded to her in a divorce suit.

In McKinney v. Noble, 38 Tex. 195, it was held that, under a statute which declared that "the parents or the survivors of them . . . have a natural right and duty to take care of the persons of their minor children," the mother, to whom the custody of her minor child had been given by a decree of divorce, could not by will deprive the father of the guardianship of the person of his child.

But in Wilkinson v. Deming, 80 Ill. 342, 22 Am. Rep. 192, it was held that a decree of divorce which gave to the mother the absolute custody of a child took away, ipso facto, from the father all control thereafter over the child until restored by the action of the proper court; and the court, on the application of the father after the death of the mother, refused to give him the custody of the child, the deceased mother having by will appointed a testamentary guardian of the child, who was not shown to be an unfit person, there being in existence at that time a statute giving to a mother, when sole, the power to make such a testamentary disposition of her child.

In Re Steele, 107 Mo. App. 567, 81 S. W. 1182, upon habeas corpus after the death of the father, the court refused to give a female child to its mother, it appearing that the father had procured a divorce from the mother on the ground of adultery; that the custody of the child had been awarded to the father, who took her to the home of his married sister, the respondent, to be cared for, protected, and educated, and that the mother had married her paramour and was living with him.

ter nurtured or cared for by a stranger is not sufficient to deprive the parent of his right to their custody.

Same — how determined.

5. While the unfitness which deprives a parent of his natural right to the custody of his children must be positive, and not comparative, the degree thereof must be considered in relation to the attending circumstances, such as the concern he has shown for them in the past, the suitability of his domestic surroundings to receive them, and the question of their general welfare.

ERROR to the District Court for Lancaster County to review a judgment denying an application for a writ of habeas corpus against Mary E. Lyon and H. E. Wood to secure possession of certain children. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Carlos J. Ward and Halleck F. Rose, for plaintiff in error:

Upon the death of the parent in custody of children, the surviving parent has a right to present his claim to their custody, and the deceased parent has no right to appoint a testamentary guardian.

Messrs. G. A. Adams and L. F. Mason also for defendants in error.

Calkins, C., filed the following opinion:

This was a petition for a writ of habeas corpus by William G. Clarke to obtain possession of his two minor children. The petitioner was married to Anna Carpenter Lyon in 1885 in the state of Illinois, where they lived together as husband and wife until the year 1899, when they separated. In 1901 the petitioner began a suit in the circuit court of Cook county, Illinois, against his wife, Anna, for a divorce on the ground of desertion. In this suit the wife filed an answer and cross bill, praying for a divorce from her husband on the ground of desertion on his part. A decree was entered granting her a divorce upon such cross bill, and she was awarded, until the further order of the court, the custody of the two surviving children of said marriage, both boys, Holly L., born March 17, 1887, and Caryl C., born May 18, 1897.

It seems that the wife, Anna, was possessed of an estate in her own right sufficient for the support of herself and children; and, beyond the husband's releasing any marital claims to which he was entitled in her lands, no adjudication of property rights was made between the parties. The wife, with the two boys, removed to Lincoln, in this state, where she resided until her death, December 21, 1906. From the time of the divorce until her death she supported herself and the two boys without any assistance from their father. The petitioner, very soon after the rendition of the decree of divorce, married a second wife, Adelaide, with whom he lived until about six months before the commencement of this proceeding, and by whom he had a son, Myron, who was at the time of the taking of the evidence in this case about four years old. The respondent Lyon and the wife of the respondent Wood were half sisters of Anna Carpenter Clarke; and, while the latter left no will, she, upon her deathbed, expressed the wish that Mr. and Mrs. Wood should have the custody of the children. The respondent, Lyon, who, it is claimed, resided in Waukegan, Illinois, came to Lincoln about the time of the death of the mother, and together with Mr. and Mrs. Wood took charge of the children. On the 4th day of January, 1907, the petitioner obtained an order in the original divorce suit from the circuit court of Cook county, Illinois, awarding him the permanent custody and care of said children. Upon the intervention of certain relatives of the children to set aside this order, the court, on the 11th day of February, 1907, entered an order in said case vacating the order awarding the custody of the children to their mother, and granting the father leave to take any proper steps in any court of competent jurisdiction to obtain their custody, the court expressly declining to determine whether the petitioner was or was not a fit person to have the custody of said children as against the persons with whom they were then domiciled. Upon obtaining the order of January 4, 1907, the petitioner immediately notified the respondents by letter of the making thereof; and they, on January 7th, filed a petition in the county court of Lancaster county, and obtained an order appointing themselves guardians of the person and estate of the said children. No notice of the proceeding before the county judge was given the father.

On February 20, 1907, the petitioner began this proceeding, his application setting forth his relationship to the children, the rendition of the decree of divorce, the subsequent modification thereof, and alleging that the said children were unlawfully restrained of their liberty. For answer to this application the respondents alleged their appointment as guardians, asserted their competency to properly discharge such trust, and charged that the petitioner "is not a suitable person to take care of and have the custody of said children, and that the welfare of said children would be better preserved if they were not placed in his care and custody." They added as special reasons for his unfitness that he was "possessed of a quarrelsome character and violent temper, and that he was addicted to the excessive use of intoxicating liquors."

There was a trial to the court upon the issues so tendered, and the writ was denied, from which finding and judgment of the court the petitioner appeals.

1. The petitioner contends that the court where the divorce suit was tried maintains jurisdiction of the parties for the purpose of changing the decree as to the custody of the children, and that they remain the wards of the court, so that, upon the death of the party to whom their custody was awarded, that court may grant custody to the surviving parent. This may be true where the parties interested remain within the jurisdiction of the court granting the divorce; but it is not applicable to the facts in this case. The mother lawfully brought the children to this state, and lawfully acquired a residence here. Upon her death the children remain within this jurisdiction, whose courts alone have power to enforce an order as to their custody; and, while such courts should give full faith and credit to the judgment of the circuit court of Cook county, we do not think they are required to enforce the order of January 4, 1907. This order was made after the death of the mother, and without any notice to the persons with whom the children were then domiciled. It is apparent that the court regarded the order as made without jurisdiction, and void; for when, on February 11th, its attention was called to the fact that the mother was dead and the children were not within its jurisdiction, it, acting as though the order of January 4th had never been made, proceeded to set aside the order awarding the custody of the children to the mother, and gave the father leave to take proper legal steps in any court of competent jurisdiction to obtain their custody and control, expressly declining to pass upon the question of his fitness for such custody. It is plain that the court did not regard the order of January 4th as in force; and, if it were in force up to that time, it was modified by the order of February 11th.

2. The respondents contend that the award of the custody of the children to the mother gave her control of them not only during her life, but invested her with a power to dispose of them at her death. This contention cannot be maintained. There was no finding that the father was unfit to have the custody of these children; and the award of such custody to the mother until the further order of the court was only a finding that, as between the father and mother, the interests of the children would be best served by committing them to the care of the mother for the time being. Her death not only removes the reason for this award of custody, but renders its execution impossible, so that the right of the father to the custody of the children is no longer affected by such decree.

3. It is claimed on behalf of the respondents that the order appointing them guardians of the minor children was an adjudication of the father's right to the custody of their persons. Whatever may be the effect of this order so far as the estate of the minor children is concerned, it would not of itself give the right of custody of the persons of the children against a parent who had no notice and whose rights were not adjudicated. The question of his competence and suitability would remain to be adjudicated. Re Thomsen, 1 Neb. (Unof.) 751, 95 N. W. 805.

4. Upon the question of the fitness of the father, the finding of the district court was that the petitioner could not "provide for said children, or rear them in as proper and fitting a manner as can the respondents." The oldest boy, having been born in March, 1887, has attained his majority, and this controversy no longer concerns him. It is conceded that the respondents are so situated as to give excellent care to the boy Caryl, now ten years old, and no criticism is made of the manner in which he is being nurtured and educated, nor of the environment in which he is placed. In fact, it is tacitly admitted that his present surroundings are better than his father is able to offer; but it is earnestly insisted that the disqualification which deprives a parent of the custody of his child must be of a positive, and not of a comparative, character. Upon this question we can do no better than to quote from the opinion of Irvine, C., in the case of Norval v. Zinsmaster, 57 Neb. 158, 73 Am. St. Rep. 500, 77 N. W. 373. He there says: "We are aware that this court has several times asserted that in such controversies as the present the order should be made with sole reference to the best interests of the child. But this has been broad language 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

applied to special cases. The court has never deprived a parent of the custody of a child merely because on financial or other grounds a stranger might better provide. The statute declares and nature demands that the right shall be in the parent, unless the parent be affirmatively unfit. The statute does not make the judges the guardians of all the children in the state, with power to take them from their parents, so long as the latter discharge their duties to the best of their ability, and give them to strangers because such strangers may be better able to provide what is already well provided. If that were the law, it would be soon changed by revolution, if necessary. In Sturtevant v. State, 15 Neb. 459, 48 Am. Rep. 349, 19 N. W. 617, the child was only a few months old, and the custody was taken from the father because he was unable personally to discharge duties which the custody imposed. Giles v. Giles, 30 Neb. 624, 46 N. W. 916, was a controversy between father and mother, where the natural rights were equal. State ex rel. Filbert v. Schroeder, 37 Neb. 571, 56 N. W. 307, and Schroeder v. State, 41 Neb. 745, 60 N. W. 89, presented a case of affirmative unfitness of the father and of abandonment of the child."

5. The respondents insist that the petitioner is an unsuitable and unfit person to have the care of this child, and that the evidence, not only would have justified the district court in so finding, but that the same is of such a character as to sustain no other conclusion. It appears that at the time of the petitioner's marriage with his wife, Anna, he was a clergyman of the Presbyterian Church. He afterwards served for several years as pastor of the Campbell Park Presbyterian Church in Chicago, and from there went to the People's Institute, which at that time seems to have been the nucleus of a social settlement under the patronage of Bishop Fallows. This enterprise did not long sustain its benevolent character, and the petitioner in some way became the owner of the property in which it was carried on, and thereafter devoted the same to secular uses. The building contained a theater, a hotel, a dance hall, and several stores which were rented for various purposes, including a saloon and restaurant. The petitioner occupied rooms in the hotel part of this building, and his business consisted in managing the property. He still resided there at the time of the beginning of this proceeding; but about the 20th of March, 1907, he rented a house on Irving avenue, and installed his married sister, whom he brought from Louisiana for that purpose, as housekeeper. At this time he was separated from his wife, Adelaide, and there was pending a suit by her to obtain a divorce on the ground of habitual drunkenness. On the whole, it may be conceded that the petitioner had a suitable residence and was of sufficient financial ability to undertake the support of his children. Upon the question of his intemperance, without citing the evidence at large, it fully sustains the charge that the petitioner became so addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors as to greatly shock and distress his friends who had known him while officiating as a clergyman; and, after making due allowance for the special aversion which such conduct in an ex-clergyman would inspire, we are constrained to say that it went so far that it would have compromised the character of one who had always been engaged in secular pursuits. The petitioner did not himself testify as a witness, but there is found in the record his answer to the bill of his wife, Adelaide, for a divorce on the ground of habitual drunkenness. In that answer, verified by him on the 29th day of October, 1906, he made the old plea that "he was tempted of the woman." He says that, before he associated with her, he was personally and professionally opposed on principle to the use of intoxicating liquors; that after coming under her influence he indulged in their moderate use; that he never drank to the extent of being unfit to attend to business; and that, when he drank on rare occasions more liquor "than was wise, it was almost invariably under the sting of her abuse." This answer, read in the light of the positive evidence of witnesses as to his drinking habits, though perhaps insufficient to establish the existence of habitual drunkenness in the strictest of all the varying shades of interpretation applied by the courts to that term, yet indicates a considerable deterioration in the moral force and character of the petitioner which to a degree unfits him for the care and nurture of his child. During the time the children were in the custody of the mother he does not appear to have contributed to their maintenance, nor to have given them any parental attention. He was compelled to surrender their custody, and, the mother being able to support them, the fact that he did not voluntarily assist her should not of itself be taken as evidence of a want of affection on his part; but there are many attentions which a loving father may and usually does render to children beyond his custody and control, and these appear to have been entirely lacking in this case, which indicates a slight degree of affection and a want of parental care for these children on the part of the petitioner. As we have already seen, the unfitness of the parent which deprives him of the absolute right to the custody of children must be positive and not comparative; but this does not mean 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the degree of unfitness may not be considered in connection with all the other circumstances of the case. And, so considering the present situation of the child, the father's former indifference to him, his intemperate habits, and the unsettled state of his domestic affairs, we cannot say the district court erred in denying the writ prayed for.

As this conclusion is partially based upon the petitioner's intemperate habits and the disturbed state of his domestic atmosphere, both of which are susceptible of amendment and improvement, it is proper to say that the dismissal of the writ is not a bar to a future application of like character, should changed conditions justify a different conclusion.

We therefore recommend that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

Fawcett and Root, CC., concur.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

HARRY B. DAVIS, Respt.,
v.

WILLIAM ROSENZWEIG REALTY OPERATING COMPANY, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(192 N. Y. 128, 84 N. E. 943.)

Sale — rescission — lien for payment.

1. After rescission for fraud of an executory contract for purchase of land the vendee has no lien upon the land for the amount of his advance payment.

Equity — rescission — personal judgment.

2. One defrauded into a contract for the purchase of land may maintain a bill in equity for rescission of the contract, and secure full relief, including a decree for return of money paid on the contract.

(Gray, Hiscock, and Chase, JJ., dissents.)

(May 19, 1908.)

Case Note. — Right of vendee under executory contract to a lien on the land for the amount paid thereon where the contract fails or is rescinded.

Generally, in both this country and England, a vendee of land by executory contract is entitled to an equitable lien thereon for the amount paid on the purchase price, where the contract fails because of some act or conduct of the vendor or his inability to perform it. The exact nature of this lien is not clear. The doctrine has been quite APPPEAL by the defendant corporation from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term, Part III., for New York County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to rescind a contract and recover the amount which had been paid thereon. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Benjamin N. Cardozo, with Mr. Herbert H. Maass, for appellant:

The vendee's election to rescind the contract was an abandonment of his lien.

Kerr, Fraud & Mistake, 3d ed. 338, 339; Bigelow, Fr. pp. 415, 416; Yeomans v. Bell, 151 N. Y. 230, 45 N. E. 552; Schiffer v. Dietz, 83 N. Y. 300; Moller v. Tuska, 87 N. Y. 166; Terry v. Munger, 121 N. Y. 161, 8 L.R.A.

generally applied without any discussion as to the nature of the lien, except, perhaps, the statement in general terms that it was an equitable lien, very similar to that of a vendor for unpaid purchase money.

In view of the distinction made in DAVIS v. WILLIAM ROSENZWEIG REALTY OPERATING Co. the nature of the lien becomes a matter of some importance. This distinction is emphasized by the decision of that court in Elterman v. Hyman, 192 N. Y. 113, 84 N. E. 937, decided at the same time as the DAVIS CASE. In the former case, the right of a vendee to a lien on failure of the vendor to convey because of defective title was recognized and applied where the action was to enforce the lien, and was in its nature an affirmance of the contract. And it is on this ground that the case is distinguished in the DAVIS CASE, wherein the vendee sought to rescind the contract for the fraud of the vendor, and also sought, as an incident to such relief, a lien on the subject-matter of the contract for the amount paid on the purchase price.

The dissenting opinion thereto, by Judge Gray, is based on the theory that such a lien is decreed independently of the contract, although that furnishes the reason for it, establishes the relation of the parties, and is the evidence of their agreement. He contends that the lien of both vendor and vendee is purely the creation of equity, and is, except as stated, entirely independent of the contract. Hence, he argues that there is no distinction in principle between the DAVIS CASE and the Elterman Case.

But see Garrett v. Cohen, 117 N. Y. Supp. 129, wherein this distinction was also recognized.

Without engaging in the controversy as to whether the lien of a vendor or vendee ordinarily arises out of and is dependent upon the contract, or whether entirely independent of it, it is suggested that the majority opinion on this question might apply in the ordinary case of the failure or inability of the vendor to comply with his contract, and yet not be applicable to the state of facts presented in the DAVIS CASE. In such a case, although there is no direct authority for the proposition, yet it is suggested that no principle of equity jurisdiction or power would be violated if it was held that the act of the vendor in procuring, by fraudulent representations, money of the vendee to be applied upon a contract for the purchase of specific realty, created a right or interest in or over that specific property which equity could lay hold of, and by means of which relief by way of rescission could be made efficient.

The conclusion of the majority was based on the theory that a vendee's lien arose out of, and was incident to, the contract of purchase, and depended for its existence upon the vitality of the contract; and hence, when the contract fell by its rescission, all rights derived therefrom by either party fell with it.

The decision itself is opposed to the great weight of authority wherein the doctrine of a lien in favor of either vendor or vendee is recognized, and it also seems to be opposed to the majority of the cases that have considered the nature of a vendee's lien. If not opposed to the doctrine of the following cases, it, at least, makes an exception not recognized in any of them.

Thus, in Pilcher v. Smith, 2 Head, 208, in allowing a purchaser a lien for the purchase money paid on a contract with a married woman void because of her coverture, the court said that, the contract being void, it authorized a decree of rescission; and, as incident to the latter relief, it was clearly competent to declare a lien upon the land conveyed thereby to secure the repayment of the purchase money.

Sir Thomas Clarke, in Burgess v. Wheate, 1 W. Bl. 150, thus stated the rule as to both the vendor and the vendee: "Where conveyance is made prematurely, before money paid, the money is considered as a lien on that estate in the hands of the vendee. So, where money was paid prematurely, the money would be considered as a lien on the estate in the hands of the vendor for the personal representatives of the purchaser."

A vendee is not entitled to a lien in the absence of some special equity rendering the enforcement of such a lien essential for his protection.

Klim v. Sachs, 102 App. Div. 44, 92 N. Y. Supp. 107; Occidental Realty Co. v. Palmer, supra; Krainin v. Coffey, 119 App. Div.

And in Occidental Realty Co. v. Palmer, 117 App. Div. 505, 102 N. Y. Supp. 648 (affirmed in 192 N. Y. 588, 85 N. E. 1113, without opinion, on authority of Elterman v. Hyman, supra), the court said that, upon the execution of the contract, the vendor became a trustee of the land for the purchase of it, retaining a lien for the purchase price, and the vendee became the equitable owner of the land; and that, under such circumstances, the vendee's lien for moneys paid on account of the purchase was a natural and necessary corollary.

So, in sustaining the right of a vendee to a lien, in Everett v. Mansfield, 78 C. C. A. 188, 148 Fed. 374, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 956, the court said that the right to a lien was based on the well-known, fundamental rule that in equity what is agreed to be done is regarded as done; therefore, from the time a contract is made for the purchase of real estate, the vendor is in a certain sense a trustee for the purchaser, and the purchaser in a certain sense is regarded as the real owner of the land, so that each, under the ordinary equitable rules, has a lien for his protection; adding that the whole practice in equity with reference to such contracts was clearly on the basis that the parties were under mutual equitable obligations to each other.

It will be noted that all of the foregoing theories as to the character of a vendee's lien are based either on the theory of an equity arising from payment under the circumstances, or on an implied or quasi contract created by partial or complete payment, or on an implied trust arising in the same manner. The text writers also present, in substance, similar theories as to the character of the lien. Thus, Pomeroy says that such a lien is the exact counterpart of the grantors, that it is a security for so much of the purchase price as the vendee has paid, and for the performance by the vendor of his contract. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. § 1263.

Judge Story says that, on receipt of a portion of the purchase money, the vendor becomes a trustee for the vendee for the amount so paid, who has a lien upon the land therefor. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 13th ed. p. 551.

These different theories, however, are not inconsistent with Elterman v. Hyman, supra. Indeed, they are there recognized and stated. Thus, it is there said that, "as the vendor has a lien because he owned the land but conveyed prematurely, and the vendee ought not to keep it without paying for it, so, as it seems to me, the vendee has a lien because he has paid for the land pursuant to contract, and, as he cannot get the land, he has a right to get out what he put in on the faith of the land. The lien springs from the trust under which the vendor, as the legal owner, holds the land for the vendee, the equitable owner. Part payment creates partial ownership, and the vendee has an interest in the land itself to the extent of the payments made thereon. The contract and payment in full make him the equitable owner of all the land. The contract and payment in part make him the equitable owner pro tanto. . . . The right is correlative to that of the vendor conveying without payment. In either case the res, or the subject of the contract, is the land, and whatever is paid on the land without corresponding conveyance, or conveyed without corresponding payment, is a lien on the land by virtue of parting with money on the faith of the land, or with land on the faith of the promise to pay for it. Payment is not made on the credit of the vendor, but on the credit of the land, and the purchaser's money, in equity, is converted into land, or attached to it as a lien. The equitable ownership, when specific performance cannot be had, is converted into money by a judicial sale of the vendor's interest, which in effect is the foreclosure of an equitable mortgage."

The doctrine of DAVIS v. WILLIAM ROSENZWEIG REALTY OPERATING CO. is also in apparent conflict with the doctrine enunciated in Whitbread v. Watt [1902] 1 Ch. 835, cited in the DAVIS CASE, by Justice Gray in his dissenting opinion. In this case a contract for the sale of real estate was terminated by the purchaser exercising a power of rescission reserved to him therein without any act or default by the vendor. The exact question passed upon in the DAVIS CASE was not discussed, although apparently raised by counsel. The question that seemed the most serious to the court, and which received much comment, was whether a rescission, by the vendee taking advantage of a clause in a contract authorizing a rescission, gave him the same right to a lien that he would have had he rescinded because of some act or default of the vendor. The court reached the conclusion that in either event the vendee had a lien upon the property for such part of the purchase price as he had paid. This conclusion was based upon the general nature of the vendee's lien. As to such a lien, Vaughan Williams, L. J., said: "The lien which a purchaser has for his deposit is not the result of any express contract; it is a right which may be said to have been invented for the purpose of doing justice. It is a fiction of a kind which is sometimes resorted to at law as well as in equity." On the same point, Stirling, L. J., said: "If we look at that which is really the foundation of the doctrine, namely, the desire to do justice as between vendor and purchaser, it appears to me that that reason applies no less forcibly in the present case than in the ordinary case in which the rescission of the contract takes place by reason of some default on the part of the vendor. In a case in which the vendor had rescinded under a power reserved to him, it would, I think, be absolute injustice if the purchaser were not allowed to have a lien for the purchase money which he had paid, and which was the security on his part for the performance by him of the contract. I think also the justice of the case requires that the purchaser should have a lien when the contract reserves to him a power to rescind."

The same may be said of Rose v. Watson, 10 Jur. N. S. 297, which sustained the right of a purchaser of land by executory contract to a lien, he having refused to carry out the contract on the ground that the vendor had failed to do certain things which he had agreed to do, and which were the inducement to the contract. In reaching this conclusion the Lord Chancellor said: "When the owner of an estate contracts with the purchaser for the sale of it, or even for the immediate sale of it, the ownership of the estate is, in equity, transferred by that contract. Where the contract undoubtedly is an executory contract in this sense, viz., that the ownership of the estate is transferred, subject to the payment of the purchase money, every portion of the purchase money paid in pursuance of that contract is a part performance of the contract, executes it, and, to the extent of the purchase money so paid, does in equity finally transfer to the purchaser the ownership of a corresponding portion of the estate." The contention was made by the assignee of the vendor that the proceeding by the purchaser amounted to a rescission by him of the contract, and therefore he ought not to have the benefit of the lien created thereby. The court, however, denied this contention, but on the ground that the proceeding by the purchaser to enforce the lien was not a rescission of the contract. On this point the Lord Chancellor said: "It is quite a mistake, and a misapplication of the word to say that the purchaser has rejected or put an end to the contract. The purchaser would have been willing to perform the contract if the vendor had performed those things which in good faith he was bound to do; and it is impossible to say, with any truth or accuracy of expression, that the purchaser has repudiated the contract because the vendor has been unable to redeem his own promises which faithfully he had pledged, and in dependence upon which the purchaser entered into the contract. It only gives, in point of fact, an additional ground of complaint to the purchaser that he cannot obtain the estate he contracted for, and that, being unable to obtain it by reason of the failure of the vendor, the loss to him is attempted to be aggravated by depriving him of the only means of acquiring the repayment of his money,—the vendor having become bankrupt,—viz., by following the interests which, in respect of the payment of that money, he had acquired in the estate."

In all reason and justice, therefore, and in all principle, it is impossible to find anything to countenance this attempt on the part of the assignees of the vendor, who stand in the shoes of the vendor, to deprive the purchaser of a lien on the estate.'

The foregoing cases, although using language that indicates that a purchaser's lien is an equitable right created in the property by the payment of money under a valid contract of purchase and not dependent upon the contract itself, but rather an incident to the giving of relief thereunder by way of reimbursement, do not, however, apply the doctrine to a similar state of facts as was presented in the DAVIS CASE which, as already stated, involved a rescission because of the fraud of the vendor.

In the following cases, however, although the question was not discussed, and the general rule was applied without noting the distinction made in the DAVIS CASE, the right of a vendee in an executory contract for the purchase of land to rescind it for the fraud of the vendor, and enforce a reimbursement of the money paid by him on the purchase price by a lien on the property and its foreclosure, was sustained: Davis v. Heard, 44 Miss. 50; Cooper v. Merritt, 30 Ark. 686; Gayle v. Troutman, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 718, 103 S. W. 342; Elliott v. Boaz, 9 Ala. 772 (vendee was held entitled to possession of the land purchased until reimbursement, and for a lien thereon for the amount paid).

The question was also presented in Mycok v. Beatson, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 384, wherein a purchaser of an interest in a partnership attempted to rescind the partnership contract on the ground of fraud, and the claim was made that the act of rescission put an end to the contract ab initio, and that therefore no benefit, even by way of a lien, could be had under it. While the court did not comment on this contention, the right to a lien on the partnership property under these circumstances was sustained.

In Hickson v. Lingold, 47 Ala. 449, it was said that, where fraudulent representations had been made in the sale of real estate by executory contract to the injury of the vendee, or the vendor was unable to make a good title, and in other cases not mentioned, the vendee might, without restoring the possession, file his bill within a reasonable time to rescind the sale, and enjoin the collection of the purchase money. The court said that in such cases a vendee was permitted to retain the possession as a security for the money paid, and to indemnify him for the necessary and permanent improvements made in good faith upon the premises. The facts in this case, however, are not within the scope of the note.

The right of a vendee to a lien upon real estate, the subject-matter of an executory contract of purchase, was also sustained in the following cases, where the rescission was not based on the fraud of the vendor, but on some other ground: Jett v. Locke, 5 J. J. Marsh, 591 (defect in title); Bullitt v. Eastern Kentucky Land Co. 99 Ky. 324, 36 S. W. 16 (defective title); Lyttle v. Davidson, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 2262, 67 S. W. 34 (oral contract void under statute of frauds); Chisenberry v. Wylie (Tenn. Ch. App.) 54 S. W. 49 (refusal of the vendor to convey according to his agreement, and also because of a defect in the title); Cleveland v. Bergen Bldg. & Improv. Co. (N. J. Ch.) 55 Atl. 117 (defect in title); Torrance v. Bolton, L. R. 14 Eq. 124.

On a bill filed by a vendee of an executory contract for the purchase of real estate for a specific performance, or as alternative relief to rescind, the doctrine was stated in McWilliams v. Jenkins, 72 Ala. 480, that, upon a rescission of such a contract, the court possessed the power, and it was also its duty, to secure the purchase price paid by the vendee by giving a lien, or creating a charge on the land for its repayment. The court added that this duty to protect the vendee by securing him in the reimbursement of purchase money advanced upon the faith of the contract, was well established in the system of equity procedure of that state, and Aday v. Echols, 18 Ala. 353, 52 Am. Dec. 225, was cited as authority. That case, however, was a bill by a vendee for specific performance. Such relief being denied, the court sustained the bill to give relief by way of compensation for improvements made, and reimbursement of the amount paid on the purchase price. This relief was given on the theory that whenever compensation is allowed, and specific performance denied, the land may be charged with the payment of the amount ascertained to be due to the vendee as against the vendor and his representatives.

In Galbraith v. Reeves, 82 Tex. 357, 18 S. W. 696, the vendee was allowed to cancel an executory contract for the purchase of real estate for defective title, and, as an incident to the rescission, was allowed to recover the amount paid on the purchase price, and was given a lien on the land to secure its repayment. This relief was also given on a bill by the vendor for specific performance.

A vendee's lien for the amount of the purchase price paid by him, if the vendee is entitled to rescind the contract, was said, in Dart v. McQuilty, 6 Ind. 391, to be subject in equity to execution.

On a bill by a vendee for specific performance for compensation and reimbursement as alternative relief, the doctrine was enunciated in Griffith v. Depew, 3 A. K. Marsh. 177, 13 Am. Dec. 141, that, on a rescission of a contract, the court will place the parties in statu quo as near as can equitably be done; that the vendor ought to refund the purchase money paid, with interest, and the vendee ought to restore the subject purchased with rents and payment for waste, receiving a credit for the valuable and lasting improvements he may make; and if, on such accounting, a sum be found due the vendee, the court said that a lien on the land purchased should be given him, and provision made for its foreclosure, should the vendor fail to pay the amount found due.

To the same effect on a bill to enjoin a judgment for breach of covenant and for specific performance is Funk v. McKeoun, 4 J. J. Marsh. 162.

A vendee's lien was enforced in Gibert v. Peteler, 38 N. Y. 165, 97 Am. Dec. 785, in a proceeding by the vendor to recover possession of land sold by executory contract 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

N. Y. 113, 84 N. E. 937, we held that a vendee of land under an executory contract for the purchase thereof has a lien on the land for the amount paid pursuant to the contract; that, when the vendee is without fault, and the vendor cannot give good title, the former may sue in equity for a foreclosure of his lien, and that the commencement of such an action is not a rescission of the contract, but an affirmation thereof to secure a right given thereby and by payment pursuant to its terms.

In that case no rescission was alleged or found. In this case, however, the plaintiff alleged that the vendor falsely represented to the vendee that "the bottom of said lots was not made ground, but natural ground;" that the vendee was deceived thereby and induced to sign the contract and pay the where specific performance was refused because of defect in the title, and, for this reason, on the application of the vendee, the contract was canceled and rescinded. The question as to the right of the lien was not discussed, the principal question being whether the lien extended to improvements made by the vendee while in possession.

Scott v. Griggs, 49 Ala. 185, held that, where the parties to a contract for the sale of real estate agree upon its rescission, the law implies no trust in favor of the vendee by way of lien, as a security for the purchase money paid by the vendee to the vendor before the rescission. Such a case is distinguished from one where a vendor goes into a court of chancery, and asks the rescission of a sale of lands upon grounds which would entitle the court to take jurisdiction. In such a case it is said that the rescission will not be allowed without requiring the vendor to return the purchase money to the vendee. This rule, the court said, rested upon the principle that a party who asks equity shall do equity.

But see Whitbread v. Watt, supra.

The general doctrine as to the right of a vendee to a lien was sustained in the following cases, wherein the lien was allowed on refusal specifically to enforce the contract of purchase: Clough v. Clough, 3 B. Mon. 64 (sale by vendor to subsequent purchaser with notice); Farmer v. Samuel, 4 Litt. 187, 14 Am. Dec. 106; Aday v. Echols, supra (failure by vendee to clearly establish terms of oral contract); Brown v. East, 5 T. B. Mon. 405 (doctrine stated); Swetsch v. Waskow, 37 Ill. App. 155 (refusal to convey); Stevenson v. Spratt, 3 Jones & S. 496 (defective title); Turner v. Marriott, L. R. 3 Eq. 744 (defective title).

The doctrine that the purchaser of real estate under an executory contract was entitled to a lien thereon for the purchase price, where a specific performance of the contract on the part of the vendor was impossible because of defects in his title, was applied in Westmacott v. Robins, 4 De G. F. & J. 390. The relief in this case was given on a supplemental bill to a bill for specific sum of $5,000 thereon. The complaint then continues as follows: "That, upon learning that the said representations aforesaid were untrue, the plaintiff demanded of the defendants the return of the said sum of $5,000 and a rescission of the agreement aforesaid, but the defendants refused and still refuse to pay the said sum or any part thereof, or to rescind said agreement." The relief demanded was "that the said agreement be rescinded by reason of the false and fraudulent representations aforesaid; that the defendants be adjudged to pay the sum of $5,000, with interest from February 23, 1905, and that the plaintiff be adjudged to have a lien" upon the said premises and a foreclosure of the same. The findings follow, in substance, the allegations of the complaint. The relief awarded was a rescission of the contract, the recovery of the $5,000 with interest from the date of payment, the establishment of a lien for the amount paid, the foreclosure thereof, and that upon a sale of the premises the money be brought into court; that the plaintiff be paid his $5,000 therefrom, and that he recover judgment for any deficiency. The complaint was dismissed without costs as to one of the defendants, who was held not to be a proper party. The appellate division unanimously affirmed upon the authority of Occidental Realty Co. v. Palmer, 117 App. Div. 507, 102 N. Y. Supp. 648. No question was raised by answer or during the trial as to the jurisdiction of the court, and neither party demanded a trial by jury. Both parties tried the case on the theory that, if the facts alleged in the complaint were established, the performance, wherein the purchaser asked that, if compensation for a defective title could not be ascertained and made, and the contract of purchase specifically enforced by giving him the benefit of such compensation, he be given a decree for the amount paid by him on the purchase price, and that it be adjudged a lien on the land.

The foregoing cases sustained a vendee's lien on a bill for specific performance where such relief was denied, but the cases were retained to give relief by way of compensation and reimbursement. They are not in conflict with the DAVIS CASE as the contract was clearly recognized. This may also be said of the following cases, wherein a vendee's lien was established and enforced in actions substantially similar in form to Elterman v. Hyman, supra, being in the nature of an action to establish and foreclose a lien for the amount of purchase price paid: Stults v. Brown, 112 Ind. 376, 2 Am. St. Rep. 190, 14 N. E. 230; Weiss v. Schweitzer, 47 Misc. 297, 95 N. Y. Supp. 923 (defective title); Thompkins v. Seely, 29 Barb. 212 (defective title); Craft v. Latourette, 62 N. J. Eq. 206, 49 Atl. 711 (defective title); Occidental Realty Co. v. Palmer, 117 App. Div. 505, 102 N. Y. Supp. 648 (defect in title); Selkir v. Klein, 50 Misc. 194, 100 N. Y. Supp. 449 (defect in title); Delano v. Saylor (Ky.) 113 S. W. 888 (defect in title); Urbach v. Pye, 55 Misc. 465, 105 N. Y. Supp. 143 (deficiency in the amount of land purchased); Stewart v. Wood, 63 Mo. 252 (vendor sold to subsequent purchaser with knowledge); Shirley v. Shirley, 7 Blackf. 452 (vendor sold to subsequent purchaser with notice); Townsend v. Vanderwerker, 160 U. S. 171, 40 L. ed. 383, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 258 (subsequent encumbrance); Ungrich v. Shaff, 119 App. Div. 843, 105 N. Y. Supp. 1013 (stated); Clark v. Jacobs, 56 How. Pr. 519 (doctrine stated); Payne v. Atterbury, 11arr. Ch. (Mich.) 414 (stated); Benson v. Shotwell, 87 Cal. 49, 25 Pac. 249 (stated).

The doctrine was applied on a bill by a vendee to create and foreclose a lien for the amount paid by him in services on an executory contract to purchase, on the ground that the vendor made further performance impossible, in Wickman v. Robinson, 14 Wis. 494, 80 Am. Dec. 789. But the vendee, in his complaint, expressly stated that he had never consented to a rescission of the contract, and would not until his claim was paid.

The same result was reached in Coleman v. Floyd, 131 Ind. 330, 31 N. E. 75, where the doctrine was enunciated that a vendee who pays money to the vendor on a contract for the conveyance of land may, by action for that purpose, enforce a vendee's lien for the amount paid on the contract of purchase, where the vendor cannot, or will not, perform.

Where vendee is in default.

It is generally recognized, and where the question has been presented it has been held, that a vendee in default, if entitled to relief by repayment of any portion of the purchase price paid upon an executory contract of purchase, is not entitled to a lien to secure its repayment. Dinn v. Grant, 5 De G. & S. 451.

And in Cornwall v. Henson [1900] 2 Ch. 300, although damages were allowed a purchaser of land on executory contract on a bill by him for specific performance or for damages in lieu thereof, the court denied a lien. The reason for the denial does not appear. The vendee was, however, in default, and because of this default the vendor abandoned the contract.

In California the Civil Code (§ 350) provides that one who pays to the owner any part of the price of the real property under an agreement for the sale thereof has a special lien upon the property, independent of possession, for such part of the amount paid that he may be entitled to recover back in case of a failure of consideration. This provision was held in Merrill v. Merrill, 103 Cal. 287, 35 Pac. 768, 37 Pac. 392, not to apply to a vendee who was in default at the time his vendor rescinded the contract because of such default. It was plaintiff would be entitled to equitable relief of some kind.

The first question presented is whether the lien of a vendee for the amount paid on an executory contract for the purchase of land survives a rescission of the contract adjudged by a court of equity on the ground of fraud practised by the vendor by which the vendee was induced to enter into the contract. Under the facts found, the right of recovery at law for the sum paid is not questioned, but it is strenuously insisted that rescission destroys the contract, and remits the parties to their original rights. We held in the Elterman Case that the vendee's lien was created by the contract and payment thereunder, and that, upon default by the vendor without fault of the vendee, the latter could foreclose his lien. If we reasoned correctly in that case, there can be no lien without a contract. Payment on the contract pursuant to its requirements gives a lien by operation of law. The contract is the essential basis of the lien, for payment is simply an observance by the vendee of one of the express terms thereof. Rescission, therefore, destroys the contract ab initio, and leaves the parties in the same situation as if no contract had ever been made. Under these circumstances there can be no lien.

The second question is whether, even if the plaintiff was not entitled to a vendee's lien, the action was properly brought in equity for a rescission of the contract on the ground of fraud. In Becker v. Church, 115 N. Y. 532, 565, 22 N. E. 748, we said through Judge Gray: "There cannot be any doubt as to the jurisdiction of courts of equity over actions to cancel and set aside instruments on the ground of fraud in their procurement. Such actions are in the nature of preventive remedies. The existence of the instruments may be a well-founded source of anticipated danger by the party whom they do, or whom they are designed, to affect. The reason for the maintenance of the action for their avoidance is to be found in the reasonable apprehension that the evidence of the fraud may not be always attainable; or that the defense of fraud may not always be available at law." The general rule governing the subject is well set forth in 24 American & English Encyclopedia of Law, 2d ed. p. 615, as follows: "Where the complainant in equity seeks to have a contract totally rescinded and declared void for fraud, the fact that he seeks, also, a recovery of money is not sufficient ground for the refusal of the court to entertain jurisdiction; for in an action at law the recovery of money is the principal object, while in the suit in equity the rescission of the contract is the principal matter of relief and the recovery of money is merely an incidental, although a necessary, conse-

also held that such a vendee had no lien at common law, as it was a rule in equity that such a lien did not exist in favor of one who was in default.

Where vendee not in possession.

The claim has been made that a vendee is entitled to a lien on the failure of an executory contract, for the purchase of real estate, only where some special equity exists in his favor, such as possession of the land, which is the subject-matter of the contract. This was the conclusion of the court in Klim v. Sachs, 102 App. Div. 44, 92 N. Y. Supp. 107, and Krainin v. Coffey, 119 App. Div. 516, 104 N. Y. Supp. 174.

These cases, however, were overruled in Elterman v. Hyman, supra, wherein it was held that neither possession nor any special equity other than the payment of a portion of the purchase price was essential to create such a lien.

And in Bullitt v. Eastern Kentucky Land Co., 99 Ky. 324, 36 S. W. 16, the court said: "If the contract was rescinded and any part of the land embraced in the contract belonged to the vendors, we are of the opinion the vendee had a lien thereon to reimburse it for any sum which it had paid the vendors on the purchase money, notwithstanding the vendors failed to place it in possession of the land." 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Where contract is invalid.

The question is frequently presented as to the right of a vendee to a lien for the purchase money paid on an executory contract of purchase which is for some reason invalid and therefore unenforceable. The cases are in conflict on this question.

In ejectment by the vendor, Rumfelt v. Clemens, 46 Pa. 455, denied a vendee in possession under an executory contract, void because executed by a married woman and not acknowledged according to law, the right to retain possession of the land until reimbursed for the amount paid by him on the purchase price.

In Wright v. Begley, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 53, 101 S. W. 342, a purchaser of land by executory contract was denied a lien thereon for the purchase money paid, as the vendor was a married woman, and the contract of sale, if executed by her at all, was not according to statute, and she had received no part of the purchase price.

Although the general doctrine as to the right of a lien in favor of a vendee, where the contract fails without fault on his part, was recognized in Bishop v. Martin, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1494, 65 S. W. 807, it was denied because the contract of purchase was a verbal one, and was therefore void under the statute of frauds, the purchaser not being in possession of the land. To the same efquence; hence, the court, being properly in possession of the cause for the purpose of granting purely equitable relief, will proceed to do complete justice between the parties, although a part of the relief granted is purely legal in its nature. This principle is in full accordance with the broader principle of equity, that in all cases of fraud, if the party defrauded is entitled to any equitable relief as to the contract in which he has been defrauded, and if it is necessary for him to establish the fraud in order to obtain this relief, the court will grant him full and entire relief, notwithstanding that as to a part thereof he has a perfect remedy in an action for damages at law." As was said in Vail v. Reynolds, 118 N. Y. 297, 302, 23 N. E. 301: "A person who has been induced by fraudulent representations to become the purchaser of property has, upon discovery of the fraud, three remedies open to him, either of which he may elect. He may rescind the contract absolutely, and sue in an action at law to recover the consideration parted with upon the fraudulent contract. . . . He may bring an action in equity to rescind the contract, and in that action have full relief. Allerton v. Allerton, 50 N. Y. 670. Such an action is not founded upon a rescission, but is maintained for a rescission; and it is sufficient, therefore, for the plaintiff to offer in his complaint to return what he has received and make tender of it on the trial. Lastly, he may retain what he has received, and bring an action at law to recover the damages sustained."

The plaintiff in this action adopted the second course suggested by bringing an action in equity to rescind, and when rescission was decreed he became entitled to full relief, which included as an incident to rescission the recovery of the amount paid on the execution of the contract. Rescission was the primary right demanded by the plaintiff in his complaint, and, as was well said by the appellant's counsel: "Whatever legal relief was claimed in this action was purely incidental and tributary to the equitable relief." When the contract fell, all rights derived therefrom by either party fell with it. The plaintiff had no right to a lien depending on the contract, and the defendant had no right to retain the amount paid on the contract. While the court had no power to render judgment establishing a lien, it had power to decree rescission and follow it by such further relief as was appropriate to rescission, even if it involved a judgment for money only. Baily v. Hornthal, 154 N. Y. 648, 660, 61 Am. St. Rep. 645, 49 N. E. 56. If rescission had not been decreed, there could have been no judgment for money, but that legal relief necessarily followed the equitable relief that was granted. The fact that the plaintiff demanded more than he was entitled to is not important, because, fect is Lyttle v. Davidson, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 2262, 67 S. W. 34.

In Blackburn v. Pennington, 8 B. Mon. 217, where a conveyance of real estate by a married woman was invalid because defectively acknowledged, a subsequent purchaser was given a lien on the land purchased for the amount he paid on the purchase price in reliance upon representations made to him by her when sole to the effect that the title she had conveyed was valid.

But North v. Bunn, 122 N. C. 766, 29 S. E. 766, held that, although a contract by a married woman to convey would be no defense to an action to recover possession, yet that in such action the purchaser was entitled to have an equitable lien declared in her favor for the amount she had paid. The court said that it could not compel a married woman to execute a deed and acknowledge its execution as of her own free will, but it could declare the price paid to be an equitable lien in favor of the other party, so that, if the vendor kept the property, she must pay the amount of the lien. To same effect, see Piecher v. Smith, 2 Head, 206; also Felkner v. Tighe, 39 Ark. 357.

Where a married woman, in conjunction with her husband, sold land, received a portion of the purchase price, and put the purchaser in possession, but refused to convey, it was held in Newman v. Moore, 94 Ky. 147, 42 Am. St. Rep. 343, 21 S. W. 759, that 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the land should be subjected to the repayment of the sums paid by the purchaser.

Pierson v. Lum, 25 N. J. Eq. 390, also held that a purchaser of real estate by executory contract from a married woman was entitled to a lien thereon for that portion of the purchase price paid by him, although the contract was void, where she knew of the payments made on the purchase price, and it enhanced the value of her separate estate.

Sautelle v. Carlisle, 13 Lea, 391, applying the doctrine that purchase money received as part consideration upon a void sale of land would be treated as an equity attaching to the land, and subject to which a subsequent purchaser with notice took, held a vendee, under an oral contract void under the statute of frauds, entitled to a lien for the amount paid by him on the purchase price as against a subsequent purchaser, with notice, from the vendor, a married woman. The relief was given in a proceeding in equity to construe a will and to distribute an estate.

But in McNew v. Toby, 6 Humph. 27, the court said that money advanced on an invalid verbal contract for the purchase of land created no lien thereon to secure the repayment of the sum so advanced. The case, however, was disposed of on a question of jurisdiction.

when an answer has been interposed, the Code provides that "the court may permit the plaintiff to take any judgment, consistent with the case made by the complaint, and embraced within the issue." Code Civ. Proc. § 1207. I think that the trial court, according to the allegations of the complaint and the facts found, which are conclusive upon us, properly rendered judgment for a rescission of the contract and a return of the money paid thereon, but improperly for a lien and the foreclosure thereof, with judgment for deficiency.

The judgment appealed from should be modified by striking therefrom all provisions relating to a lien, the foreclosure thereof and judgment for deficiency, and, as thus modified, affirmed, without costs in this court to either party.

Cullen, Ch. J., Werner and Willard Bartlett, JJ., concur.

Gray, J., dissenting:

The plaintiff in this action seeks to have rescinded an agreement made with the defendant company, whereby he agreed to purchase certain real estate in the city of New York, upon the ground that the contract was induced by false and fraudulent representations of a material nature as to the character of the soil. As incidental relief, he demanded that the defendant pay to him the sum of $5,000, which he had paid on account of the purchase price, together with his expenses and costs, and that he have a lien upon the premises for the same. He recovered a judgment for the relief prayed for, except as to the lien for his expenses and costs, and the judgment has been unanimously affirmed by the justices of the appellate division.

The only question of law for our consideration now is whether the vendee in an agreement for the purchase of real estate, which fails through no fault on his part, but by reason of the refusal, inability, or, as in this case, the fraud, of the vendor, is entitled to an equitable lien on the land for any sums advanced on account of the purchase money. The question of the right of the vendee to such a lien, where the vendor is unable to convey according to the contract, has been determined affirmatively in Elterman v. Hyman, 192 N. Y. 113, 84 N. E. 937. The present case does not, as I view it, differ in principle from that case, although it differs in the respect that this action is for a rescission. I do not need to discuss at any length the main question, which Judge Vann in the case referred to has so elaborately treated upon the authorities, as upon principle. What I shall briefly say is in support of the conclusion which 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) he reached as to the general right to the lien, although I differ as to the basis for the doctrine. I am quite unable to agree with him in the views expressed in this case. As I view the question, the vendee's lien, like that of the vendor, is purely the creation of equity, and is quite independent of the contract, otherwise than as the contract is the cause for such an exercise of the power of a court of equity. Like a vendor's lien, it exists in equity upon the basis of certain necessary and natural presumptions, or of natural equities. The vendor is presumed not to intend to convey away his land without payment of the price agreed to be paid, and therefore the land, where the vendee has gone into possession, will be impressed with a lien to the extent that consideration remains unpaid. With a corresponding regard for the vendee, the court will presume that he made the partial payment on account of the price agreed to be paid, intending to rely, in the event of the failure of the contract through the fault of the vendor, and as security for a repayment, upon the land, in which he is deemed to have a beneficial interest through the partial performance of the contract. If the doctrine of a vendor's lien upon the land for the unpaid purchase money merits acceptance in the administration of justice by a court of equity, as I assume, we may accept it as within the province of equity to treat both parties with equal justice, and to give to each the same remedy. This doctrine, which is asserted in decisions by the English courts and by many text writers, finds its strongest support, in my opinion, in the view which is taken in equity of the relations of the parties to a contract for the sale and conveyance of land. In that view, the vendor becomes a trustee of the legal title for the vendee, where the vendee has paid, or is prepared to pay, the purchase price; and it is a logical application of the principle, where the vendee has paid a part of the price, and the contract comes to naught through the vendor's fault, to hold the latter as a trustee to the extent of the payment made. The vendee advances a part of the price of the land in the faith that the conveyance will ultimately be made to him upon the terms and in the manner agreed upon, and that no fraud has been practised by the vendor to vitiate the transaction. The vendor is chargeable with knowledge of this, and, in receiving a portion of the price of the land, should, and will, be presumed to hold the legal title in trust pro tanto for the vendee; that, in the event of the contract failing through his fault, repayment of the money advanced may be secured. If the theory is correct, it is immaterial whether the party agreeing to sell is at the time seised of the premises; for, if he thereafter acquires them, the trust will then arise in the vendee's favor.

I think that it follows fairly from what is held as to the general doctrine that whether the transaction of purchase fall through by reason of the inability of the vendor to convey as agreed, or whether, as in this case, the contract be rescinded before completion by reason of the vendor's misrepresentation of a material fact, in either event, the vendee's right to a lien cannot be affected. That view has been taken by the English courts, as will appear from the opinions in Mycock v. Beatson, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 384, Rose v. Watson, 10 H. L. Cas. 672, and Whitbread v. Watt [1902] 1 Ch. 835; and it seems to me, always granting the right in equity to decree a lien, that it is a proper view. And see 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 730. The objection is urged that, assuming the right of a vendee to a lien, it is abandoned where the contract is rescinded. The argument is that, "by the election to rescind for fraud, a vendee dissolves the contractual tie and renounces all the benefits resulting from the contract, at the same time that he disclaims its burdens." It is sought, by the argument, to make a distinction between an election to treat the contract as broken and an election to avoid it. This argument is based upon the premise that the vendee's lien is a deduction from the contract, and cannot stand without it. It is true that the contract establishes the relations of the parties and is the evidence of their agreements; but its rescission for the fraud of, or for a breach by, the vendor should not affect the right of the vendee to his equitable lien upon the land. Why should it, if its creation by equity is to secure to the vendee repayment of his advances? The contract, in such case, is not void, but voidable, at the option of the purchaser. If the option is exercised, how is the right to invoke the equitable power of the court to decree a lien lost? I think that the argument disregards the principle upon which, as I conceive it, equity creates the lien. The lien is decreed independently of the contract, which does not give it, but furnishes the reason for the decree. See Whitbread v. Watt, supra. The complainant, demanding relief in equity from his agreement, whether rescission is demanded because of an intentional, or of an innocent, misrepresentation, is relieved in either case, and the parties are restored to their original status. But, if the vendor in the contract has received a part of the purchase price of the land, is there any insuperable reason why he should not be held as a trustee in respect thereof for the vendee. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

and why should the power of the court be less, in such case, to decree a lien upon the land to secure the discharge of the trust duty? The procedure effects an equitable result, and it does not contravene any rule of law. Is it correct to assert that the plaintiff, in asking a court of equity to relieve him from the obligation of an agreement induced by the defendant's misrepresentations, necessarily abandons his equitable remedy of a lien upon the land to secure the repayment of the money advanced towards its purchase? I am disposed to think it is not. The court, having equitable jurisdiction of the parties, when determining the vendor to be in fault and that the parties shall be placed in statu quo, proceeds to do full justice between them by determining that the vendee shall have a lien upon the land to secure him against the loss of the moneys paid towards its purchase. In order to ascertain the real nature of this exercise of equitable power, it may be considered in relation to its basis and to the result of its operation. The basis is the promise of the vendor to convey the land, as and when agreed, and that meanwhile he is a trustee of the legal title for the vendee to the extent of the purchase moneys paid. The extent of its operation is to subject the land to the execution of a trust, either to convey, where there has been full performance by the purchaser, or to return him his moneys, where the contract has failed and ceases to be binding through no fault of the latter. It supplies a remedy where the law falls short of accomplishing full justice. If equity lays hold of a pretext, or adopts a fiction, in such a case it is no more than it does in many other cases, in order to enforce a natural right and to effect a just result.

For these reasons, I advise the affirmance of the judgment.

2. The answer of the president of a corporation on behalf of himself and all other officers in a mandamus proceeding to compel the inspection of the corporate books subjects the other officers to the orders of the court, although they were not served with the papers in the proceeding.

Corporation — agreement — protection of officer.

ject to attachment, will not relieve it from the agreement.

Corporation — inspection of papers — mismanagement.

4. That a corporation, prior to a certain time, was paying dividends, and that it then ceased, and, three years afterwards, owed its directors large sums of money, and was otherwise in debt, are sufficient to entitle a stockholder to a writ of mandamus to compel the corporation to permit him to inspect its books and papers for the purpose of securing information upon which to base a proceeding against the directors for mismanagement.

Same — antagonistic interests — effect.

5. That a stockholder seeking to compel the corporation to permit him to examine its books to protect his interests is also a stock-is intended to include herein only cases reported since that note. Cases where inspection was sought in a pending suit, primarily involving other rights, are also excluded.

As affected by the motive or purpose—at common law.

This subdivision deals simply with the general question whether the common-law right of a stockholder to inspect the books of his corporation is an absolute one, or depends upon a proper motive or purpose. The question as to what is a proper motive or purpose is discussed in a subsequent subdivision.

As applied in this country, the common-law right of a stockholder to inspect the books of his corporation is not an absolute one, but depends upon his motive in seeking the inspection.

This was, in substance, the language employed in Varney v. Baker, 104 Mass. 239, 80 N. E. 524, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 989, wherein, in allowing a peremptory mandamus for this purpose, the court said that it was not necessary that there should be any particular dispute to entitle the stockholder to exercise this right, that nothing more was required than that, acting in good faith for the protection of the interests of the corporation and his own interests, he desired to ascertain the condition of the company's business.

And in State ex rel. Weinberg v. Pacific Brewing & Malting Co. 21 Wash. 451, 47 L.R.A. 208, 58 Pac. 584, the court said that a stockholder of a corporation had the right at reasonable times to inspect and examine the books and records of the corporation so long as his purpose was to inform himself as to the manner and fidelity with which the corporate affairs were being conducted and his examination was made in the interest of the corporation. "Nor will it be presumed, when such request is made, that the purpose of the inspection is other than in the interest of the corporation, and, when it is charged to be otherwise, the burden should be on the officers refusing such request, or the corporation, to establish it."

So, in State ex rel. Watkins v. Donnell Mfg. Co. 129 Mo. App. 206, 107 S. W. 1112, the court remarked that a stockholder's common-law right of inspection was broader than the statutory right, and was not limited thereby; that it was subject only to the limitations that the inspection should be for a proper purpose and at a proper or convenient time or place.

In sustaining the right of a stockholder to a mandamus to inspect the books of a national bank, the court, in Guthrie v. Harkness, 199 U. S. 148, 50 L. ed. 130, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 4, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 433, said that, in issuing a writ of mandamus, it would exercise a sound discretion, and would grant the writ under proper safeguards to protect the interests of all concerned; that it should not be granted for speculative purposes, or to gratify idle curiosity, or to aid blackmailing, but it would not be denied a stockholder who sought information for legitimate purposes.

So, in Bruning v. Hoboken Printing & Pub. Co. 67 N. J. L. 119, 50 Atl. 906, in denying an application for a mandamus because it did not show the purpose of the examination or that it was in good faith, the court said that the common-law right was not given to gratify curiosity, or for speculative purposes, but only when its exercise was sought in good faith and for a specific purpose.

A distinction between the right to inspect the books in general and the by-laws of a corporation was made in Re Coats, 75 App. Div. 567, 78 N. Y. Supp. 429, wherein the court said that an application to examine the by-laws rested upon a different footing than an application for an inspection of the books and papers in general; that the by-laws constituted a part of the contract between the stockholder and the corporation and were binding upon both, and added: "It must be a strong case, therefore, which would interpose to prevent a stockholder from an opportunity to examine the by-laws of the corporation and thus inform himself of the terms of the contract into which he has entered. He ought to be permitted to know the extent and terms of his obliga-holder in a rival corporation is not sufficient to deprive him of the right to the relief sought.

Same — offer to purchase stock — effect.

6. A corporation cannot deprive its stockholder of the right to inspect its books for the protection of his interests by offering to purchase his stock at a price fixed by it.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for tions and the tenure upon which he holds his property. It does not appear that the privilege to inspect the by-laws will be abused, or that any ulterior purpose prejudicial to the corporation will be served thereby."

A distinction was also made between the right of a director to inspect the books of the corporation, and the right of a stockholder so to do, in People ex rel. McInnes v. Columbia Paper Bag Co. 103 App. Div. 208, 92 N. Y. Supp. 1084, wherein, in holding that a director was entitled to a peremptory mandamus, permitting him to inspect the books of account, records, and papers of the company, the court said: "Whether the relator was entitled to the writ as a stockholder, we need not consider. He was a director, and, as such, as matter of law, he was entitled to the peremptory writ. . . . Sufficient facts appear in the petition and affidavits to justify the action of the court below in granting this writ. There are allegations that the president of the company and another director (there being but three directors) are wasting its assets. A director of a corporation is responsible to stockholders for the faithful execution of his trust. He is also authorized by law to maintain an action to recover back moneys or property wastefully disposed of by those in control and management of the corporation." One of the defenses to the application for mandamus was that the directors had endeavored to meet all the reasonable demands of the relator to have the books of the corporation examined and its condition disclosed. The court, however, said that relator, as a director, was entitled to make the examination for himself or with the aid of a competent and proper person employed by him and approved by the court.

— under statute.

The courts are not unanimous as to the nature of the right to inspect the books of a corporation, conferred upon stockholders by statute. In a few jurisdictions it is said that the right thus conferred is an absolute and arbitrary one, and that the court would, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Wayne County granting a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to permit plaintiff to inspect its books. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. Wilson and P. H. Hoff, for appellant:

Even the right to a copy of the stock list has limitations.

Com. v. Empire Pass. R. Co. 134 Pa. 237, 19 Atl. 629.

To entitle a stockholder to an inspection of the books, it is necessary that there should be some particular matter in dispute, between members, or the corporation and individuals in it.

R. v. Merchant Tailors' Co. 2 Barn. & Ad. 115.

It is well settled that minority stockhold-by an appropriate remedy, aid in its exercise without reference to the motive of the stockholder in making the inspection.

Thus, in Johnson v. Langdon, 135 Cal. 624, 87 Am. St. Rep. 156, 67 Pac. 1050, constitutional and statutory provisions requiring corporations doing business in the state to keep certain books in which must be recorded the transactions of the corporation, which must be open to the inspection of the directors, stockholders, etc., of the corporation, were construed to confer an arbitrary and absolute right upon the stockholders, irrespective of motive, to inspect its books. On this point the court said: "It is not necessary for the petition to aver or show the purposes or object of the inspection. Neither is it any defense to allege that the objects and purposes are improper, and that the petitioner desires to injure the business of the corporation. The clear legal right given by the Constitution and the statute cannot be defeated by stopping to inquire into motives. . . . The statute is founded upon the principle that the shareholders have a right to be fully informed as to the conditions of the corporation, the manner in which its affairs are conducted, and how the capital to which they have contributed is employed and managed. The shareholder is not required to show any reason or occasion for making the examination. Nor can he be met with the defense that his motives are improper."

It was also said in Cincinnati Volksblatt Co. v. Hoffmeister, 62 Ohio St. 189, 48 L.R.A. 732, 78 Am. St. Rep. 707, 56 N. E. 1033, that the motive of a stockholder in seeking to enforce the right conferred upon him by a statute providing that the books and records of corporations shall at all reasonable times be open to the inspection of every stockholder was not a proper subject for judicial investigation; and that such a stockholder is entitled to the aid of the court where he shows that he is a stockholder, and that he has requested an inspection of the books of the corporation at a reasonable time and place, and that such request was denied.

In New York the later cases recognize a

The inspection should not be allowed, since the relator is also a stockholder of a rival corporation.

Com. ex rel. Boas v. Coit, 15 W. N. C. 484.
Mr. Charles A. McCarty for appellee.

Mestrezat, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a mandamus to compel the defendant company, a trading corporation, to permit the relator, a stockholder, to inspect its books and records. The objections of the defendant to the petition, the order of the distinction between the right to inspect the general books of the corporation and the right to inspect stock or transfer books, declaring that the former is a common-law right, the enforcement of which is discretionary with the court, whereas the latter is a statutory right, the enforcement of which, in a case within the terms of the statute, is mandatory. People ex rel. Lorge v. Consolidated Nat. Bank, 105 App. Div. 409, 94 N. Y. Supp. 173 (appellate division, first department); People ex rel. Callanan v. Keeseville, A. C. & L. C. R. Co. 106 App. Div. 349, 94 N. Y. Supp. 555 (appellate division, third department); People ex rel. Althause v. Giroux Consol. Mines Co. 122 App. Div. 617, 107 N. Y. Supp. 188 (appellate division, first department); Althause v. Giroux, 56 Misc. 508, 107 N. Y. Supp. 191.

There is, however, a difference of opinion as to the consequences involved in the latter proposition. Thus, in the Callanan Case there was a mandamus proceeding to enforce the right of a stockholder to inspect the stock book, based upon § 29 of the stock corporation law, which provides with respect to domestic corporations that "the stock book of every such (stock) corporation shall be open daily during at least three business hours for the inspection of its stockholders and judgment creditors, who may make extracts therefrom." The court, after stating the distinction already referred to, said that "the motives of a stockholder in inspecting the stock book alone are immaterial." The apparent purpose of the relator in this case, however, was to ascertain who were stockholders entitled to vote upon a proposition to increase the corporate stock, and that purpose would in any event seem to have been a proper one.

So, in distinguishing between the right to inspect the general books of the corporation and its stock book, it was said, in Althause v. Giroux, 56 Misc. 509, 107 N. Y. Supp. 191, that the right to inspect the general books of the corporation was founded on a common-law basis, the granting or withholding of which rested in the sound discretion of the court, while the right to inspect the court, and the form of the writ and its service were well taken, and would have to be sustained if they had not been waived. The act of June 8, 1893 (P. L. 345, 3 Purdon, 13th ed. 2424), prescribes the mode of procedure in mandamus proceedings. The petition should contain the jurisdictional facts, and upon its presentation the court should award an alternative writ. The writ, as in other cases, should be issued by the prothonotary in the usual form. In this case, however, the court, in making the order, inadvertently used the word "issued" instead of "awarded," and the prothonotary, instead of issuing the writ of mandamus, prepared a certified copy of the petition and order of court which the sheriff served upon the president of the company. This was stock book was founded on the statute, and was absolute.

In the above case the court said that, where there was nothing in the record to show that the purpose for which an inspection was sought was illegitimate or ulterior, and the stockholder, in his written demand, in affidavit form, swore that his purpose was not inimical to the corporation, in the absence of more substantial evidence on the question, it would not be justified in ignoring the mandatory direction of the statute.

Other cases, however, have distinguished between the right and its enforcement. Thus, People ex rel. Althause v. Giroux Consol. Mines Co. 122 App. Div. 617, 107 N. Y. Supp. 188, denied an application for a mandamus, based on § 53 of the stock corporation law, as amended by Laws 1897, chap. 384, p. 314, § 3, which, in substance, requires every foreign stock corporation having an office for the transaction of business within the state to keep therein a stock book for the inspection of its stockholders and creditors, on the ground that it did not in terms authorize stockholders to make extracts from such book, and that therefore the award of a mandamus to a stockholder, allowing him to make extracts from the stock books, was not of course, but within the discretion of the court, and would therefore be denied where the purpose was an ulterior one. The court said: "There is no express provision of law authorizing the issuance of a writ of mandamus to enforce the provisions of § 53 of the stock corporation law, and, when application is made under that section, whether such writ will issue rests in the sound discretion of the court to which the application is made. Re Steinway, 159 N. Y. 250, 45 L.R.A. 461, 53 N. E. 1103. When the court can see from the facts presented, or it can fairly be inferred therefrom, that the application is not made in good faith for the protection of the applicant's interest in the corporation, but for some ulterior or improper purpose, then the writ should be refused."

That the court, in the last case, did not intend to make any distinction in this respect between a case where the right to wholly irregular, and not a compliance with the well-established practice in such cases. The prothonotary should have issued a writ in the alternative form commanding the respondent to do the things required in the order of the court.

The defendant company, however, waived all defects in the proceedings prior to the return. It agreed that the papers served on the defendant's president should be regarded as an alternative writ of mandamus, and filed a return thereto. By filing a return in pursuance of this agreement, the company waived all the irregularities in the proceedings. The papers were served only on the president of the company, but he made a return "for himself and the other respondents, officers of said corporation." The plaintiff took chances in failing to name the officers, as contemplated by § 7 of the act of 1893. The papers were served only upon George H. Reichenbacher, and, of course, he is the only one who could be compelled to make a return to the writ. He, however, as president of the company, has answered for all the officers of the corporation, and they are therefore in court and subject to its orders. It has been argued that defendant's agreement that the papers should be considered as an alternative writ of mandamus should not be enforced, because the president of the corporation would otherwise have been subject to an attachment. But this is not sufficient to relieve it from the agreement, because, if an attachment had been awarded, it could have been superseded make extracts from the stock book is based on § 29 of the stock corporation law applicable to domestic corporations, which expressly gives such right, and a case based on § 53, under which the right to make extracts must be inferred from the right to inspect, is apparent from the fact that the same court applied the same doctrine in People ex rel. Hunter v. National Park Bank, 122 App. Div. 635, 107 N. Y. Supp. 369, to an application based on § 29, for a writ of mandamus compelling a corporation to permit the relator to make an undisturbed inspection of the stock book, it being specifically held in this case that it was error for the special term to refuse to inquire into the motive of the relator in making the application upon the theory that the right to inspect is absolute without reference to the relator's motive. The court, after stating that there is no express provision of law authorizing a mandamus to enforce the provisions of § 29, and that the granting of mandamus is always in the judicial discretion of the court, said: "Where facts are stated which justify an inference that the application is not made in good faith for the protection or purposes of the applicant, but for the benefit of undisclosed persons for undisclosed purposes, the court has power to, and should, before granting the application, require the applicant to frankly state whether or not he is acting at the instigation of others who are undisclosed, and the purpose for which the application is made." It is to be observed that Houghton, J., who wrote the opinion in the Callanan Case, dissented from the decisions on this point in the last two cases, he having in the meantime been transferred from the first to the third department. In his dissenting opinion in the Hunter Case he says that the rule ought to be as stated in the majority opinion, but the legislature had made it different; and that the remedy was with it rather than with the courts.

It will be observed that the language employed in the last two cases carries an implication, at least, that the right to inquire into the motive of the stockholder is confined to cases where the remedy by manda-mus is invoked. In Henry v. Babcock & W. Co. 125 App. Div. 538, 109 N. Y. Supp. 853 (appellate division, first department), however, McLaughlin, J., expressed the opinion that the stockholder's motive in demanding an inspection of the stock book and the right to make extracts therefrom is a relevant inquiry, even in an action for the statutory penalty for refusing to permit the inspection; but held that in any event the inspection in this case was properly denied for the reason that there was no demand to inspect, apart from the demand to be allowed to make copies (a point subsequently considered in this note). Scott, J., concurred on the last ground; Patterson, P. J., in the result; and Laughlin and Houghton, JJ., dissented.

In the Lorge Case the court, while holding that a stockholder was entitled to a peremptory writ of mandamus to enforce his right to make extracts from the stock book of a national bank, and stating the distinction already referred to between the right to inspect the general books of the corporation and the right to inspect the stock book, nevertheless said: "Doubtless the court has power to withhold an inspection [of the stock book] for an illegitimate purpose, and may regulate the time when the inspection shall be made. But, where it is sought for a legitimate purpose, and the application is made during business hours, the right to such inspection is mandatory." (The question considered in this case, whether the right to inspect carries with it the right to make extracts when that right is not expressly granted, is subsequently treated in this note.)

The appellate term, in Althause v. Giroux, 58 Misc. 508, also seems to have been of the opinion that the motive of the stockholder in demanding permission to make extracts from the stock book is subject to investigation in an action to recover the statutory penalty; and criticizes the statement in the Callanan Case that the motives of the stockholder in inspecting the stock book alone are immaterial. The decision, however, was in favor of the plaintiff, the court saying that there was nothing to impugn his motives to by an appeal, and that would have prevented the enforcement of the attachment against the president until the appeal was disposed of. We notice the irregularities in the proceedings so that our silence may not be construed to mean a tacit approval of the defective pleadings.

The case was heard below on the petition, the return, and a demurrer to the return. The court awarded an alternative writ requiring the defendant to give the relator, with his clerk or clerks, access to all the books, records, and papers of the company, or such of them as he may require in order to secure information regarding the matter set forth in the petition. The petitioner purchased at public auction on June 2, 1906, eight shares of the stock of the corporation, owned by the estate of Peter Crockenberg, one of the eight original stockholders; and subsequently the company issued to Kuhbach a stock certificate. He requested the company to give him information as to its condition, the volume of business done, the amount of profits, and the financial standing of the company. The information was refused. He also made a request of the officers for permission to examine the books, records, and papers of the company, including pay roll, sales book, debits, and credits of the company. This request was likewise refused. The relator then filed this petition, setting forth certain facts alleged to show reckless mismanagement of the corporation by its officers, and praying for a mandamus on the officers of the company to compel them to the extent of showing illegitimacy of purpose.

The doctrine that the right to inspect, given by statute, is not an arbitrary one, also finds support in other New York cases included herein under heading "What purposes are proper."

Peremptory mandamus to enforce the right of a stockholder to examine the books of the corporation was also granted in People ex rel. Fennelly v. Amalgamated Copper Co. 184 N. Y. 573, 578, 77 N. E. 1193, 1194, affirming 110 App. Div. 892, 96 N. Y. Supp. 1141, no opinion being filed in either court.

In other jurisdictions it has been held that the right conferred by statute applies only where the purpose of the inspection is a proper one, and will therefore be enforced only after an inquiry by the court into the merits of the application.

Thus, in State ex rel. O'Hara v. National Biscuit Co. 69 N. J. L. 198, 54 Atl. 241, § 33 of the Code, concerning corporations, (Rev. 1896 as amended by P. L. 1898, p. 409), which provides that "every corporation shall keep at its principal and registered office in this state the transfer books in which the transfer of stock shall be registered, and the stock books, which shall contain the name and address of the stockholders, the number of shares held by them respectively, which shall at all times during the usual hours for business be open to the examination of every stockholder," was held not to broaden the common-law right of a stockholder with respect to the inspection of the books of the corporation so as to make such right absolute rather than discretionary with the court, or to extend the right to all cases without reference to whether the purpose is with respect to the stockholder's interest as a stockholder, or germane to his status as such.

In State ex rel. Watkins v. North American Land & Timber Co. 106 La. 621, 87 Am. St. Rep. 309, 31 So. 172, it was said that the law was settled in that state that the books of a corporation were not open to the inspection of persons without an interest therein, or to the unreasonable inspection of 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

persons who were interested. (See also "What purposes are proper," infra.)

In some jurisdictions the doctrine is limited to the extent that the corporation or custodian of the books, the inspection of which is sought, may, as a matter of defense to an application to enforce the right to inspect, show that the applicant is actuated by an improper motive.

Such is the doctrine of Clawson v. Clayton, 33 Utah, 266, 93 Pac. 729, wherein a statute providing in substance that the books of every domestic corporation shall at all reasonable hours be subject to examination by bona fide stockholders was held to give to such stockholders an absolute right to inspect the books of the corporation at reasonable times. It was, however, recognized that, if the only motive for an inspection was to inflict an injury upon the corporation, or upon anyone, an inspection for such purpose would be an abuse of the right, and would not be permitted; but the court added that these things were matters of defense, and not matters that the stockholders must negative in the first instance; neither were these things presumed from the fact that the stockholder selected some agent to make the inspection or examination in his behalf.

Although no statutory provision exists in Wyoming, permitting stockholders to examine the books of the corporation, it was held in Wyoming Coal Min. Co. v. State, 15 Wyo. 97, 123 Am. St. Rep. 1014, 87 Pac. 337, 984, that a by-law of the corporation which entitled stockholders to an examination of the books of the corporation during business hours so enlarged and broadened the common-law right that an application by a stockholder for mandamus to enforce the right was sufficient, although the purpose of the examination was not expressly alleged. The court said that, under this by-law, if the object of the examination sought was mere idle curiosity, or an illegitimate purpose, that would be a matter of defense.

Affirming this doctrine, Cobb v. Lagarde, 129 Ala. 488, 30 So. 326, held that an application, based on the statute, for mandamus by a stockholder against the custodian of the books of a corporation, to enforce the permit him to inspect the books and papers of the company, and thereby acquire certain specific information to enable the relator, if necessary, to file a bill in equity to restrain the mismanagement which exists in the company. The petitioner avers that the company gave him a statement showing the alleged standing of the company on January 1, 1907; that, if the statement is correct and shows the actual condition of the affairs existing in the company, it discloses reckless mismanagement of the company's business to such an extent that steps should be taken to correct the apparent mismanagement which exists in the company; that, if the statement is false, he is entitled to know what the real condition of affairs is in the company in which he has his money invested.

The petitioner then states in detail some items in the statement furnished him with he alleges sustain the allegation of mismanagement. In addition to what is disclosed by the items in the statement referred to, he alleges, what has not been denied by the return, that the company was very prosperous and paying large dividends up till July 25, 1904, and that since that time it has not declared a dividend, but is in debt as shown by its statement. The petitioner further avers that, if the company is permitted to conduct its business in the manner shown by the statement furnished him on January 1, 1907, it will soon become insolvent, and perhaps necessitate a dissolution of the corporation. It is further averred that the pe-right to inspect them, was good on demurrer, although the purpose of the inspection was not disclosed in the application. That the burden was on the company to show that the motive was an improper one.

See, to same effect, State ex rel. Weinberg v. Pacific Brewing & Malting Co. 21 Wash. 451, 47 L.R.A. 208, 58 Pac. 584.

And in Meysenburg v. People, 88 Ill. App. 328, following the doctrine of Stone v. Kellogg, 165 Ill. 192, 56 Am. St. Rep. 240, 46 N. E. 222, it was said that, unless it appeared that the examination of books and records was for some improper or unlawful purpose, the right was absolute. That, where it was claimed in a mandamus proceeding that the motive was improper or unlawful, it rested upon the defendant to plead and prove the facts upon which such claim was based. The allegations in the answer not being sufficient to show such a purpose, a demurrer thereto was sustained.

But People ex rel. Hunter v. National Park Bank, 122 App. Div. 635, 107 N. Y. Supp. 369, said that, while it was sufficient in the first instance to show the existence of a clear legal right to the relief demanded, if, however, in answer to the application, facts were presented to the court from which the inference could fairly be drawn that the application was not made in good faith for the protection of the applicant or of the corporation, but was for some ulterior or improper purpose, the burden was cast upon the party making the application affirmatively to show that he was acting in good faith, for a legitimate purpose, and his own or the corporation's protection.

What purposes are proper.

—interest germane to right as stockholder.

If the purpose of the inspection is germane to the interests of a stockholder as such, and reasonable grounds for the inspection are presented, the right will be enforced. The following cases are of value as illustrating what a proper purpose is within this rule:

67 Atl. 756, an alternative writ of mandamus was awarded a stockholder of a domestic corporation to compel it to bring its books, etc., within the state for examination, etc., it appearing that the financial reports of the company, made at the stockholders' meetings, had been very general, and no details given, and the allegations of the petition and the proofs to sustain the same were of such a character as to render it doubtful if certain dividends paid by the company had not been paid from its capital and in depletion of the corporate assets.

In Garcin v. Trenton Rubber Mfg. Co. (N. J. L.) 60 Atl. 1098, a mandamus was also awarded a stockholder to enable him to inspect such books of the corporation as might be necessary to enable him to ascertain the value of his stock so that he could intelligently offer it for sale, it appearing that no dividend had ever been declared on the stock, and no statement showing the financial condition of the company had ever been made.

The desire to ascertain the value of the stock of the company, and whether its business was being conducted according to law, was also held to be a proper purpose, in Guthrie v. Harkness, 199 U. S. 148, 50 L. ed. 130, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 4, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 433.

So, the desire of a stockholder to ascertain the condition and the value of the stock, and whether there had been mismanagement of the corporation, and, if so, what effect it had had upon the assets or the business of the corporation, in order to file a bill in equity for the appointment of a receiver, or take other proper proceedings for the benefit of the corporation, and of his interest therein, was also held, in Varney v. Baker, 194 Mass. 239, 80 N. E. 524, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 989, to be a proper purpose for inspection, although the trial court was unable to find as a fact that there was any mismanagement of the company, or incapacity on the part of its officers. It did, however, find that the petitioner honestly believed that the company was being mismanaged, and that the desire to make the inspection was in good faith.

tioner has been denied all information by the officers of the company as to the business of the company, and that such information is necessary in order to enable the petitioner, as he proposes doing, to file a bill in equity against the company and its officers for the purpose of restraining them from the further commission of the acts complained of. The return does not deny certain facts alleged in the petition, which we think are material and sufficient to warrant the court in granting the relief which the relator seeks. It does deny, however, the allegations of mismanagement of the business of the corporation, or that its business has been conducted in a way and manner injurious to the stockholders. It alleges that the relator, in making a demand for the inspection of the books, is not acting in good faith, for the reason that he is a director in a competing glass company, and desires the information that it may be used to the advantage of that company.

It is averred in the petition, and not denied by the return, that the business of the company was very prosperous prior to July 25, 1904, when Peter Crockenberg died. He was the owner of the five shares sold at auction and purchased by the relator. During the four years prior to the death of Crockenberg the earnings of the company amounted to 320 per cent on its capital stock. Since his death, and while the relator has owned the stock, a period of about three years, no dividends have been paid or declared by the corporation. The statement of

In Neubert v. Armstrong Water Co. 211 Pa. 582, 61 Atl. 123, mandamus was awarded a stockholder to enable him to examine the books of his corporation on his showing that its business was under the control and management of three persons who had acquired a majority of its stock; that they had failed to keep proper accounts and make annual statements of the financial condition of the corporation to the stockholders; that other illegal acts had been committed to prevent the stockholders from knowing the value of their stock. The purpose of the examination was to enable the relators to obtain information necessary to enable them to file a bill in equity to restrain such persons from the further commission of the acts complained of, for an accounting of the moneys expended by them, and for other purposes stated. The petition also averred that the three persons who were in control of the corporation had resorted to various devices to compel the petitioners to sell to them their stock at a price below its actual value, and one of the purposes of the examination was to ascertain the value of the stock.

State ex rel. Watkins v. Donnell Mfg. Co. 129 Mo. App. 206, 107 S. W. 1112, also held that, where the purpose of the inspection was to ascertain whether the financial condition of the company was such that a receiver should be appointed and its affairs wound up, a mandamus should be awarded.

In State ex rel. Johnson v. St. Louis Transit Co. 124 Mo. App. 111, 100 S. W. 1126, mandamus was allowed where the purpose was to ascertain the financial condition of the company, and the facts as to certain contracts and dispositions of assets alleged to be inimical to the interests of the stockholders.

State ex rel. Watkins v. North American Land & Timber Co. 108 La. 621, 87 Am. St. Rep. 309, 31 So. 172, held a stockholder entitled to mandamus to inspect such books of a foreign corporation as were within the state, where it was shown in his behalf that he was the owner of a large amount of the capital stock of the company; and that, by reason of a cabal between the stockholders and the directors in the country of the domicile of the corporation, he was deprived of all voice, management, and control in the direction of its affairs; and that, in order that he might be informed of its present condition and past transactions, and might so exercise his rights as to prevent mismanagement, correct abuses, extravagance, and waste, and protect himself from irreparable loss and injury, it was necessary that he should be allowed to inspect all the books, accounts, papers, and correspondence of the company.

That the inspection of the books of a foreign corporation kept in Missouri, for the purpose of ascertaining its financial condition, and the value of its stock, was a proper purpose, sufficient to entitle a shareholder to mandamus, was held in State ex rel. English v. Lazarus, 127 Mo. App. 401, 105 S. W. 780. This conclusion was based upon the common-law right of inspection, the statutory provision being inapplicable. The motive for the inspection being a sufficient and proper one, the court held that the fact that the relator was an officer in a rival company did not of itself present a sufficient ground for denying him the right of inspection, although the right was so restricted that certain secrets of the company would not be thereby disclosed.

The fact that the stockholder seeking to inspect the books of the company is on unfriendly relations with its officers, and is a competitor of the company, or an officer in a competing company, is not sufficient to raise the presumption that the purpose of the inspection is an improper one. Cobb v. Lagarde, 129 Ala. 488, 30 So. 326.

In Re O'Neill, 47 Misc. 495, 95 N. Y. Supp. 964, a mandamus was awarded a stockholder, permitting him to examine the books, papers, and vouchers of the corporation where the petitioner had been a member of the board since its formation, and no report had been made by it of its affairs since its existence, a period of about three years, and it did not appear to be doing any business, although the answer of the president, who induced the petitioner to buy stock therein, alleged that he had given petitioner information as to the loss of a considerable

January 1, 1907, shows, among other things, $3,780 due the incorporators for wages, and $1,244.40 loaned by them to the corporation and secured by notes, making a total of $5,024.40 due the incorporators, who are also directors of the company. The statement further shows a bank note for $2,000, bills payable amounting to $2,199, and more than $800 due as commissions and expense of salesmen. There is also, as appears by the statement, a mortgage on the buildings for $6,300. The petitioner further avers that, from his knowledge of the company's business, he believes that the capital stock should now be worth many times its original par value, and that a dividend of at least 10 per cent should be declared by the company if its business had been properly, intelligently, and economically transacted. We think the averments in the petition, taken in connection with the statement of January 1, 1907, were sufficient to warrant the court in awarding the mandamus. The petition does not have to aver facts sufficient to sustain a bill filed for an accounting. The stockholders of a corporation are the owners of its franchise and its assets, and they have a right to be informed of the financial condition of the company. When, therefore, a stockholder furnishes sufficient data to warrant the conclusion that there is mismanagement and that the affairs of the company are not conducted in a proper manner and in the interests of the stockholders, he has a right to demand of the officers of the company permission to examine amount in a transaction of which the petitioner knew the particulars, and had answered all his reasonable inquiries as to the affairs of the corporation. He also alleged that, while the petitioner was at one time his intimate friend, he was now hostile to him. The court, however, said that the answer did not advance any valid reasons, under the circumstances, why the mandamus should not be awarded as prayed for, especially as there was no satisfactory proof that any injury would result to the corporation therefrom of such a nature as to render the inspection improper, or that the petitioner had any illegal end in view in making the application.

That a stockholder is a member of a company engaged in a competing business is no ground for refusing his right to inspect, although the only purpose of the inspection is to ascertain if the business of the company is being properly conducted. Hodder v. George Hogg Co. (Pa.) 72 Atl. 553.

In People ex rel. Ludwig v. Ludwig & Co. 126 App. Div. 696, 111 N. Y. Supp. 94, the fact that a corporation was expending a considerable amount of its funds in erecting a factory on land owned by a relative of the president, under an alleged arrangement that, by paying a large amount in excess of the actual cost of construction, the property should be conveyed to the corporation, was held sufficient to entitle a large stockholder to a mandamus to enforce an inspection of the books, although he was engaged in a rival business, and had been indiscreet in causing to be sent to persons having business relations with the corporation trade journal copies containing the moving papers in the proceeding, wherein was alleged the mismanagement of the affairs of the corporation. The right of inspection was so limited, however, that the relator would not, by such inspection, be able to ascertain the names of the customers of the corporation.

Re Hastings, 128 App. Div. 516, 112 N. Y. Supp. 800, held that the executor of a deceased owner, who was also her sole legatee, was entitled to a mandamus requiring the officers of the corporation to permit him to examine and take extracts of the records and papers, where it appeared that the president and owner of the other one half of the stock was drawing a large salary, and, since the death of the executor's decedent, had promoted his son so as greatly to increase his salary; also, that the stock had recently been increased by proceedings which, with reference to giving notice to those interested in the decedent's estate, savored of bad faith. The court said that the fact that the executor demanded and was persistent in his demand, that he be elected to the position held by his decedent in his lifetime, and that he receive the salary formerly paid to her, and the further fact that he threatened investigation if his demand was refused, was not sufficient to infer bad faith on his part in seeking the inspection, it not appearing that he was engaged or interested in any rival or competing business, or that he had any interest adverse to his interest in the corporation.

But in Re Kennedy, 75 App. Div. 188, 77 N. Y. Supp. 714, the right to examine and copy the books of a corporation was denied to the executors of a stockholder thereof, where it appeared that they were officers of a hostile corporation, and were attempting to build up a new and rival business instituted by their decedent in his lifetime; and where it also appeared that the declared object of the examination, viz., to enable the county treasurer to ascertain the value of the stock of the corporation so that the value of the taxable transfers under decedent's will could be fixed, was a mere pretense, inasmuch as, under the tax law, the treasurer could subpoena the officers of the corporation and obtain from them all necessary information. The court said that it was apparent from the papers that the real object of the petitioners was to obtain information that would aid them in crippling the business of the corporation, for the benefit of its business rival.

And in Re Coats, 73 App. Div. 178, 76 N. Y. Supp. 730, mandamus was denied where affidavits in opposition to a petition by a stockholder for mandamus to enable him to inspect the books of the company established that the petitioner was not the real party in interest, but was a mere dummy for others who were seeking to obtain the books, records, and accounts of the corporation so that he may protect his interests; and if the demand is refused, and he makes application to the court to enforce it, a mandamus should be awarded. The facts averred in the relator's petition were sufficient to justify the court in granting the alternative writ, and subsequently in awarding the peremptory writ.

That the relator is a stockholder in a competing company is of itself not sufficient to deprive him of the relief he seeks in this proceeding against the defendant company. This has been distinctly ruled in Cobb v. Lagarde, 129 Ala. 488, 495, 30 So. 326, 328. It is there said: "The defendant set up in his answer that the petitioner's purpose in wanting to inspect the book was an improper

one. This was defensive matter, and the burden was on the defendant to show it, and we are not prepared to say that he has done so. The fact of the petitioner being a stockholder in a rival concern, and that he may thereby gain some advantage by an inspection of the books of the defendant company, does not necessarily show an improper purpose in making demand for inspection, and will not deprive him as a stockholder of his right of investigation into the management of the affairs of said company." In the case at bar there is simply an averment, on belief, that the relator desires the information to use it for the advantage of a competing company. It is not alleged in the return that the averment can be supported by proof. The offer of the defendant control of the company to destroy it, and that he was closely connected with such third persons in the scheme, where the effect of the inspection would be to assist in carrying out the scheme.

So, in Bevier v. United States Wood Preserving Co. (N. J. L.) 69 Atl. 1008, mandamus was denied where an examination of the testimony given in support of the application to secure the inspection of the books of the corporation led the court to believe that the purpose of the examination was not in good faith, but was for the purpose of aiding a competitor; and the information furnished by the company and the position assumed by it indicated a willingness to give such information as was proper to accomplish the avowed object of the stockholder.

In Re Pierson, 44 App. Div. 215, 60 N. Y. Supp. 671, it was held that a peremptory writ of mandamus was properly denied a stockholder in a gas company who sought thereby to compel the company to permit him to examine its books to ascertain if it was selling gas at a loss, it appearing that the company had paid no dividend for a period of about fifteen months, and that it was selling gas at a greatly reduced rate, which, however, the company alleged to be necessary because of a reduction of rates by competing companies. The court said that there was no showing made of any proper or laudable motive for the inspection, which would justify granting to the petitioner a peremptory writ of mandamus, and added that, if it had been made to appear that the object sought by the examination would promote the interests of the stockholders or of the company, or that the value of the securities held by the petitioner would be enhanced or protected thereby, there might be a basis for the issuance of the writ.

Colwell v. Colwell Lead Co. 76 App. Div. 615, 78 N. Y. Supp. 607, reversed an order of the supreme court awarding a mandamus to a stockholder, permitting him to inspect the books of the corporation, on the ground that no sufficient reason was shown for the inspection, where the purpose was to ascertain whether or not the company had been properly conducted during the past year, and a full and complete answer was made to the application.

In People ex rel. Mackey v. American Union L. Ins. Co. 31 Misc. 617, 64 N. Y. Supp. 916, where a stockholder of an insurance company had made charges of mismanagement against the company to the effect that contributions by the stockholders to make good an impairment of the capital stock of the company had been subsequently withdrawn, which charges had been decided adversely to him in an action brought by him against the company and its officers in relation thereto, it was held that such stockholder was not entitled to a mandamus to compel the company to permit him to examine its books and make copies of them where he based the right on the charges of mismanagement and wrongdoing adjudicated against him in the prior action.

Where the object of a corporation as set forth in its charter was "to unite in a social and political organization the young men of Philadelphia to foster and promote a love for and a knowledge of the principles of the Republican party, to educate the young men to a loftier appreciation of their relations to the national, state, and municipal governments, to encourage them to an active participation in the nomination and election of honest and capable public officers by and through the Republican party." McClintock v. Young Republicans, 210 Pa. 115, 68 L.R.A. 459, 105 Am. St. Rep. 784, 59 Atl. 691, held the following to be proper purposes to entitle a member of such association to a mandamus, permitting him to inspect a list of members, and make a copy thereof at a time and place convenient for the purpose: "(a) To institute measures and advocate policies which may tend to promote the objects for which the corporation was organized; (b) to prevent the affairs and property of the corporation from being used to further the private political ambitions of any member or group of members; and (c) to oppose the election or re-election of incompetent officials, and to aid in the election of officers who will be faithful to the best interests of the members, and who will administer company to buy the relator's stock at a price fixed by it is no answer to his demand for an inspection of the books and papers of the corporation. He is not required to sell his stock to the defendant company or its officers at any price, and especially at a price to be named by them. In fact, it would be difficult for him to know what would be a fair and reasonable price for his stock until he gets the very information he demands in this proceeding. Nor is it an answer to the relator's application that the company will furnish him extracts or copies from its books, or that the company will agree to have them inspected by an expert selected by it and the relator. These propositions on the part of the company entirely overlook the rights of a stockholder in a trading corporation. As we have suggested, the stockholders are the owners of the company's assets, and for the protection of their interests they have a right to be informed of the management of its business. If, therefore, there is apparent mismanagement or misconduct by the officers of the corporation, a stockholder has a right to make an investigation for himself and ascertain the true condition of the company's affairs. Of course, this right to examine the books, records, and papers of the company must be exercised in good faith, and at a proper time and place, so as not to interfere with the business of the company. But, subject to this limitation, the officers of the company must permit the stockholder to investigate the company's affairs, and, if they fail to do so the affairs of the corporation and control its property in accordance with the purposes for which the corporation was organized."

—to subserve private interest.

A stockholder is not entitled to inspect the books of his corporation in order to ascertain whether a certain person against whom he has a claim by virtue of legal proceedings in a different state owns or has recently transferred shares of stock in the company. State ex rel. O'Hara v. National Biscuit Co. 60 N. J. L. 198, 54 Atl. 241.

A mandamus will not be granted to compel a corporation to exhibit its books and papers to a stockholder where his purpose is to ascertain whether facts exist which would authorize an application to the attorney general to dissolve the corporation or to appoint a receiver, and also to enable him to require the officers of the corporation to make good any deficit caused by their misconduct. People ex rel. McElwee v. Produce Exch. Trust Co. 53 App. Div. 93, 65 N. Y. Supp. 926.

In Re Taylor, 117 App. Div. 348, 101 N. Y. Supp. 1039, a mandamus was denied a stockholder of a bank to compel it to exhibit its books for inspection to aid him in a suit against the directors thereof for damages because of the publication by them of a false report as to the financial condition of the bank whereby he was induced to purchase stock therein to his loss. The court said that mandamus to compel an inspection would issue in behalf of a stockholder only in proper aid of his stock interest. That, wherever information concerning the management, conduct, and control of the corporation was necessary for the protection of such stock interest, its revelation would be compelled; but that, where the information was sought, not for the benefit of the owner's stock interest, but to assist him in matters personal to himself and wholly apart from such interest, the writ would not be granted.

In Schondelmeyer v. Columbia Fire Proofing Co. 219 Pa. 610, 69 Atl. 49, where it did not appear by the pleadings that the relator, a stockholder, was in any way aggrieved by the action of the company, or 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that his rights as a stockholder were infringed by the refusal to permit him to examine the books of the company; and it did appear that his sole purpose in seeking to inspect the books was to ascertain the value of his stock, to use such knowledge in an action by him against the president of the company for deceit in misrepresenting to him the value of the stock at the time he purchased it,—the court said that his motive in making the inspection was not a proper one, and mandamus was accordingly denied.

But in Woodworth v. Old Second Nat. Bank (Mich.) 117 N. W. 893, although the court found that the real purpose of a stockholder in examining the books of his bank was to enable him to obtain evidence as to the condition of the bank, and the value of its stock, to aid him in preparing for the trial of an action of deceit against certain directors of the bank for false representations as to its financial condition, by reason of which he was induced to purchase stock therein, yet it was held that, tested by the common-law right of inspection, the purpose of the inspection was a proper and legitimate one.

In State ex rel. de Julvecourt v. Pan American Co. 5 Penn. (Del.) 391, 61 Atl. 398, where a by-law of the company gave a stockholder the right to examine its books, a peremptory writ of mandamus was awarded a stockholder on a petition against the corporation and its president, allowing him to inspect and copy such books, papers, and records of the corporation as might be necessary to enable him to ascertain the value of the stock of the company; whether the company in fact owned or controlled certain valuable properties it claimed to own; whether the stock issued had ever been paid for; and also the truth or falsity of certain representations alleged to have been made to the relator by the president of the corporation to induce him to transfer certain of his property to the corporation in exchange for a block of its capital stock.

In Henry v. Babcock & W. Co. 125 App. Div. 538, 109 N. Y. Supp. 853, the court said that a person, by purchasing 1 share of stock out of an authorized issue of 150,000 shares, did not thereby acquire the right on a reasonable and proper demand, the court will, on proper application, enforce the demand by mandamus. It is settled that at common law a stockholder of a trading corporation has a right to examine the books and papers of the company at a reasonable time and place, and for a proper purpose. In Com. ex rel. Sellers v. Phenix Iron Co. 105 Pa. 111, 51 Am. Rep. 184, it is held that a stockholder in a trading corporation, who is denied access to corporate records and information as to corporate affairs, may, in certain cases, have a mandamus to compel the production of such books and papers as are essential to him for some proper and definite purpose, such as an accurate ascertainment and legal assertion of his rights as a stockholder. In that case

Justice Trunkey, speaking for the court, said (page 116 of 105 Pa.): "Unless the charter provides otherwise, a shareholder in a trading corporation has the right to inspect its books and papers and to take minutes from them, for a definite and proper purpose, at reasonable times. The doctrine of the law is that the books and papers of the corporation, though of necessity kept in some one hand, are the common property of all the stockholders." When the same case was before this court again (113 Pa. 563, 572, 6 Atl. 75, 79), it was said: "Under the circumstances mentioned, and for the purposes stated, we are of opinion that, according to our ruling when the case was here before, the relator is clearly entitled to an examination of the books and papers of to inspect the stock book, given him by statute, for purposes purely personal, and not connected in any way with the corporation, or to protect the applicant's interest therein. And, if the motive of such person was questioned, it was his duty to disclose his motive so that the person having the books in charge might refuse to produce them if the purpose would work an injury to the corporation, or was purely personal to the applicant and not connected with any interest which he had in the corporation, and that, upon a refusal to disclose the motive, it was fair to infer that it was not a proper one; and a denial of the right to inspect, under such circumstances, would not render the corporation or the custodian of the books liable to the penalty prescribed by statute.

So, where a small number of shares of stock of an important financial corporation has been acquired for the express purpose of making an application for a list of stockholders, to be used for the benefit of third persons, whose names are not disclosed, and for purposes not disclosed, mandamus will not be granted. People ex rel. Hunter v. National Park Bank, 122 App. Div. 635, 107 N. Y. Supp. 369.

A second demand by a stockholder to be allowed to make a complete transcript of the stock book of a foreign corporation, on the eve of decisions in prior actions between the same parties, which involved the same right and depended upon a question of construction, together with his admission that his only purpose in seeking the transcript was to facilitate him in circularizing to effect the sale of stock of other companies in which he was interested, was held, in Althouse v. Giroux, 56 Misc. 511, 107 N. Y. Supp. 193, sufficient to show that the plaintiff was not actuated by an honest purpose in making the demand; and his right to recover a penalty for the refusal of the demand was therefore denied.

And in People ex rel. Althouse v. Giroux Consol. Mines Co. 122 App. Div. 617, 107 N. Y. Supp. 188, where the object in making extracts from the stock book of a corporation was to obtain a list of the stockholders and 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

their addresses, to be used for circularizing purposes for the sale of stock in other companies in which the applying stockholder was interested, and to take up the question of negotiating loans to such stockholders upon their stock as collateral security, mandamus to compel inspection was denied, the court holding the purpose was improper.

But in Lawshe v. Royal Baking Powder Co. 54 Misc. 220, 104 N. Y. Supp. 361, a stockholder of record, who acquired stock in a foreign corporation in order to procure an inspection of the stock book, to obtain information as to the various holders of common stock in order to communicate with them for the purpose of buying stock from, or selling stock to, them, was held to present a proper purpose for examination under § 53; and that, upon the refusal of his application to inspect, he could maintain an action for the penalty provided by statute for such refusal.

Effect of limiting by-law or statute.

U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5241, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3517, which provides that no association shall be subject to any visitatorial powers, other than such as are authorized by this title, or vested in the courts of justice, does not interfere with, or cut off, the common-law right of a shareholder in a corporation to inspect the books of the corporation. Guthrie v. Harkness, 199 U. S. 148, 50 L. ed. 130, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 4, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 433.

Neither is a stockholder's common-law right of inspection affected by a statute conferring upon him a limited right. State ex rel. Watkins v. Donnell Mfg. Co. 129 Mo. App. 206, 107 S. W. 1112.

In Hodgens v. United Copper Co. (N. J. L.) 67 Atl. 756, one ground for resisting the mandamus sought was a by-law to the effect that no stockholder should have any right to inspect any account or book or document of the corporation, except as conferred by statute, or authorized by resolution of the board of directors, or by a resolution of the stockholders. But the court said that this by-law did not change the statutory power of the court to order the the company. Such a right is, of course, not to be exercised to gratify curiosity, or for speculative purposes, but in good faith and for a specific, honest purpose, and where there is a particular matter in dispute, involving and affecting seriously the rights of the relator as a stockholder. . . . A stockholder in a trading corporation must certainly have some rights which a board of directors should respect. Sellers [the relator] was not bound to accept the mere statement of the board, whether under oath or otherwise, as to the contents of the books, etc. He had a right to a reasonable personal inspection of them, and, with the aid of a disinterested expert, might make such extracts as were reasonably required in the preparation of the bill he proposed to bring."

books to be brought into the state, and, when within the state, to be examined by the stockholders; that the statutory authority to order the books to be brought within the state would be a futile power if, when the books are within the state, such a provision or by-law could nullify the order of the court for the stockholders to inspect and examine the books. It was also said that such a by-law, if construed to give the right to a corporation thus to defeat the right of a stockholder to inspect the books of the company, would be oppressive and unreasonable.

A by-law authorizing the directors, in their discretion, to deny stockholders an inspection of the books, and making the action of the directors final, is unreasonable and void. State ex rel. Lindsay v. Jessup & M. Paper Co. (Del.) 72 Atl. 1057.

Who entitled to enforce.

A stockholder in a corporation, in order to secure the aid of the court by its writ of mandamus to enforce the right to inspect the stock book of the corporation given to stockholders by § 29 of the stock corporation law, must first have his name entered in the stock book of the corporation as an owner of some of its capital stock. Re Reiss, 30 Misc. 234, 62 N. Y. Supp. 145.

Butterfly-Terrible Gold Min. Co. v. Brind, 41 Colo. 29, 91 Pac. 1101, also holds that the holder of shares of stock in a corporation is not entitled to exercise the right to inspect the books of the corporation, given him by statute, until he has had the transfer of stock to him entered upon the books of the company as therein provided.

A stockholder who applies for a mandamus to enforce his right to inspect the books of the corporation loses his right to relief where he disposes of his stock while his appeal from an order denying him the writ is pending. State ex rel. Fears v. New Orleans Maritime & Merchants' Exchange, 112 La. 868, 36 So. 760.

Assistance of attorney, stenographer, or accountant.

Where a stockholder is entitled to inspect the books and records of the corporation, if 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Huyler v. Cragin Cattle Co. 40 N. J. Eq. 392, 398, 2 Atl. 274, 278, it was said by Chancellor Runyon, delivering the opinion: "Stockholders are entitled to inspect the books of the company for proper purposes at proper times. . . . Such a right is necessary to their protection. To say that they have the right, but that it can be enforced only when they have ascertained, in some way without the books, that their affairs have been mismanaged, or that their interests are in danger, is practically to deny the right in the majority of cases. Oftentimes frauds are discoverable only by examination of the books by an expert accountant. The books are not the private property of the directors or managers, but are the records of their transactions as trustees for the stockholders. It will better enable him to exercise this right to have the assistance of an attorney, accountant, or stenographer, he is entitled to such assistance, subject, of course, to the limitation that in the exercise of the right the ordinary affairs of the company will not be unduly interfered with. State ex rel. Johnson v. St. Louis Transit Co. 124 Mo. App. 111, 100 S. W. 1126; Varney v. Baker, 194 Mass. 239, 80 N. E. 524, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 989.

Cincinnati Volksblatt Co. v. Hoffmeister, 62 Ohio St. 189, 48 L.R.A. 732, 78 Am. St. Rep. 707, 56 N. E. 1033, also holds that the right given by statute to a stockholder to inspect the books of the corporation is an incident to the ownership of stock, and may be exercised at any reasonable time so long as the relation of stockholder exists. That the right to take copies and records, either in person or by agent, follows as an incident the right to inspect. "It rests, as does the entire right to examination rest, upon the broad ground that the business of the corporation is not the business of the officers exclusively, but is the business of the stockholders."

And Clawson v. Clayton, 33 Utah, 266, 93 Pac. 729, holds that the right given by statute to bona fide stockholders to inspect the books of the corporation is not a personal right in the sense that the examination must be personally conducted, but that the right thus conferred may be exercised by an agent or attorney of the stockholder.

In considering this question, in People ex rel. Lorge v. Consolidated Nat. Bank, 105 App. Div. 409, 94 N. Y. Supp. 173, it was held that the right of inspection, given by both §§ 29 and 53 of the stock corporation law, carried with it the right to make such extracts from the books as would enable the shareholder to retain the information disclosed by the inspection.

To the same effect are Fay v. Coughlin-Sandford Switch Co. 47 Misc. 687, 94 N. Y. Supp. 628, and Althaus v. Giroux, 56 Misc. 509, 107 N. Y. Supp. 191.

To what corporations applicable.

A state court has jurisdiction to issue a mandamus to compel a national bank to holders." In the case in hand the petitioner avers that the information he seeks is necessary to enable him, as he purposes doing, to file a bill in equity against the company and its officers to restrain them from mismanaging the business of the company. The truth of this averment is apparent, and, unless the petitioner secures the information, it is very doubtful whether he can maintain a bill against the defendant company and its officers. He has been denied all information as to the business of the corporation, and his only remedy is the one he invokes in this proceeding. It may be that, when he examines the books and papers of the corporation, he will be satisfied that the company's affairs have been properly conducted by the officers, but, under the facts disclosed in his petition, that is no reason for denying him an opportunity for examining the books and papers of the company so that he may satisfy himself of the condition of its affairs in order to protect his investment in the company. So far as the record discloses, the relator has presented sufficient facts in his petition to warrant his allegation of mismanagement, and he has, therefore, the right to examine the books and papers of the company. The mandamus was properly awarded.

The assignments of error are overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.

submit its books to an examination by a stockholder for a proper purpose. Guthrie v. Harkness, 199 U. S. 148, 50 L. ed. 130. 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 4, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 433.

Shareholders of a national bank in process of liquidation are entitled to the aid of state courts to enforce the right to inspect its books and records. Tuttle v. Iron Nat. Bank, 170 N. Y. 9, 62 N. E. 761.

The constitutional right of stockholders to inspect applies to a benevolent or charitable corporation. Garvin v. Pacific Coast Marine Firemen's Union, 2 Cal. App. 638, 84 Pac. 270.

The right of a stockholder to inspect the books of a corporation applies as well to a stockholder of a fire insurance company as to any other corporation. Re Coats, 73 App. Div. 178, 76 N. Y. Supp. 730.

In People ex rel. Venner v. New York L. Ins. Co. 111 App. Div. 183, 97 N. Y. Supp. 465, a distinction was made between a policy holder's right to inspect the books of a life insurance company which issued his policy, and the right of stockholders to inspect the books of a corporation; and it was held that a mutual life insurance company did not come within the provisions of § 29 of the stock corporation law requiring corporations to keep a book containing a list of its stockholders open to the inspection of such stockholders. The court said that no such duty rested upon a mutual life insurance company, and that therefore such section did not apply.

In Nettles v. McConnell, 151 Ala. 538, 43 So. 838, it was held that a foreign corporation doing business within the state, and having books and papers connected with its operations in the custody of its officers and agents of the state, would be treated, as to such books, papers, and persons, as a domestic corporation; and that therefore § 1274, Code 1896, providing for the inspection of the books of all private corporations by stockholders, would apply.

Remedy.

The doctrine was stated in Hub Constr. Co. v. New England Breeders' Club, 74 N. H. 282, 67 Atl. 574, that mandamus was the proper remedy to enforce the right of corporate stockholders and creditors, given by 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

statute, to inspect the books and records of the corporation. The case, however, involved mandamus by a creditor.

Maeder v. Buffalo Bill's Wild West Co. 132 Fed. 280, held that the usual remedy of a stockholder to enforce his right to inspect the books of the corporation, and to compel the books of a foreign corporation to be brought within the state for that purpose, was by mandamus. The court said that he could receive no aid for such a purpose by a bill in equity; and that, if the purpose in compelling the books of a foreign corporation to be brought within the state was for evidential purposes in the proceeding in equity in which the motion to that effect was made, before he could entitle himself to an order to produce the books he must, where his bill of complaint had been demurred to, show a right to maintain his bill. In this case the demurrer to the bill was sustained because of a want of equity in, and it was therefore held that any remedy the stockholder had to compel the inspection of the books of the corporation was by mandamus, and not by a bill in equity.

So, in Trimble v. American Sugar Ref. Co. 61 N. J. Eq. 340, 48 Atl. 912, the court sustained a demurrer to a bill in equity, by a stockholder to restrain his corporation from engaging in a course of business alleged to be ultra vires and unlawful; also to compel a dividend out of surplus money alleged to be concealed by the corporation, and for a discovery as to certain alleged unlawful contracts by the corporation, and also as to its present financial condition, property, investments, etc. One ground of the demurrer was that the discovery prayed for could be had by proceedings to inspect the books and papers of the corporation. While the demurrer was sustained generally for want of equity in the bill, the court, as to this particular ground of demurrer, said that the complainant's remedy was by mandamus in a court of law to compel defendant to permit an inspection of the books by the complainant, aided, if necessary, by a petition under the statute to this court, or any other court, to compel the defendant to bring the books into this state for inspection.

Fuller v. Alexander, Hollander & Co. 61 N. J. Eq. 648, 88 Am. St. Rep. 456, 47 Atl. 646, also held that a stockholder of a domestic tic corporation, whose books and papers were kept out of the state, was not entitled to an order of a court of chancery in a proceeding instituted for that purpose, requiring the corporation to produce all its books, papers, etc., at a stated time and place, within the state, in order that such stockholder might make an examination and copies thereof. The basis of the decision was that the sole remedy of a stockholder, wrongfully refused inspection of the books and papers of his corporation, was by mandamus; and that, while the court of chancery in a suit pending before it, over which it had jurisdiction, might, upon proper cause shown, summarily order all the books of a domestic corporation to be forthwith brought within the state and kept therein at such place and for such time as might be designated in the order, yet this right given by statute did not authorize the court of chancery to assume jurisdiction in a proceeding, the sole purpose of which was to enforce the right of a stockholder to inspect the books of the corporation.

Crown Coal & Tow Co. v. Thomas, 60 Ill. App. 234, in holding that it was the duty of a domestic corporation which had its principal office and place of business in another state to keep the records and books of account at its principal office in the state of Illinois, so that the same might be open to the inspection of the stockholders, also held that mandamus was the proper remedy to secure this right to the stockholders.

But State ex rel. Watkins v. North American Land & Timber Co. 106 La. 621, 87 Am. St. Rep. 309, 31 So. 172, holds that, where certain books of a foreign corporation were not kept within the state, the court had no jurisdiction by mandamus to compel the corporation to submit such books to the inspection of a stockholder, although by the laws of the state the company was required to keep the books, or copies thereof, within the state.

Mitchell v. Northern Security Oil & Transp. Co. 44 Misc. 514, 90 N. Y. Supp. 60, affirmed in 91 N. Y. Supp. 1104, also holds that the courts of New York have no jurisdiction by mandamus to compel a foreign corporation to submit its books to a stockholder for inspection where the books are not kept within the state.

A Federal circuit court will not take jurisdiction of an application for a mandamus by a stockholder to compel an inspection of the books of the bank where the pleadings fail to show that the matter in dispute exceeds $2,000. People ex rel. Lorge v. Consolidated Nat. Bank, 105 App. Div. 409, 94 N. Y. Supp. 173.

Cincinnati Volksblatt Co. v. Hoffmeister, 62 Ohio St. 189, 48 L.R.A. 732, 78 Am. St. Rep. 707, 56 N. E. 1033, construing Rev. Stat. 6741, which provides that "mandamus is a writ issued in the name of the state, to an inferior tribunal, a corporation, board, or person commanding the performance of an act which the law specifically enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station;" together with § 6744, which reads 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that it "must not be issued in a case where there is a plain and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of the law,"—held that mandamus was not, but injunction was, the proper remedy to be pursued by a stockholder to enforce the right to inspect the books of his corporation, given him by § 3254.

In Brewster v. F. G. Brewster Co. 127 App. Div. 729, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1026, where an administrator sought to determine whether there was any agreement between his decedent and a third person as to the equal control of the corporation, and whether an issue of stock, putting control of the corporation in the defendants, was authorized, the court said that the better practice would be to examine the officers, and thus ascertain what books or accounts might be necessary to examine to obtain the knowledge sought, and then obtain an order for such books as were shown to be material. It appearing that the defendants had offered the inspection of books of this character prior to the application for the mandamus, the application was denied.

The doctrine was enunciated in Bourdette v. Seward, 52 La. Ann. 1333, 27 So. 724, that the legal right of a stockholder of a corporation to examine the corporate books was a right which gave him a cause of action at law for damages against the corporate officers should they refuse to allow the inspection. The case involved the question of the measure of damages.

The foregoing doctrine was reaffirmed in the same case when again before the court in 107 La. 258, 31 So. 630.

Demand and refusal.

Latimer v. Herzog Teleseme Co. 75 App. Div. 522, 78 N. Y. Supp. 314, holds that a stockholder is not entitled to a peremptory mandamus to examine books, etc., of the company where the petition and affidavit for mandamus merely allege that the petitioner has no knowledge of the condition and the affairs of the corporation, or the names of its stockholders, and that it is necessary to examine the books of account and the stock books and list of stockholders to ascertain the names and residence of the other stockholders of the company so that the petitioner may confer with them as to the management by the present officers of the affairs, where no demand was made upon the corporation for this information prior to the application for mandamus.

While the right of a stockholder to inspect the books, records, and papers of a corporation was recognized in Mathews v. McClaughry, 83 Ill. App. 224, the petition for mandamus was dismissed because it was directed against an officer of the corporation, and the petition did not show that such officer had ever refused the right to inspect, or had interposed any obstruction thereto.

It is not necessary to show that a demand for the inspection was made during business hours, or that it was made at the place of business of the corporation, or that the person making the demand was the agent of the applicant, or had any legal right to represent her in the transaction. State ex rel. Weinberg v. Pacific Brewing & Malting Co. 21 Wash. 451, 47 L.R.A. 208, 58 Pac. 584.

A prima facie case is made entitling a stockholder to the penalty provided by § 53 of the stock corporation law, on showing that he made a demand to be allowed to inspect the stock book, upon a person who claimed and appeared to be in charge of the office of the corporation, and who stated that the books of the corporation were kept there, but refused to allow the plaintiff to inspect them. Pelletreau v. Greene Consol. Gold Min. Co. 49 Misc. 233, 97 N. Y. Supp. 391.

McClintock v. Young Republicans, 210 Pa. 115, 68 L.R.A. 459, 105 Am. St. Rep. 784, 59 Atl. 691, held it to be a sufficient demand and refusal where a member of an incorporated association demanded a list of the members of the association and was refused the information by the board of directors and the corresponding secretary, whose duty required him to keep a list of the membership, and who had the list in his possession at the time of the demand.

Bay State Gas Co. v. State, 4 Penn. (Del.) 238, 56 Atl. 1114, in construing § 29 of the general corporation law of Delaware, 1901, which, in substance, provides that the original or duplicate stock ledger, containing the names and addresses of stockholders, and the number of shares held by them respectively, shall at all times during the usual hours for business be open to the examination of every stockholder at its principal office or place of business, held that it was sufficient to entitle the shareholder of a domestic corporation to a mandamus to enforce the right of inspection given him by this statute, if his petition for mandamus showed that he was a stockholder, and that he had made a proper demand on the corporation at its principal office or place of business to inspect the books, and there had been either an express refusal or such conduct on the part of the corporation as was equivalent to a refusal. In this case the stockholder had commenced to examine the stock ledger of the defendant corporation at its office in the state of New York; before the examination was completed he was told that the office at New York had been closed, and the transfer books sent to Philadelphia; at Philadelphia he was informed that the stock book had been turned over to the president of the corporation, who was in Wilmington, Delaware; he then applied at the principal office of the company in Wilmington for the purpose of inspecting the stock book, on six different days, and on each day found the office closed; he thereupon made a demand in writing upon the president for the privilege of inspecting the stock book, but received no answer thereto. The court said that this conduct on the part of the corporation and its officers was equivalent to a refusal of the right to inspect.

Misc. 822, 74 N. Y. Supp. 865, held that the penalty provided by § 29 for the refusal to permit a stockholder to examine the stock book of the corporation attached only to an unlawful neglect or refusal. It was therefore held that no penalty was incurred, where, upon a stockholder requesting to examine the stock book, he was informed by the treasurer of the company that the book was not at the office, but was at his house, and it was mutually agreed that he would call again the next day. The treasurer promised that he would have the book there the next day, which he did, but the stockholder did not call, and, instead, sued for the penalty.

So, in Lozier v. Saratoga Gas, Electric Light, & P. Co. 59 App. Div. 390, 69 N. Y. Supp. 247, where the agent of a stockholder was told, in response to his demand to examine the stock book, that it was not at that office, but was at the office of the president of the corporation, only a short distance away, where he was at liberty to examine it, no penalty was held to have been incurred within the meaning of § 29, since this conduct did not amount to either a refusal or a neglect to exhibit the book.

An officer of a foreign corporation is not liable to the penalty imposed by § 53 of the stock corporation law for a refusal to allow a stockholder to inspect the stock book of the corporation, unless it is shown to have been in his possession at the time demand was made upon him to inspect it. Gould v. Olympic Min. Co. 49 Misc. 612, 96 N. Y. Supp. 455.

And in Billingham v. E. P. Gleason Mfg. Co. 43 Misc. 681, 88 N. Y. Supp. 398, the secretary of a corporation was held not liable to a stockholder for the penalty provided in § 29 for a refusal to allow a stockholder to inspect the stock book of the corporation, where it appeared that no such book was kept by the corporation. The court said that the secretary could not be said to have neglected or refused to exhibit a book that was not in existence at the time the demand for the inspection was made upon him.

But a stockholder in a foreign corporation, who makes a demand upon the corporation to examine the stock book, is entitled to the penalty provided by § 531 of the stock corporation law, where it appeared that no stock book complying with the requirements of this statute was kept at the office of the corporation within the state, and where it also appeared that the stockholder was refused the right to take extracts from an incomplete stock book kept by the corporation. Fay v. Coughlin-Sandford Switch Co. 47 Misc. 687, 94 N. Y. Supp. 628.

A stockholder who on one day applied to the secretary of a foreign corporation for permission to inspect the stock book, and was refused, and on the following day made a similar demand with the same result, and on the next day made a demand upon the president, which at the time was refused, but was subsequently complied with, was held, in Cox v. Paul, 175 N. Y. 328, 67 N. E. 586, to have, in substance, made but one demand and met with but one refusal; he was therefore held entitled to but one penalty under § 53 of the stock corporation law.

To the same effect, under § 29 of the stock corporation law, applied to domestic corporations, is Walcott v. Little, 46 Misc. 96, 91 N. Y. Supp. 411.

But it was held in Gould v. Olympic Min. (Co. supra, under § 53 of the stock corporation law referring to foreign corporations, that an action for a penalty against a corporation is not a bar to a subsequent action to recover a penalty for a refusal occurring after the commencement of the first action.

Matters of procedure.

In McClintock v. Young Republicans, supra, it was held that the corporation by its directors, and the corresponding secretary, were the only parties necessary to be named in an alternative writ of mandamus in behalf of a stockholder to secure the inspection of a list of members, they being the only parties named in the alternative writ who, in the language of the 7th section of the statute referring to such writs, had "the power and whose duty it is to do the act required."

Where eight separate and independent corporations had a common secretary, who was the custodian of the books of each of the corporations, it was held in Merrill v. Suffa, 42 Colo. 195, 93 Pac. 1099, to be a misjoinder of parties respondent where a stockholder, having stock in each of such corporations, filed a single petition for a mandamus to compel respondent, as secretary of each company, to allow him the privilege of access to the books and papers of the different corporations.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

AGNES Y. HOLBERT

v.

CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, Appt.

Municipal corporation — ice on walk — liability.

1. A municipal corporation which maintains, without drainage, a sidewalk along a street crossing a railroad below grade in such a manner that, by reason of its grade and formation, ice accumulates and remains on it in freezing weather so as to be unsafe for pedestrians using it, without any attempt to remove the ice, will be liable for injuries to a pedestrian who falls thereon, if the jury finds that the conditions existing at the time of the accident are due to the city's negligence.

Trial — negligence — jury.

2. Whether or not a pedestrian injured by a fall on a sidewalk was exercising proper care in passing along the walk, and whether he fell from any want of care on his part, are questions for the jury.

Sidewalk — ice — notice.

3. The mere presence of ice on a sidewalk is not sufficient to admonish a pedestrian that, by the exercise of proper care, he cannot pass over it in safety.

Same — assumption of risk.

4. Mere knowledge of the icy condition of a sidewalk leading under a railroad track which is kept open and maintained for travel by the municipality will not preclude one from using the walk without assuming the risk of its dangerous condition.

(May 11, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for Philadelphia County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles W. Boger, Joseph W. Catharine, and J. Howard Gendell, for appellant:

Plaintiff knew of the defect in the highway and voluntarily undertook to test it, and therefore cannot recover against the municipality for injuries sustained in consequence of such defect.

Case Note. — Liability of municipality for injuries caused by freezing of water accumulated on walk by reason of artificial conditions.

The cases upon this question decided prior to 1903 are collated in a subject note to Brown v. White, 58 L.R.A. 321. Only two later cases have been found.

In Walsh v. New York, 109 App. Div. 541, 96 N. Y. Supp. 540, it was held that, where there had been no snow storm, and the streets were not icy or slippery, the city was liable to a pedestrian who, on a crosswalk, slipped and fell on ice about 4 inches thick, which had formed from water escaping from a hydrant maintained by the city, and which hydrant had been continuously leaking during the preceding summer and fall.

In Muncie v. Hey, 164 Ind. 570, 74 N. E. 250, it appeared that a pedestrian fell and injured himself upon a sheet of ice extending across the sidewalk in an oval shape 6 feet wide, 5 inches thick in the center, and tapering to thin edges, formed from water collected upon the roof of an adjoining building and cast upon the walk by an overhanging and projecting conductor; that the ice had formed and remained upon the walk for two or three days prior to the injury; that it was hidden by a slight covering of snow, and

Mr. Lewis Lawrence Smith, for appellee:

The municipal corporation was bound to observe the defective condition of the walk.

Sunbury*, 216 Pa. 89, 64 Atl. 906; Garland v. Wilkes-Barre, 212 Pa. 151, 61 Atl. 820.

The plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence from the fact that she used that route with knowledge of the icy condition.

Mestrezat, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

About 2 o'clock on Sunday afternoon, January 25, 1903, Agnes Y. Holbert, the plaintiff, and her sister, Mrs. Stevens, left that the projecting conductor had been in use for four months. It was held that the accumulation of ice in the manner shown constituted a nuisance which the city was bound to prevent or abate, and, negligently failing to perform this duty, it was liable for the natural consequences; that the fact that the walk was originally constructed in a reasonably safe condition for travel did not relieve the city of its duty to exercise a continuing oversight to keep it free from obstructions; that the failure of the officers of the city to have knowledge of the existence of the ice in time to have removed it before the injury was a neglect of duty, if the ice existed for such a length of time that they ought to have known of it; that, if the city's civil engineer, while acting as city commissioner, directed the property owner so to arrange the water conductor as to cast the collected water upon the sidewalk, and that condition continued through four months prior to the injury, then the city was charge-the former's home on East Walnut lane, Germantown, within the limits of the city of Philadelphia, to go to Indiana avenue. Their direct route was south along Magnolia avenue to Chelton avenue, where they were to board a street car to reach their destination. Magnolia avenue is 50 feet wide, and its general course is north and south. Both the cartway and the sidewalks are paved with brick. The Germantown branch of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad crosses it at a right angle. Only the eastern footway or sidewalk is continued under the bridge, and forms with the bridge and its abutments a tunnel about 30 feet long, 10 feet wide, and 7 feet high on the north end, and 10 feet high on the south end. From a point some distance north of the tunnel or bridge Magnolia avenue descends rapidly to the south side of the bridge; the grade in the tunnel being 3 feet in a distance of 30 feet. The sidewalk under the bridge is paved with brick, but without curb. While there were intakes in the avenue on the north side of the bridge through which water from the street could pass, yet the water which fell on the east sidewalk, and water dropping from the bridge, naturally ran through the tunnel to the south side of the bridge. The bridge prevented the sun from falling upon the sidewalk beneath it. When the plaintiff arrived at the north side of the bridge, she discovered some ice at the mouth of and also in the tunnel. She proceeded along the sidewalk, and when she was about halfway through the tunnel, she slipped on the ice, fell, and broke her left arm in two places. Her description of the attempt to pass under the bridge and of the accident is as follows: "I went on, and I came by picking my way carefully, and I stopped and looked where I was going, and I saw a bare spot able with the knowledge that, in case of rain or melting snow, followed by freezing weather, ice would be formed on the walk in such a manner as to render its ordinary use dangerous.

As to the liability of a municipal corporation for injuries from smooth, level ice or snow accumulated from natural causes on a sidewalk not otherwise defective, see case note to Evans v. Concordia, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 933.

As to liability of a municipal corporation for injuries from rough or uneven ice or snow accumulated from natural causes on a street or sidewalk not otherwise defective, see case note to Bull v. Spokane, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1105.

As to the liability of an abutting property owner for injuries caused by ice formed from water artificially turned across the sidewalk, see case note to Hynes v. Brewer, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 598, which supplements on this point the note in 58 L.R.A. 321.

at my right. I thought, here is a place of safety, I will get on that place, so I could see my way on through the place in safety at that place. Just as I was stepping from the ice that I was standing on, onto this place of safety, my feet went out from under me, and I fell, and I broke my left arm in two places,—at the wrist and at the elbow.” The plaintiff claimed, and her testimony tended to show, that the walk under the bridge, except a few small places, was covered with ice from 1 to 2 inches thick, and that part of the ice was very rough. The bridge was built in 1895, and there was ample evidence in the case to warrant the jury in finding that, during the winter seasons since its construction, ice invariably accumulated on the sidewalk beneath it. It was in evidence that the winter of 1902–03 was “a very hard winter,—a hard, miserable winter. . . . It [the sidewalk] was icy all that month [January, 1903].” This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for the injuries she sustained in falling on the sidewalk under the bridge. It is averred in the statement of claim “that, by reason of the overhead bridge of the railroad across the said Magnolia avenue, ice and snow accumulate under said bridge unless the pavement is kept clean; that it was the duty of said defendant to keep said sidewalk clean and free from ice. . . . But, notwithstanding its duty in the premises, the said defendant did not keep the said sidewalk in good order and repair and free from such obstructions, but allowed the said ice and snow to accumulate there and remain there for a long space of time, and, by reason of its said neglect, the plaintiff was injured.” The defendant offered no evidence, and the case was submitted to the jury upon the plaintiff’s testimony. The verdict was for the plaintiff, and from the judgment entered thereon this appeal was taken by the city.

A municipality is not liable for injuries resulting from the general slipperiness of its streets or its sidewalks occasioned by a recent precipitation and freezing of rain or snow. During the night rain or snow may fall and freeze so that streets and sidewalks are slippery and in a dangerous condition, but it manifestly would be unreasonable to hold the city liable for injury to a pedestrian the following morning, caused by his falling on the sidewalk. Therefore persons who undertake to pass over the sidewalks of a city, made unsafe or dangerous by the freezing of recent falls of rain or snow, know their condition and assume the risk; and, if they fall by reason of the smoothness of the ice, the law imposes no liability upon the city. While, however, the city is not responsible for the general slippery condition of its sidewalks caused by the recent falling or freezing of rain or snow, yet the rule does not extend so far as to protect the city from liability for injuries caused to a person by slipping on ice, in a street or sidewalk, where it has accumulated by reason of a defect in the street or walk, or by reason of the neglect to construct and maintain suitable drains to carry off the water. Decker v. Scranton City, 151 Pa. 241, 31 Am. St. Rep. 757, 25 Atl. 36; Manross v. Oil City, 178 Pa. 276, 35 Atl. 959. It is the duty of a municipality to keep its streets, including its sidewalks, in a reasonably safe condition, so that pedestrians using the sidewalks and exercising care may do so with safety. A sidewalk may be made defective or dangerous by the accumulation of ice or snow, as well as in other ways and by other means. The municipality, however, is not responsible unless the defective condition of the walk is attributable to its negligence. That is the general rule, and one which applies as well where the sidewalk is defective by reason of the slippery condition of the ice thereon as well as by reason of excavations or other obstructions in the walk. The liability for injuries resulting from the accumulation of ice on a pavement is not confined to cases where the accumulation has resulted in hills or ridges. That is not the only test of liability in such cases, as this court distinctly ruled in Manross v. Oil City, supra. There the court sustained the ruling of the trial judge in denying the point submitted by the defendant city that it was “not liable for an injury caused by reason of the slippery condition of the ice and snow upon its walks, unless such injury is caused by the accumulation of ice and snow into hills and ridges so as to render passage dangerous.” The trial judge refused the point, and in doing so said: “A city may be liable for an accident caused by the slippery condition of its streets caused by the negligence of its officials, even where the ice and snow do not form into hills and ridges.” The accumulation of ridges and hills in ice may cause a pavement to be dangerous and convict the city of negligence, but the city is equally responsible if the sidewalk is made dangerous to public travel by reason of any accumulation of ice and snow caused by the negligence of the city. In other words, if an injury results to a pedestrian by reason of a defective sidewalk, the municipality is liable if the defect, whatever it may be, was occasioned by the municipality’s negligence. These principles are settled by numerous authorities in many jurisdictions.

Recurring now to the case in hand, we think the evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the plaintiff’s injuries were caused by the negligence of the city. They were not caused by the general slipperiness or smoothness of the sidewalk resulting from the precipitation and freezing of recent falls of snow or rain. If they were, of course she could have no claim against the city. They were caused by the condition of the sidewalk beneath the bridge, made unsafe and dangerous to travel by the accumulation of ice, which could, and should, have been prevented by the city. The conditions of the place were peculiar. The sidewalk was not the ordinary and usual open and exposed pavement. On the contrary, it was correctly described as a tunnel. Owing to the grade of the street, water falling on the east sidewalk flowed into the tunnel. The water that accumulated on the bridge also fell in and passed through it. The direct rays of the sun never penetrated it. These conditions necessarily caused ice to accumulate beneath the bridge in the winter, and naturally it was liable to remain during the winter months. The water from the walk and that dripping from the bridge formed into ice on the sidewalk in the tunnel. That ice was not reached by the sun and was unaffected by it. The sun melted the ice on the walk above the bridge, but the water would flow to the bridge, only to be frozen as it passed upon and over the ice under the bridge. The inlets at either side of the 50-foot avenue gave no sufficient relief to this condition of affairs. The city made no adequate provision for preventing the water falling on the walk, and that dripping from the bridge, from flowing into and through the tunnel, or for the removal of the ice which, in winter, was produced by this water. The consequence was, as disclosed by the evidence, that since the construction of the bridge the sidewalk beneath it has been, by reason of ice, unsafe each winter for persons who had occasion to use the street. This danger resulted, therefore, from causes under the control of the city, and not from natural causes, such as the recent precipitation and freezing of rain or snow upon ordinary sidewalks. The duty of the city to make this sidewalk reasonably safe for public travel is as imperative as to keep the streets and other sidewalks of the city in a safe condition. As long as this tunnel is kept open and maintained as a public highway by the city, the duty to keep it reasonably safe is imperative, and cannot be evaded or neglected with impunity. From what has been said it will be observed that it was not a question whether the plaintiff's injuries resulted from a ridge or hill of ice on the pavement beneath the bridge, but whether the icy condition of the 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

pavement made it dangerous and unsafe for pedestrians using the sidewalk, and that such condition was attributable to the negligence of the city. One of the witnesses testified: "It [condition of the pavement] was from the water falling down the hill, not having a proper drainage off of it, the drippings of the railroad over on the pavement dripping down, and the water falling down and freezing on the pavement, by not having the proper drainage from the top to get it away from there." In fact all the evidence in the case bearing on the subject tended to show that this was the cause of the conditions prevailing under the bridge at the time of the accident. And, as we have said, the evidence was ample to show that this unsafe condition of the tunnel had existed in the winter months since the construction of the bridge. It was therefore clearly a case for the jury to determine whether the conditions existing there at the time the plaintiff received her injuries were caused by the negligence of the city. This is a street that is frequented by a great many people in winter as well as in summer. It is one of the public thoroughfares of the city, which should be kept in a safe condition for travel at all times.

Whether the plaintiff exercised proper care in passing along the sidewalk, and whether she fell from any want of care on her part, were for the jury. It has been argued that as she approached the bridge she saw ice on the pavement, both in and outside the tunnel, and that therefore it was negligence for her to attempt to pass through the tunnel. That position, however, is wholly untenable. There was nothing there to admonish her that by the exercise of care she could not pass with safety through the tunnel. She had done so on a previous occasion when the same or similar conditions existed. The danger was not immediate or imminent. The sidewalk was in constant use by the people of that vicinity. Of course, other persons had fallen on the ice there, but many others had passed over it with safety. In fact, just as the plaintiff was entering the tunnel, another person came out of it, and passed her. There were spots or places in the pavement where there was no ice, which the plaintiff attempted to use to avoid the ice. Under the circumstances, therefore, it was not negligence, to be declared by the court, for the plaintiff to use the sidewalk. As said in the recent case of Steck v. Allegheny, 213 Pa. 573, 576, 62 Atl. 1115, 1116; "When the testimony shows a defect of such character that the street can be used with safety by the exercise of reasonable care, notwithstanding its defective condition, it is not for the court, but for the jury, to determine whether the injured party performed the duty required of him under the circumstances." Nor was the plaintiff to be driven from the street or prevented the use of the sidewalk by the fact that she, like many others in that community, knew of the icy condition of the walk. As we said in Altoona v. Lotz, 114 Pa. 238, 246, 60 Am. Rep. 346, 7 Atl. 240, 242. "It is not the law that a resident in a city must remain continuously on his property when the city grossly neglects the repair of its streets, under pain that, if he ventures on the streets or walks and suffers injury resulting from the city's default, he can recover nothing. Nor is the resident bound, under like pain, to abstain from going to church in the evening, or other places, when he may be moved to go by a sense of duty or love of pleasure. On his part it is enough if he takes the ordinary care which ought to be exercised by a prudent man under the circumstances."* This street and sidewalk, as we have seen, was in constant use by the public, and, while some persons were injured by falling upon the accumulation of ice, the number was small as compared with those who used the walk in safety. The sidewalk under the bridge was kept open and maintained as a place for a travel by pedestrians, and hence there was an invitation by the city for the public to use it. It was not error for the court to decline to say to the jury that the plaintiff was negligent in using the sidewalk under the circumstances. There could be no question, under the evidence, that the defendant knew of the unsafe condition of the walk. Since the construction of the bridge, eight years previous, it has been dangerous in the winter months, caused by the accumulation of ice resulting from the peculiar conditions existing at the place. These conditions, as well as the danger resulting therefrom, were obviously and necessarily known to the defendant. The danger had existed for years in the winter season, and hence it is manifest that the city must have had knowledge of it. Two of the witnesses testified specifically as to the existence of ice on the sidewalk at that place during the month of January of the year 1903. What everybody else sees the city must see.

The only error assigned is the refusal of the court below to give binding instructions to the jury to find for the defendant, and, for the reasons stated, the assignment is overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

J. H. DOUGLAS, Appt.,
v.
JAMES W. CAMPBELL et al.

(— Ark. —, 116 S. W. 211.)

Action — prematurity — school district.

1. One who, because of the unlawful suspension of his child from a public school, becomes liable for board and tuition in another district, cannot maintain an action for damages against those responsible for the suspension, as soon as he has arranged for accommodation in such district and before he has paid his money.

Damages — suspension from school.

2. One whose son is unlawfully suspended from a public school for a period of only twenty days cannot hold those responsible for the suspension liable for the cost of his tuition in another district for a whole term.

Mandamus — suspension from school.

3. In the absence of direct pecuniary injury, the remedy of a parent whose child is wrongfully suspended from a school is mandamus to secure his restoration, and not an action for damages.

School — suspension — drunkenness.

4. A pupil may be suspended from a public school for being drunk and disorderly in violation of the ordinances of the municipality, although his misconduct was not on the school grounds, where the statute authorizes suspension for gross immorality.

(February 8, 1909.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Randolph County dismissing the complaint in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the unlawful expulsion of plaintiff's son from school. Affirmed.

Statement by Wood, J.:

The complaint, omitting caption, is as follows: "Said J. H. Douglas, for cause of action against said defendants James W. Campbell, J. C. Miller, Wesley Pressley, C. E. Pringle, E. Dalton, A. Z. Schnabaum, and Ben A. Brown, states that he is a citizen and resident taxpayer of the Pocahontas school district (special), which comprises and embraces the incorporated town of Pocahontas, Arkansas, both of which are corporations organized and existing under the laws of the state of Arkansas, and as such is legally entitled to all the benefits of the free public schools taught within the limits of said school district. That the defendant James W. Campbell is the teacher in the public school of said school district of Pocahontas, and is now engaged in teaching a term of free public school commencing January 1, 1907, and ending May 1, 1907, under contract with the directors of said district. That the defendants J. C. Miller, Wesley Pressley, C. E. Pringle, and E. Dalton are duly elected and qualified directors of said school district. That Ben A. Brown and A. Z. Schnabaum are also directors, duly qualified and acting, who are also made defendants herein. Plaintiff states that he is the lawful father of a son, Charley Douglas, a minor under the age of twenty-one years, and who is entitled to attend and receive instructions in the free public schools of said district, and has been in attendance until the beginning of the present term. Plaintiff states that, on or about the ——— day of December, 1906, being one of the holidays, the above-named defendant and Ben A. Brown and A. Z. Schnabaum held a director's meeting in said town of Pocahontas, at which time the defendant James W. Campbell was, at his own instance, also present. Plaintiff states that at said meeting above defendants pretended to act within the scope of their authority as directors, being moved and instigated by the defendant Campbell, expelled and suspended plaintiff's son, Charley Douglas, from said school, and from further attendance upon said school for the term of twenty days from the beginning of the present term then and there by notifying him in writing, he being also present, that he should not be allowed to attend said school, nor be allowed to be on the school grounds, or to associate with the pupils of the said school at said school or on the grounds thereof, stating as a reason for the said act that the said Charley was drunk and disorderly on the streets of said town during one of the holidays, viz., on Christmas Day, 1906, which, if true, was a violation of the ordinance of said town,—all of which is untrue, and which the said Campbell and the other defendants knew to be untrue; and that the action of the said defendants, maliciously prompted and instigated by the said Campbell, was but the carrying out of a conspiracy formed by and among said defendants to deprive plaintiff and his son of the benefits of said school, and to prevent his further attendance for said twenty days; and that the act of expulsion and suspension for said time was malicious as to all defendants, was a gross and flagrant abuse of their power and authority as directors aforesaid, and the effect of which was to deprive plaintiff of his legal, vested, and constitutional rights to have his said son attend and receive instructions, at and in the free public school of said town. But plaintiff states that, if it is true that his son was drunk and disorderly as charged, that it was in no violation of rules of said school, did not occur at or in the school or about the school grounds, and that the alleged offense was not such as to deprive plaintiff legally of his rights and his said son of his rights to further attend the school; that, by reason of said unlawful act of defendants, plaintiff has been compelled to place his said son in another school beyond the limit of said school district, and beyond the home of plaintiff, and to engage and become liable for the board of his son at a cost of $75 for the term ending the last of May, 1907, and tuition in the sum of $20, for washing and laundrying, $20, the purchase of new and different books necessary in the sum of $10, in the aggregate $125, to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $125. For further cause of damage he states that the said act complained of was malicious and without cause; that the said charge was but a pretense for the justification of said act; that the same was maliciously instigated by the defendant Campbell, and so entered into by the other defendants, and that, by reason thereof, plaintiff has been deprived of the company and companionship of his only child, and further states that the effect of the act complained of here was to bring, and has brought, shame and humiliation to plaintiff, and caused plaintiff great mental anguish and suffering on account thereof, whereby he is entitled to and has sustained damages in the further sum of $2,000. Wherefore, plaintiff prays judgment against said defendant in the sum of $2,125 damages, for cost, and for all proper relief."

The appellees filed a demurrer containing these grounds, to wit: (1) That the plaintiff has no legal capacity to sue for the alleged wrongful acts. (2) That there is a defect of parties plaintiff. (3) That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The court sustained the demurrer, and entered judgment dismissing the complaint, from which this appeal was taken.

Messrs. Beloate & Lomax for appellant.

Mr. T. W. Campbell, for appellees:

The father cannot recover damages for the illegal suspension of his child from the public school.

Facts and circumstances of the case must be recited in the complaint, sufficient to show malicious or arbitrary action on the part of the board.

Cochran v. Patillo, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 458, 41 S. W. 537.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The demurrer was well taken. The complaint does not show a cause of action. The complaint does not show any damage to appellant by reason of the suspension of his son from school for twenty days. He does not allege that he has been compelled to pay out any money on account of the suspension. He alleges that he has been compelled to engage and become liable for certain sums, which he names, for the term ending the last of May, 1907. This alleged term commenced nine days before the suit was brought, and ended nearly four months later. So his allegation is in effect that he "will become liable;" not that he has already expended the money. Therefore the suit would be premature even if appellant "would be compelled," as he alleges, to pay the various sums mentioned. But the complaint shows that appellant was only suspended and expelled from the school for twenty days. Appellant, therefore, was not compelled to send his son to another school out of the district. He does not show that his son appeared at the expiration of the twenty days asking for readmission, and that his request was refused. Hence appellant fails to show that he had suffered any financial injury by reason of the temporary expulsion or suspension. He fails to allege facts showing that after the twenty days he was compelled to send his son to another school, or that during the twenty days he was compelled to expend any amount for the education of his son.

2. The parent, unless he has sustained some direct pecuniary injury thereby, has no right to sue for damages for the unlawful expulsion or suspension of his child from school. His remedy therefor is by mandamus to compel the school authorities to allow his child to attend school. Boyd v. Blaisdell, 15 Ind. 73; Donahoe v. Richards, 38 Me. 376; Spear v. Cummings, 23 Pick. 224, 34 Am. Dec. 53; Stephenson v. Hall, 14 Barb. 222; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 772; Tiffany, Persons & Dom. Rel. 267; Sherman v. Charlestown, 8 Cush. 161. And see note to 41 L.R.A. 605. Unless he alleges facts showing an unlawful expulsion, and personal pecuniary injury already incurred by him by reason thereof, he does not state a cause of action. Sorrels v. Matthews, 129 Ga. 319, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 357, 58 S. E. 819, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 404.

3. But appellant does not state facts sufficient to show an unlawful suspension. Being drunk and disorderly in violation of the 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ordinance of the town as charged was sufficient cause for the punishment inflicted. Section 7637, Kirby's Dig., expressly authorizes the directors of any school district, "at the instance of the teacher, to suspend from the school any pupil for gross immorality, refractory conduct, or insubordination." Wholesome discipline is absolutely essential to the success of any school. Large discretion is allowed the teacher and the board within the statute in determining what course of conduct on the part of the pupils is necessary for the good of the whole school. That is the prime consideration. Any conduct on the part of a pupil that tends to demoralize other pupils, and to interfere with the proper and successful management of the school,—i. e., to impair the discipline,—which the teacher and the board shall consider necessary for the best interest of the school, may subject the offending one to the punishment prescribed by the above statute. "Refractory conduct, or insubordination," and gross immorality, are incompatible with that good government in a school which is absolutely essential to its success. Hence these are expressly mentioned in the statute as conduct justifying the somewhat severe punishment of suspension. It will be presumed that the teacher and the board have the best interests of the school at heart, and that they have acted in good faith in exercising the authority with which the law has clothed them. The burden is upon him who calls in question their conduct to show that they have not been actuated by proper motives. But, if the teacher and board should, through malice, arbitrarily, and without reason, suspend a pupil from school, the pupil would have his remedy as we have before mentioned, and the parent also would have his remedy if he has sustained any pecuniary injury by reason of such illegal suspension.

The law on this and kindred subjects is exhaustively reviewed and stated in Board of Education v. Purse, 101 Ga. 422, 41 L.R.A. 593, 65 Am. St. Rep. 312, 28 S. E. 896, and in note to that case reported in 41 L.R.A. 593. See, also, 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 771 et seq., note; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 25, note 6.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

RE ESTATE OF JAMES MOFFITT, Deceased.

(153 Cal. 359, 95 Pac. 653.)

Inheritance tax — community property.

1. The wife, upon the death of the husband, takes his half of the community property as heir, within the meaning of a statute taxing all property which shall pass by the intestate laws from one who shall die seised or possessed of the same.

On Petition for Rehearing.

Same—vested rights.

2. A constitutional provision directing the legislature to define the rights of the wife in relation to property held in common with her husband does not give her a vested right in the property which cannot be subjected to an inheritance tax when the husband's share passes to her upon his death, where the property referred to is community property in which she has only an expectancy during the husband's life.

(April 20, 1908.)

A PPEAL by the widow and executors of James Moffitt, deceased, from a decree of the Superior Court of Alameda County directing the payment of an inheritance tax upon community property held by the decedent. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Warren Olney and Olney & Olney for appellants.

Messrs. Snook & Church for respondent.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the widow and the executors of the will of the deceased from an order and decree made by the superior court of Alameda county in probate, directing the executors to pay to the county treasurer of Alameda county the sum of $26,684.50 as the inheritance tax upon the interest of the widow in the community property of herself and her deceased husband.

Case Note.—Liability of community property to succession tax.

Aside from RE MOFFITT and its companion cases, Re Sims, 153 Cal. 365, 95 Pac. 655, and People v. Lebus (Cal.) 96 Pac. 1118,—which depend upon the MOFFITT CASE for their reason and decision,—only one case has been found which passes upon the question whether community property is liable to a succession tax; and this one comes to a different conclusion from the MOFFITT CASE.

This case is Marshall's Succession, 118 I.A. 212, 42 So. 778, where it appeared that a person died intestate leaving a widow and children, and no property other than that held in community. In an effort to collect an inheritance tax, it was held that the surviving spouse did not acquire, in usufruct, the estate of the deceased spouse by inheritance, and hence the right of usufruct in such case is not subject to the tax imposed on inheritances. The court, in giving the reason for its decision, said: "It is 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The inheritance-tax law of this state, approved March 20, 1905 (Stat. 1905, chap. 314, p. 341), prescribes that "all property which shall pass by will or by the intestate laws of this state from any person who may die seised or possessed of the same . . . shall be and is subject to a tax hereinafter provided for." The single question presented by this appeal is whether the surviving wife's share of the community property is subject to this inheritance tax.

It is conceded that the determination of the trial court that such property is liable for the payment of this tax finds support in the cases of Re Burdick, 112 Cal. 387, 44 Pac. 734; Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 36 L.R.A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170, 48 Pac. 228, and Sharp v. Loupe, 120 Cal. 89, 52 Pac. 134, 586. But it is earnestly contended that this court should overrule these cases to the extent of holding that, as to the community property, the widow has such an ownership or estate or title as enables her to take upon the death of the husband, not as his heir, and not by succession, but by a certain right of survivorship; that, in effect, the wife, during the existence of the marriage status, has always enjoyed an ownership in one half of the community property; and that by the death of the husband her ownership of this moiety is simply released from the power of disposition over it with which the law during his lifetime and during the existence of the marriage status has clothed him. Reference is made to the language of the Civil Code (§ 682), which declares that ownership of property by several persons is either (1) of joint interest; (2) of partnership interest; (3) of interests in common; (4) community interest of husband and wife. We are referred, also, to expressions in some true that the right of usufruct which is vested in the surviving spouse is defeasible at the will of the deceased, but it is, nevertheless, a right conferred by the law, which enters into and forms part of the marriage contract, and of which the survivor can be deprived by no one save the deceased spouse; and it seems to us hardly correct to say that the surviving spouse necessarily takes the usufruct by inheritance from the deceased, because the latter has not made a testamentary disposition to the contrary. At all events, it is a matter within the control of the lawmakers, and they have thought proper to say that the surviving spouse shall 'hold' the usufruct (except where the deceased spouse has, by will, exercised the right of disposing of it), and shall take from the deceased spouse 'by inheritance' only in default of descendants, ascendants, or collateral relatives."

As to the liability of community property for debts, see note to Oregon Improv. Co. v. Sagmeister, 19 L.R.A. 233.

of the earlier decisions of this court, such as the language of Beard v. Knox, 5 Cal. 256, 63 Am. Dec. 125, where it is said: "The husband and wife during coverture are jointly seized of the property, with a half interest remaining over to the wife, subject only to the husband's disposal during their joint lives. This is a present, definite, and certain interest, which becomes absolute at his death." All of these Code sections, all of these cases, and all of these arguments were most ably urged upon the attention of the court in the first two cases above cited, and the conclusion then reached was there expressed in the following language: "Courts and counsel have occasionally endeavored to find some property right in the wife, or some respect in which the husband's interest falls short of full property. I think it will be universally admitted that so far there has been a complete failure in this respect. The first attempt shown by our reports of that kind is in Godey v. Godey, 39 Cal. 157. In that case it is said that, while no other technical term so well defines the wife's interest as the phrase 'a mere expectancy, . . . it is at the same time . . . so vested in her that [the] husband cannot deprive her of it by his will, nor voluntarily alienate it for the mere purpose of divesting her of her claim to it.'" After painstaking investigation and review, and after the fullest deliberation, this court, in Re Burdick, determined and held, as it declared in Speckels v. Speckels, that upon the death of the husband the wife takes one half of the community property as heir. Every argument here advanced against that conclusion was urged by learned counsel in the other cases, and was fully met in the opinions above referred to. No useful purpose can be subserved by a repetition of these arguments or of the answers to them. A reading of the opinions of this court in those cases will establish how thoroughly the questions were entered into, and what a complete disposition was made of them.

It is next urged that, as laws imposing inheritance taxes are subject to strict construction; and that, as it could not have been in the legislative mind that by this act there was imposed a tax upon the widow's share of the community property,—therefore a construction should be sought which will avoid this harsh result. But a familiar and fundamental rule for the interpretation of a legislative statute is that it is presumed to have been enacted in the light of such existing judicial decisions as have a direct bearing upon it. Thus the legislature is presumed to have enacted it with full knowledge that this court in bank, not once, but repeatedly, had declared that the wife did take her share of the community property upon the death of her husband by succession as his heir. The next and necessary presumption that follows is that the legislature enacted the inheritance-tax law in the light of these decisions and to the end that the widow's share of the community property should bear this tax quite as much as would the portion of the husband's separate estate which might come to her by will or by the laws of succession. In other words, since the legislature knew that the latest expression from this court upon the subject was an unequivocal declaration that the widow did take her share of the community property as heir of the husband, if it had designed that the widow's share should not be subject to this tax, it would have made provision that it should be excepted from the operation of the law. If, however, the truth be as counsel urge, that it never entered the minds of the men constituting the legislative body that they were imposing this tax upon the community interest of the wife, it can only be said that for their ignorance they, and not the courts, are responsible, and for their omission they, and not the courts, must find the remedy.

The order and decree appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: Beatty, Ch. J.; Shaw, J.; Angellotti, J.; Sloss, J.; Lorigan, J.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following Per Curiam response was handed down May 29, 1908:

Upon petition for rehearing it is urged that the decision in this case fails to dispose of the Federal question, which appellant presented in argument. To the decision rendered the following is therefore added and made a part thereof:

Appellant further shows that the community property here under consideration was acquired under the Constitution of 1849, and the laws referable thereto. That Constitution, after defining the separate property of the wife, declared (article 11, § 14): "Laws shall be passed more clearly defining the rights of the wife in relation, as well to her separate property, as to that held in common with her husband." Upon these facts appellant argues that the Constitution of 1849, together with the laws passed in conformity with its direction, "conferred upon the wife an equal interest with her husband in the common property;" and it is said that, while the Constitution of 1879 is silent upon the matter of the community property, nevertheless, neither that Constitution, nor any new laws passed under it, can deprive the wife of her interest in the community property, guaranteed and secured to her by the Constitution of 1849; and the question is asked: "Shall this court do what the legislature cannot do and take from her a vested right?" Appellant's counsel answer this question to their own satisfaction by invoking the aid of article 1, § 10, and Amendment 14, § 1, of the Constitution of the United States.

It cannot be doubted, indeed it is conceded, that the Constitution of 1849, in speaking of property "held in common with her husband," does not refer to tenancies in common, as known to the common law, but does mean property of the character now universally designated "community property." Thus, the declaration of the Constitution of 1849, above quoted, amounts to no more than a mandate to the legislature to define and prescribe the rights of the wife in the property of the community. The Spanish-Mexican civil law was, of course, the law in force in California at the time of its cession by Mexico to the United States; and it was the design of the Constitution of 1849 to preserve, so far as might be, to the wives of the inhabitants of the new state (most of whom were at that time former citizens of Spain or Mexico) the rights to the community property which they had enjoyed under the Mexican rule. But, even under the Spanish-Mexican civil law, the wife had no vested estate in the community property. She had rights which may be loosely described as "vested," in the sense that the person to whom the rights belonged was not doubtful or uncertain, but positive and known. In this sense only were her rights vested, but those rights never amounted to an estate. She became vested with an estate only (under certain contingencies) upon the dissolution of the marriage, or upon the death of the husband, otherwise, as sums up Ballinger, after review of the system, "her interest seems to be a mere expectancy during coverture, similar to that under the French system." Ballinger, Community Property, p. 29. And, says the supreme court of Louisiana (Boyer's Succession, 36 La. Ann. 506): "The wife has, during the marriage, no vested proprietary interest in any property composing the community, but only an inchoate right which entitles her to the hope or expectation that, if she survives her husband, she can receive or own one half of the property that may be left after payment of the community debts." And, again, says Platt (Property Rights of Married Women; see Fallbrook Irrig. Dist. v. Abila, 106 Cal. 362, 39 Pac. 794): "The 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

wife has no voice in the management of these affairs; nor has she any vested or tangible interest in the community property. The title to such property vests in the husband, and for all practical purposes he is regarded by law as the sole owner." But, passing from the enunciations of these writers, learned in the law on the subject, we may come directly to the declarations and adjudications of our own court under the Constitution of 1849 and the laws passed in accordance with its mandate, and we find Chief Justice Field, whose study of this Spanish-Mexican system was as profound as his mastery over it was complete, declaring "the interest of the wife is a mere expectancy, like the interest which an heir may possess in the property of his ancestor." Van Maren v. Johnson, 15 Cal. 308. Soon thereafter Mr. Justice Cope, speaking for the court in Packard v. Arellanes, 17 Cal. 525, says: "So long as the community exists her interest is a mere expectancy, and possesses none of the attributes of an estate, either at law or in equity. This was held in Van Maren v. Johnson, before referred to, where the interest of the wife was compared to that which an heir may possess in the property of his ancestor. The same doctrine prevails in Louisiana, and appears to be an established principle of the civil and Spanish law." And, again, Mr. Justice Thornton, speaking for the court in Greiner v. Greiner, 58 Cal. 119, says: "The interest of the wife during the same period [coverture] was a mere expectancy, like the interest which an heir may possess in the property of his ancestor."

It is thus apparent that the construction put upon the Constitution of 1849, and the laws passed thereunder, is identical with that declared in Re Burdick, 112 Cal. 387, 44 Pac. 764, and Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 36 L.R.A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170, 48 Pac. 228. The Constitution of 1879 does not, as did the Constitution of 1849, command the legislature to pass laws defining the wife's rights in the community property because, as for thirty years those laws had been upon the statute books, and as the rights under those laws had been from a very early date judicially determined and settled, no need existed in the new Constitution to call for legislative action upon the matter. For these reasons it is impossible to perceive where or how the inheritance law under consideration does violence to any provision of the Constitutions of California of 1849 or 1879, or to any provision of the Constitution of the United States.

Rehearing denied.

GRACIOSA OIL COMPANY, Resp.,
v.
SANTA BARBARA COUNTY, Appt.

(— Cal. —, 99 Pac. 483.)

Tax — oil lease.

The rights of the holder of an oil lease may be taxed separately from those of the owner of the fee, under a statute providing that the term "real estate" shall include all mines and minerals in and under land, and all rights and privileges appertaining thereto.

(January 8, 1909.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Santa Barbara County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover taxes alleged to have been illegally exacted. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. B. Canfield, with Mr. W. S. Day, for appellant:

The lease creates a species of property which is subject to taxation.

Shaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

• This is an action to recover taxes assessed against plaintiff by defendant and paid under protest, claiming that the assessment is void.

For the year 1904 plaintiff was assessed for taxes as the owner of property described on the assessment roll as "Mining rights and privileges under lease made by L. Harris et al., to Graciosa Oil Co., dated December 15, 1900, and recorded in [referring to the record], in and to the following described lands [describing about 7000 acres of land situated in Santa Barbara county]." The property rights thus described were assessed at the value of $14,950, and on this assessment the taxes in question were levied and paid. For the same year the same land was assessed to the lessors Harris et al., who were the owners of the fee, at the value of $66,150. In this assessment the land was described by sections and subdivisions, precisely as in the assessment to plaintiff, without mention of any deduction from the valuation thereof or of any exception arising out of any qualification, limitation, or burden upon the fee, by reason of the separate ownership of the mining rights and privileges referred to in the assessment to plaintiff. It was found by the court, however, "that the mining rights and privileges assessed to plaintiff was not included, and no part of them was included, for assessment in or with any of the property as assessed to" Harris et al., and that "the said assessment of said mining rights and privileges was not included in and did not include the assessment of any property assessed" to said Harris et al. We understand this finding to mean that there was no double assessment or double taxation upon the same property or interest therein, and we assume therefrom that the valuation of the entire estate and property in the land, as made by the assessor, including the plaintiff's rights and privileges, would exactly equal the aggregate amount of all the assessments involved. The court below, in its conclusions of law, held the assessment to plaintiff void solely on the ground that the mining rights and privileges granted by the lease were not taxable or assessable separately from the land upon which they were operated, and that the lease did not create a separate taxable interest in the land, or justify a separate assessment of the right granted, although the value of said right was not included in the valuation of the land in the assessment to the landowners. The question presented and argued is whether or not, under the provisions of the Constitution and of the Political Code providing for taxation, an assessment of the mining rights and privileges of plaintiff under the lease referred to can be made against the plaintiff, separately from, and in addition to, the assessment to the owners of the fee covering the land itself, but not including said rights and privileges, or, in other words, whether or not the respective rights of the plaintiff and of Harris et al., under the contract, are separately assessable to each.

The contract of lease was dated December 15, 1900. The parties of the first part, named as lessors, were Lawrence Harris, Eleanor Kate Harris, and Harry H. Harris, the owners of the land. By this contract the landowners granted to the plaintiff, party of the second part, "the sole and exclusive right to enter upon the premises (described) for the purpose, and to mine or bore wells, or to do whatever things may be necessary and proper for the development and extraction upon said premises of petroleum, and other hydrocarbon substances, by whatever name known and natural gas (asphaltum included)," together with the privilege of conveying over said land any of said substances produced therefrom, the right to use the water of the streams thereon so far as needed in said business, and of placing and maintaining on the premises "all structures and appliances necessary and useful for the objects of the lease; . . . to have and to hold the said premises and privileges with the appurtenances for the said purposes unto the said party of the second part, its successors or assigns, from and after the date 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) hereof . . . for and during the whole period of twenty years, unless otherwise terminated by the party of the second part [plaintiff?], for failure to comply with the terms of this lease;" provided that, if any wells on the premises were then producing oil, such wells might be retained by the plaintiff and deepened and operated thereafter so long as they continued to produce. It further provided that the lessee should begin development work within six months from the date of the lease, and prosecute the same continuously in good faith to success or abandonment; but that it should have the right, at its option, to abandon the lease at any time that it deemed it unprofitable to hold or operate; and that the lease should thereupon become void. And, further, that, "in the event that oil is found, the lessee agrees to deliver or pay as rent or royalty to the said lessor . . . the one-tenth part or share of so much of all the crude oil of petroleum, naphtha or maltha which may be produced and saved by the lessor from said wells and operations on said premises," not including that required by the plaintiff for fuel in the mining operations.

The contention of the respondent is that there can be but one assessment of these lands, that the assessment to the Harrises covers and includes all other interests, and that, after having made that assessment, excluding the value of plaintiff's rights, it is not lawful to separately assess to the plaintiff the value of its property rights under the oil lease. It is no doubt the general rule, regarding land held under an ordinary lease for years giving the right to hold the land for usufructuary purposes only, that, in the absence of contrary statutory provisions, there is to be but one assessment of the entire estate in the land, and that this assessment should include the value of both the estate for years and of the remainder or reversion. 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 678; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. People, 153 Ill. 409, 29 L.R.A. 69, 38 N. E. 1075; State ex rel. Glenn v. Mississippi River Bridge Co. 109 Mo. 253, 19 S. W. 421. Section 3887 of the Political Code recognized this rule, and provided that "the mortgagor or lessor of real estate is liable for the taxes thereon." This section was repealed in 1880, but, so far as we are advised, the practice of making but one assessment of such land and covering therein the entire value of all interests and estates has been uniformly followed in this state, since its repeal as well as before. With respect to ordinary leases for usufructuary purposes, there are good reasons for this practice. Except when held for speculative purposes, the value of land usually depends on the value of the use and occupation, and consists of a sum equivalent to a principal which, at the rate of interest usual upon safe investments, will bring a net annual income equal to that which the land will produce. The lessor or landowner annually receives a sum as rent which he deems the equivalent of this annual income, or of the value of the use of the land to him, and therefore he enjoys the entire beneficial interest in the premises, including the value of the leasehold as well as of the fee. There are exceptional cases, due to the sudden rise in rental values, where this is not the case. But general rules in regard to taxation must be made to fit the usual conditions and not the exceptional ones, and statutes are to be construed with this fact in view. Since 1880 there has been no express statutory provision on the subject; but we think that, as to such leasehold estates, the owner of the fee may fairly be deemed to be the owner of the whole estate for purposes of taxation.

There are material differences between such estates for years and the right and privilege to bore for and extract oil held by the plaintiff under its oil lease. See Thornton, Oil & Gas, §§ 47, 48. The plaintiff, it is true, does not own an absolute present title to the oil strata in place. Such an absolute estate in an underlying stratum may be created and the estate of the owner of the overlying land and of the owner of the subterranean stratum will be as distinct and separate as is the ownership of respective owners of two adjoining tracts of land. For purposes of separate ownership, land may be divided horizontally as well as superficially and vertically. Jones, Real Prop. § 537; State v. Moore, 12 Cal. 70. But the contract in question vests no present title in a stratum in place. It leaves the title to the oil in the landowner until it is brought to the surface. The right vested in plaintiff is an estate for years, so far as necessary for the purpose of taking oil therefrom, and it carries with it the right to extract the oil and remove it from the premises. This right constitutes, for the term prescribed, a servitude on the land and a chattel real at common law. Civil Code, § 801, subd. 5; section 802, subd. 6; Harvey Coal & Coke Co. v. Dillon, 59 W. Va. 605, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 628, 53 S. E. 928-937, and cases there cited; Thornton, Oil Leases, § 51. The royalty is frequently fixed before the discovery of oil, usually at a time when the existence of oil in profitable quantities is a matter of conjecture, and without regard to the adjustment between the parties of the burden of taxation upon the respective interests. The value represented by the royalty is ordinarily very small as compared to that of the right of the lessee. After the discovery of oil in such leased ground, the value of the lessor's real interest and right is much less than it would be if he had the whole estate, including all the oil thus discovered. There is no real parallel between such a case and that of a lessor under an ordinary lease for occupation and use. It is well known that such leasehold estates or interests in oil strata, after a discovery of oil, often command large prices in the market, out of all proportion to the value of the interest of the landowner receiving only the royalty and enjoying the use only for other purposes. The right of the lessee under this contract is more than that of the ordinary lessee. It is of a different character and for a different purpose. He has no right at all to the usufruct of the soil. His right extends to the extraction of a certain part of the substance of the land itself, to its permanent separation and removal and its conversion to his own use. The whole object of the contract is to effect, if not technically a sale and conveyance of a substantial and specific part of the land, at least a disposition and transfer thereof to another. It can be easily seen that the reasons for the rule applicable to ordinary leases for the use only that the entire estate should be assessed to the lessor are entirely lacking here, and that it would be more just and reasonable adjustment of the burden of taxation of such oil leases to assess each party separately with the value of his right or estate in the land. There is no statute forbidding it. On the contrary, we think the statute at least permits it, if it does not require it. If it is permitted, the respondent cannot complain. The suit is based on the provisions of § 3804 of the Political Code, which give a right of recovery only when the assessment is absolutely void. Mere irregularities in procedure which do not invalidate the assessment do not absolve the taxpayer from his obligation to pay the taxes nor give him any right to recover taxes already paid.

The Political Code declares that all property must be assessed to the owner thereof. § 3628. It must be conceded that the rights and privileges of the plaintiff under this lease are private property, and are taxable in some form. Const. art. 13, § 1. The property rights thus vested in plaintiff belong to it, and not to its lessor. It cannot with good reason be contended that the value of the lessor's estate, including the value of the right to the royalty in the oil produced, embraces, covers, or represents the value of the plaintiff's rights and privileges in the land, as in the case of the lessor in an ordinary lease. It would seem to follow necessarily that the mining rights and privileges of the plaintiff should be separately assessed to it as the owner. The Code recognizes such rights and privileges as a species of property in real estate, and makes sufficient provision for the effective enforcement of payment of taxes thereon. Section 3617 provides as follows: "The term 'real estate' includes: (1) The possession of, claim to, ownership of, or right to the possession of land. (2) All mines, minerals, and quarries in and under the land, all timber belonging to individuals or corporations, growing or being on the lands of the United States, and all rights and privileges appertaining thereto." The strata of oil or oil-bearing sand constitute, as we have seen, a part of the land which may be the subject of separate ownership. There may be a separate "claim to" this part of the land, as well as a separate "claim to" a portion of the surface. A "claim to" take this stratum from its place and then convert it to one's own use may well be termed a claim to land, although not accompanied by actual physical possession of the subterranean deposit. The lease also gives plaintiff the right to possession of the surface of the ground, so far as may be necessary to enable it to bore for and extract oil and as an incident to the main purpose of the contract. The plaintiff's rights may therefore in these aspects be classed as real estate within the first clause of § 3617. The oil strata also constitute "minerals in and under the land," and the rights and privileges of plaintiff under the lease are clearly "rights and privileges appertaining" to such minerals, and consequently are real estate within the meaning of the second subdivision aforesaid. With respect to enforcing payment of the taxes, § 3820 provides that "the taxes on all assessments of possession of, claim to, or right to the possession of land, shall be immediately due and payable upon assessment, and shall be collected by the assessor as provided in this chapter." Section 3821 declares that in the cases provided for in § 3820 the assessor shall at the time of making the assessment, or at any time before the first Monday of August following, collect the taxes by seizure and sale of any personal property owned by the person against whom the tax is assessed; or, if no personal property can be found, then the assessor may collect the taxes by seizure and sale of the right to the possession of, claim to, or right to the possession of, the land. By § 3822 the provisions of §§ 3791 to 3796, inclusive, are made applicable to such seizure and sale. These sections provide for a sale at public auction with immediate delivery of possession to the purchaser. The interests of plaintiff, therefore, come within the precise terms of § 3820, and, if no personal property can be found belonging to the owner, the assessor could forthwith proceed to sell the rights of the plaintiff in the land and in the oil strata and give immediate possession thereof to the purchaser. Such being the reasonable construction of the statute, it is to be presumed that it was intended to have that effect by the legislature. In Bakersfield & F. Oil Co. v. Kern County, 144 Cal. 154, 77 Pac. 892, it was held that taxes on a mining claim were collectible immediately under these sections. There is a statement in the opinion in that case that payment of taxes could not be enforced by a sale of the mining claim. But, in the view of the facts there involved and stated, this evidently means no more than that such sale could not be made as there threatened; that is, without previous search for personal property and a seizure and sale thereof if found.

It may be urged that the second clause of § 3617, above quoted, refers only to mines, minerals, quarries, and timber "growing or being on lands of the United States," and to rights and privileges in such lands only, and has no application at all to lands held in private ownership. We can perceive no necessity for so narrow a construction. It is a matter of common knowledge, and a thing recognized by legislative enactments, that such mining rights and privileges may exist on lands belonging to the state of California. Stat. 1897, chap. 270, p. 438, § 3; Stat. 1880, chap. 117, p. 130; Stat. 1873-4, chap. 531, p. 766. The lands of the state are not taxable. If the rights and privileges of the miner upon such lands are not taxable to the person in possession, they would entirely escape taxation. There is no doubt that the section does include such private possessory interests and rights in lands of the United States, and authorizes the assessment thereof as private property; but it may also reasonably be held to include mines, minerals, and quarries in and under state lands and lands held in private ownership, and rights and privileges appertaining thereto, and to authorize the separate assessment of such property, when held separately from the ownership of the other parts of the land, the first part of the clause referring to absolute titles to such minerals, and the latter part to mining rights and privileges, such as those of the plaintiff in this case. In view of the manifest propriety and justice of such separate assessments, a broader construction should be adopted.

The court below erred in holding that the mining rights and privileges of the plaintiff under the lease could not be lawfully taxed to plaintiff separately from the interest or estate assessed to the landowners. Upon the findings made, judgment should have been given for the defendant.

The judgment is reversed.

RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

MARY C. NICHOLS.

Evidence — Injury — married woman — services.

1. Upon the question of damages to be awarded a married woman for negligent injury to her person, witnesses may state

Case Note. — Right of married woman to recover for loss of time, services, wages, or impaired capacity to labor.

It may be stated as a general rule that, notwithstanding the married women's acts, a married woman who receives personal injuries cannot, in an action for damages, recover for loss of time, services, or wages, or impaired capacity to labor, when used in connection with the performance of her household duties, since her services belong to the husband, for the impairment or loss of which he alone can recover. *Denver & R. To the same effect is Carr v. Easton, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 403, although the court took occasion to say: "There are exceptions to this rule; but the present case does not fall within any of them unless the plaintiff's inability to dress herself be treated as an exception, her injury to that extent resulting in her own personal loss." The court in this case seemingly also recognized the equity of permitting a married woman herself to recover for her impaired capacity to labor, for it said further: "The act of 1887 does certainly give to a wife the right to her own earnings, and this right, under certain circumstances, is superior to her husband's claim to her services. The loss by the wife of her earning power might carry with it the loss of the fruits of this right, a loss personal to herself and one which might, in a supposable contingency, prove a very serious one. Take the case at bar. Suppose the husband of plaintiff should obtain a verdict for the loss of her services, and should then, with the money in his pocket, desert her, leaving her penniless. With her earning power unimpaired, she might be self-supporting; with her earning power destroyed, if without friends, she would become a charge upon the public. Why should she not be indemnified against such a fate. Perhaps the answer is that the supposed contingency might never happen, and that the event of its happening is too uncertain to be made the basis of compensation in damages."

Upon the same principle, it was held in Frohs v. Dubuque, 109 Iowa, 219, 80 N. W.

Pleadings — variance — disease — description.

5. That physicians describe plaintiff's disease as neurasthenia, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries, does not require an instruction that, under the pleadings, no damages can be recovered for it if found to exist, where the pleadings state that she suffers severe bodily and mental pain, is unable to eat solid food, and is confined to bed and unable to move about.

(November 4, 1907.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for El Paso County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought 341, that a married woman, in an action for personal injuries, cannot recover the amount paid by her for domestic service during her disability.

In Bading v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. 105 Wis. 480, 81 N. W. 861, it was held that an instruction to the jury to the effect that a married woman was entitled to recover "for her loss of strength and general ability to pursue her regular avocation," although inaccurate, was not prejudicially erroneous, when taken in connection with the fact that the jury had twice been given specific directions that she could not recover for loss of time.

And in some jurisdictions, even though the wife did work outside her household duties, as long as such work was done to aid the husband in support of the family, and not for her own separate benefit, it has been held that, in an action for damages for personal injuries received, she cannot recover for impaired capacity to labor, loss of time, or services.

Thus, in Plummer v. Milan, 70 Mo. App. 598, a married woman who was injured was not permitted to recover for her inability to perform the ordinary avocations of life, since such services belong to her husband; nor was she permitted to recover for her inability to continue to take in sewing, where this was done to aid and serve her husband in support of the family.

To the same effect holds Dawson v. Troy, 40 Hun, 322, 2 N. Y. Supp. 137, where, although it appeared that the plaintiff was working in a mill for wages, it did not appear that it was upon her sole and separate account, the court saying that the fact that she collected her wages was quite consistent with her collecting them for her husband.

A similar case is Bloom v. Manhattan Elev. R. Co. 43 N. Y. S. R. 378, 17 N. Y. Supp. 812, where the woman was working in a cigar factory.

In Thuringer v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 71 Hun, 526, 24 N. Y. Supp. 1087, a married woman was not permitted to recover for loss of time, although it appeared that to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. David P. Strickler, McAllister & Gandy, and Dines, Whitted, & Dines for appellant.

Messrs. W. J. Chinn and R. P. Ady for appellee.

Steele, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, while a passenger on one of the appellant's cars, was, as shown by the testimony, thrown from her seat to the floor, and sustained serious injuries, for which she claims damages. The record clearly discloses the negligence of the appellant, and her husband had not been living with her for twelve years, and she had worked out and earned money by cleaning and washing.

It was held in Blaehinska v. Howard Mission & Home, 130 N. Y. 497, 15 L.R.A. 215, 29 N. E. 755, that damages recoverable by a married woman for personal injuries cannot include anything for loss of earnings where she was working for her husband under a contract for wages, as such contract is not enforceable, and the damages for the loss of such services belong to the husband.

Where, however, a married woman is engaged in an independent business of her own, whether such business consumes all her time, or is merely done in addition to her household duties, the same rule does not apply, since the married women's acts have placed her in regard to such business on the same footing as a feme sole; and therefore, in an action for damages, she may recover for impaired capacity to pursue such business, or loss of time, labor, or services whatever it may be called. So hold West Chicago Street R. Co. v. Carr, 170 Ill. 478, 48 N. E. 992; Fleming v. Shenandoah, 67 Iowa, 505, 56 Am. Rep. 354, 25 N. W. 752; Dickens v. Des Moines, 74 Iowa, 216, 37 N. W. 165; Bailey v. Centerville, 108 Iowa, 20, 78 N. W. 831; Wyandotte v. Agan, 37 Kan. 528, 15 Pac. 529; Jordan v. Middlesex R. Co. 138 Mass. 425; Boyle v. Saginaw, 124 Mich. 348, 82 N. W. 1057; Gilson v. Cadillac, 134 Mich. 189, 95 N. W. 1084; Smith v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 119 Mo. 246, 23 S. W. 784; Perrigo v. St. Louis, 185 Mo. 274, 84 S. W. 30; Hendricks v. St. Louis Transit Co. 124 Mo. App. 157, 101 S. W. 675; Brooks v. Schwerin, 54 N. Y. 343; Moran v. New York City R. Co. 94 N. Y. Supp. 302; Fife v. Oshkosh, 80 Wis. 540, 62 N. W. 541; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Humble, 181 U. S. 57, 45 L. ed. 747, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 526.

To the same effect is Healey v. P. Ballantine & Sons, 66 N. J. L. 339, 49 Atl. 511, where the court said: "A personal injury which disqualifies a married woman from carrying on the business in which she is engaged manifestly vests in her the right the jury awarded damages in the sum of $5,000. From a judgment in the foregoing amount, the defendant appealed.

It is urged that the court erred in receiving testimony concerning plaintiff's ability to perform her usual household work, and in refusing to instruct the jury that she could not recover damages on account of any impairment of her ability to perform such work, and in authorizing the jury to award her damages therefor. The complaint does not allege any amount as damages sustained for the impairment of plaintiff's ability to perform household duties, nor was the jury instructed upon the subject. No claim was made by the plaintiff that she had been damaged in any specific amount because of the impairment of her ability to perform her household duties. The complaint alleges a permanent disability caused by her injuries received through the negligence of the defendant, and, as showing her condition, the court permitted plaintiff to prove that before her injuries she had uniformly performed certain household duties. Counsel offered the following instruction, which was refused: "The jury are instructed that, if you find the issues joined herein for the plaintiff, nevertheless she is not entitled to recover any damages from the defendant by reason of any impairment, if any, of her ability to perform her usual and ordinary household duties by reason of the injuries complained of, if any." The case Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Young, 30 Colo. 349, 70 Pac. 688, is relied upon as supporting counsel's to recover damages sustained by her in respect to her separate business. The impairment of her capacity to perform labor may be considered as an element of the damages, since the husband's right to recover for loss of services does not preclude her right to recover for the loss of her capacity to earn for herself. The distinction is between the effort to award the wife damages for the loss of service to her husband in his household in the discharge of her domestic duties, and the loss of ability to make earnings outside of the household duties and irrespective of the husband, especially where the married woman is engaged in transacting any business on her own account."

In Schmelzer v. Chester Traction Co. 118 Pa. 29, 66 Atl. 1005, it was held that a deserted wife may sue separately and in her own name to recover damages for the loss of her earning power in the future, sustained through injuries to her person.

In Normile v. Wheeling Traction Co. 57 W. Va. 132, 68 L.R.A. 901, 49 S. E. 1030, it was said that, if a married woman is interfered with in her business transactions, and, for that reason, unable to earn what she otherwise would have earned, the damage is personal to her; and such damage can be recovered by her in an action alone, or jointly with her husband.

In Reading v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 52 N. J. L. 264, 19 Atl. 321, it was held that the marriage of a woman after the receiving of personal injuries cannot affect her right to recover damages for the loss of her capacity to earn money; the court saying that the fact that she, by her marriage, has acquired the right to be supported by her husband, cannot affect the principle in question, though it may affect in a material degree the value of the thing lost.

There is a class of cases, however, among which is COLORADO SPRINGS & I. R. Co. v. NICHOLS, which consider a married woman's capacity to labor, even though she is not engaged in an independent business, as something belonging to herself, and as separate and distinct from her services, wages, time, or capacity to do something the result of which belongs to her husband. These cases naturally hold that when a married woman is injured, and her capacity to labor is impaired, she, from that very impairment to labor, suffers an injury peculiar to herself, for which she herself may recover damages. These cases, it will be noted, are not necessarily opposed to those cases above set out wherein it is held that a married woman cannot recover for loss of time, services, wages, or impaired capacity to labor, as connected with the performance of her household duties, although it must be admitted that it is practically impossible to determine from some of these latter cases, whether the courts by which they were decided would ever concede that an impaired capacity to labor as such might be an injury to the wife as well as to the husband.

In some of these cases the inability to labor is classed with pain and suffering; among these is Powell v. Augusta & S. R. Co. 77 Ga. 200, 3 S. E. 759, a case sufficiently set out and reviewed in the NICHOLS CASE. To the same effect holds Metropolitan Street R. Co. v. Johnson, 90 Ga. 500, 16 S. E. 49.

In Atlanta Street R. Co. v. Jacobs, 88 Ga. 647, 15 S. E. 825, where a married woman was thrown from a street car, resulting in her injury and incapacity to do labor, it was said: "It seems to us that the loss or material impairment of any power or faculty is matter for compensation irrespective of any fruits, pecuniary or otherwise, which the exercise of the power or faculty might produce; and irrespective, also, of any conscious pain or suffering which the loss or impairment might occasion. Every person is entitled to retain and enjoy each and every power of body and mind with which he or she has been endowed, and no one, without being answerable in damages, can wrongfully deprive another by a physical injury of any such power or faculty, or materially impair the same. That such deprivation or impairment can be classed with pain and suffering was ruled by this court in Powell v. Augusta & S. R. Co. supra, and inasmuch as enforced idle-contention that the court committed vital error in refusing to instruct the jury as requested. In the case mentioned the jury was instructed that plaintiff was entitled to such reasonable amount as would compensate her for her inability to perform manual labor; and, in fixing the amount of her recovery, there should be taken into consideration her loss of time resulting from her incapacity to labor. The plaintiff in ness or diminished efficiency in offices of labor is calculated to give rise to mental distress, it is not error to describe the thing by its effects and call it pain and suffering. But it need not be so called necessarily; and consequently it was not misleading for the court to treat of it separately as a subject-matter for compensation in damages, although the plaintiff was a married woman."

In Cullar v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 84 Mo. App. 340, in considering the damages recoverable by a married woman for personal injuries, the court said: "The husband is allowed to recover for the loss of the wife's services, and she cannot include in her damage any loss of time wherein she might have rendered him service. But that will not prevent her from recovering for all those things which injure her, apart from a mere loss of service and society to which the husband is entitled. Physical disability is a personal loss apart from being a deprivation of a money-earning power."

This was also recognized in Perrigo v. St. Louis, 185 Mo. 274, 84 S. W. 30.

In Chicago & M. Electric R. Co. v. Krempel, 103 Ill. App. 1, it was said that the loss of a married woman's ability to work is a personal injury to her, which may affect her in many ways peculiar to herself.

In Minick v. Troy, 19 Hun, 253, affirmed in 83 N. Y. 514, although a married woman was precluded from recovering for loss of services such as belonged to her husband, yet she was permitted to recover for loss of such services as she had "sustained herself and towards herself."

And see Carr v. Easton, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 403, supra.

In South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Bolt, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 906, 59 S. W. 26, a married woman was permitted to recover for permanent impairment of her ability to earn wages by services performed for others than her husband, although it did not appear in the case that she had an independent business; the court taking occasion to say that the same criterion of recovery exists as to her as to a man or a single woman.

A similar case, holding to the same effect, is Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Dick, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1831, 78 S. W. 914.

In Harmon v. Old Colony R. Co. 165 Mass. 100, 30 L.R.A. 658, 52 Am. St. Rep. 499, 42 N. E. 505, it was held that the impairment of the capacity of a married woman to perform labor can be considered as an element of the damages recoverable in an action that case, as in this, was a married woman living with her husband. The court held that, as she was required to perform the ordinary household duties for her husband, and was entitled to no compensation from him for such services, the jury was not authorized to allow her damages which would compensate her for her inability to perform household duties, and in fixing the amount of her damages to take into consideration by her for a personal injury, where the statutes entitle her to make contracts on her own account, and give her the right to her own earnings.

To the same effect hold Millmore v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 198 Mass. 370, 84 N. E. 468, and Hamilton v. Great Falls Street R. Co. 17 Mont. 351, 42 Pac. 860, 43 Pac. 713.

In Giffen v. Lewiston, 6 Idaho, 231, 55 Pac. 545, it was held that loss of ability to labor is an element of general damage, to be considered by the jury in an action brought by a husband and wife to recover for a tortious injury to the wife. The court said: "But it is urged by the appellant that damages for loss of ability to labor on the part of the wife, caused by an injury of the kind in question here, can only be recovered by the husband in a separate action brought for that purpose. We cannot assent to this contention. The rule contended for was the rule at common law, and is doubtless the rule now in those states in which the legal identity of the wife is submerged into that of the husband, and where the time and services of the wife are not, to an extent, her own, but the property of the husband. Under our statutes, the time and earnings of both husband and wife are community property, not owned exclusively by the husband, but the common property of both. In the case at bar both husband and wife are necessary parties. The judgment should run to both. The damages, after recovery thereof, become the community property of both."

Cases closely related to the above are those where evidence in regard to the impaired capacity to labor has been admitted, not for the purpose of laying claim to damages for loss of time, or services from her household duties, but for the purpose of showing the extent of her injury. The following cases are of this nature: Healy v. Visalla & T. R. Co. 101 Cal. 585, 36 Pac. 125; Joliet v. Conway, 119 Ill. 489, 10 N. E. 223; George v. Haverhill, 110 Mass. 506; Young v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 56 Mich. 430, 23 N. W. 67; Dotton v. Albion, 57 Mich. 575, 24 N. W. 786; L. W. Pomerene Co. v. White, 70 Neb. 171, 97 N. W. 232, 98 N. W. 1040; Stutz v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 73 Wis. 147, 9 Am. St. Rep. 769, 40 N. W. 653.

Cases in which the husband was the complaining party, although possibly indirectly deciding what the wife might recover or be prevented from recovering, have been expressly excluded from this note.

her loss of time resulting from her incapacity to labor. Here the plaintiff does not seek damages for her loss of time and inability to perform her household duties, nor from any other impairment of her ability to earn money; and the court expressly charged the jury that she was not to be awarded damages for her inability to earn money or for any loss sustained by such impairment. The court, in the case cited, does not hold that a married woman may not recover damages if she be permanently injured, and that her inability to labor may not be an element of such damage, but does hold that she may not recover for loss of time from her household duties, for such loss is an element of damage which the husband alone may recover. It was entirely proper, we think, for the court to permit the witnesses to state that, before the plaintiff was injured, she performed certain work, including her household duties, and to state what work, if any, she could perform after her injury, not for the purpose of laying claim to damages for loss of time from her household duties, for which she cannot recover, but for the purpose of showing the extent of her injury. That the plaintiff did not seek damages for her inability to perform her household duties as such, and made no claim therefor in the pleadings or in the evidence, is clearly shown by instruction No. 10, wherein the jury was instructed that, "in arriving at the amount of such damages, you should take into consideration the nature and extent of the injuries, if any, sustained by plaintiff, and the physical and mental pain and suffering, if any, she has suffered on account of such injuries. You should also consider whether the plaintiff's injuries are merely temporary or likely to continue for a future period, or to be permanent; and, if you find from the evidence that such injuries, or any of them, are likely to continue for a future period, or to be permanent, then you should also consider any future physical or mental pain or personal inconvenience she is likely to suffer on account of such injuries, as well as those you may find from the evidence she has already suffered." The question whether she could or could not recover compensation for the loss of time from her household duties not being an issue raised by the pleadings or evidence, it was not error to decline to instruct the jury as requested. Moreover, the instruction offered does not correctly state the law. A married woman is entitled to recover damages for the impairment of her ability to labor, independently of the husband's right to recover for the loss of her time. Chief Justice Bleckley, in the case Powell v. Augusta & S. R. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Co. 77 Ga. 200, 3 S. E. 759, expressly so holds, and states in the course of his opinion: "It may be thought that the loss of ability to labor is not pain, but this is a mistake. There is no greater blessing of life than the ability to labor, even though the proceeds may belong to another. It is better for happiness, as well as for virtue, to work for nothing than to be idle. A physical injury that destroys the power of a human being to labor is one of the most serious injuries that it is possible to inflict. True, it is not to be measured by pecuniary earnings where the suit is [brought] by a married woman, for such earnings, as a general rule, belong to the husband, and the right of action for their loss is in him; but the wife herself has such an interest in her working capacity as that she can recover something for its destruction, and what she is to be allowed ought to be more or less according to the length of time during which her privation is likely to continue. Such privation may well be classed with pain and suffering, especially where it involves the breaking up of established habits. To man or woman accustomed to work enforced idleness is torture." The first proposition stated by counsel is, we think, without merit.

The second proposition advanced by the appellant is that "the court erred in allowing evidence of plaintiff's alleged miscarriage, and later in refusing defendant's requests for instructions thereon, and in instructing that damages might be recovered therefor." The plaintiff was permitted to testify, over objection, that at the time she was injured she was pregnant, and that shortly thereafter she suffered a miscarriage. The defendant requested instructions, in substance, that if plaintiff was pregnant and sustained injuries which she would not have sustained but for her pregnancy, and which were the direct consequences of pregnancy, that such injuries were remote and not proximate, and that plaintiff was not entitled to recover; and that, even if the defendant was guilty of negligence, and the plaintiff was injured through such negligence, if such injuries were not of such character as might reasonably have been foreseen or expected as the natural result of the act complained of, the plaintiff cannot recover. In support of the instructions offered, and as sustaining their position that the testimony should not have been received, counsel cite Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Barker, 4 Colo. 344, 34 Am. Rep. 89. At a time when the custom of women was upon her, the plaintiff in that action was compelled to leave a burning car of the defendant on a winter's night, and with but slight apparel. By reason of the exposure, the custom spoken of was suppressed, and she suffered a long period of sickness. The court held that, although she was compelled to leave the car in a half-clad condition and expose herself to the severity of the weather, as the direct result of the company's negligence, still that her subsequent illness was not the result of the exposure, but the result of her exposure in her then condition; and, further, that "the increased risk arising from conditions affecting their fitness to journey, certainly where they are unknown to the carrier, must rest upon their own shoulders;" and the plaintiff's right to recover was denied. The case cited is not controlling in this case. In that case it was not a direct injury which caused the plaintiff's sickness, and her illness was caused, not by exposure alone, but by exposure in her then condition. In this case the plaintiff was thrown violently upon the floor of defendant's car, and as a direct result thereof she suffered a miscarriage. The case of Denver v. Hyatt, 28 Colo. 129, 63 Pac. 403, is more nearly in point. In that case Mr. Justice Gabbert, in holding the city liable to the plaintiff for damages directly resulting from an injury sustained through the negligence of the city in maintaining a defective sidewalk, held not erroneous an instruction directing the jury that, if the plaintiff had a latent disease which would not have been made manifest, or caused her trouble except for the injury sustained by the fall, or that such condition was aggravated by the alleged injury, it might consider such injury in estimating damages. In the course of the opinion the justice said: "The sidewalks of the city are for the use of those with organic predisposition to disease as well as for the healthy and robust; and any injuries which the former may sustain by reason of defects in such sidewalks, which result in aggravating an already diseased condition, are results for which the city must respond, if otherwise liable." And, as sustaining this position, he cites Brown v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 54 Wis. 342, 41 Am. Rep. 41, 11 N. W. 356, 911, which is a case very like the Barker Case, and similar to the one now under consideration. The court held that a pregnant woman, a passenger on a railway train, who was carelessly directed by a brakeman to leave the train 3 miles short of her destination, and who was compelled, being a stranger there, to walk until she reached her destination, and who, by reason of this exertion, suffered a miscarriage and sickness, was held entitled to recover damages from the company for the injury. So that, except in so far as the Barker Case announces the doctrine that a corporation is liable in damages for the proximate results of injuries occasioned by its negligence, it is modified by the later decision in the case Denver v. Hyatt, and that case is controlling in this. It was therefore not error to refuse to instruct the jury that, if the plaintiff sustained injuries which she would not have sustained had she not been in a state of pregnancy, such injuries are the remote, and not the proximate, result of the defendant's negligence, nor error to refuse to instruct the jury, under the facts of this case and the law applicable thereto, that, if such injuries were not of such a character as might reasonably have been foreseen or expected as the natural result of the act complained of, defendant was not liable.

We regard the assignments mentioned in subdivisions 3 and 4 of appellant's brief as being without merit, and shall not discuss them.

It is next contended that the court erred in not instructing the jury that, "under the pleadings, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover damages by reason of her state of neurasthenia, if you find that she is so afflicted;" and the appellant says that no mention is made in the complaint that the plaintiff was afflicted with neurasthenia. The plaintiff alleges in her complaint, "that, as a result of the injury so caused, and because thereof, plaintiff has ever since undergone great and severe bodily and mental pain and suffering, and has received great and permanent bodily injury; that ever since being thrown as aforesaid, and because thereof, plaintiff has been unable to eat any solid food, and is compelled to subsist upon liquid nourishment; and ever since being thrown, as aforesaid, and because thereof, plaintiff has been and still is confined to her bed, and cannot move about, and is unable to do any work of any kind whatsoever." Physicians testified, without objection, that plaintiff was afflicted with what is known as "traumatic neurasthenia." By this they mean that the nervous system, as the result of a wound or injury, had become weakened, and that there is a lack of power in the nerve centers to perform their functions properly. No testimony is set out in the brief from which it appears that the plaintiff was permitted to recover for injuries other than those alleged in the complaint, and we shall assume that her condition of suffering severe bodily and mental pain, of being unable to eat any solid food, of being confined to her bed, of being unable to move about, and of being unable to do any work of any kind whatsoever, as alleged in the complaint, was established by the evidence; and that the term "neurasthenia," as used by the physicians, is the technical name of the disease from which she was suffering.

Finally, the verdict in the sum of $5,000 is declared to be excessive. The record does not disclose that the verdict is so manifestly disproportionate to the injury as to make it apparent that the jury was influenced by prejudice, misapprehension, or by some corrupt or improper consideration, and we cannot therefore disturb it.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM STONE

v.

ELIZA STONE et al., Appts.

(— Iowa, —, 119 N. W. 712.)

Deed — exception — life estate.

An exception in a deed conveying real estate, of "a certain lot of timber" growing on a portion of the land granted, for the benefit of a stranger to the instrument, is an exception of the timber rather than of the land itself, for the benefit of the person named personally, and terminates with his death, the fee then being in the grantee in the deed.

Case Note. — Effect of provision in deed for benefit of stranger thereto.

In Sheppard's Touch. 80, it is stated as one of the essentials of a good reservation that it must be made to one of the grantors, and not to a stranger to the deed. This rule is said in Tiffany, Real property, § 383, to be presumably due to the feudal origin and purpose of a reservation, as formerly understood. And, in view of the fact that a reservation is technically a regrant, the locality of the rule is apparent.

This rule seems to be regarded by the courts as axiomatic; and in the following cases it has been held that an estate cannot be treated in a stranger to a deed by a reservation therein: Jackson v. Snodgrass, 140 Ala. 365, 37 So. 246; Brace v. Van Eps (S. D.) 109 N. W. 147; Karmuller v. Krotz, 18 Iowa, 352; White v. Marion (Iowa) 117 N. W. 254; Hill v. Lord, 48 Me. 83; Herbert v. Pue, 72 Md. 307, 20 Atl. 182; Murphy v. Lee, 144 Mass. 371, 11 N. E. 550; Haverhill Sav. Bank v. Griffin, 184 Mass. 419, 68 N. E. 839; Logan v. Caldwell, 23 Mo. 372; Borst v. Empie, 5 N. Y. 33; Craig v. Wells, 11 N. Y. 315; Hornbeck v. Westbrook, 9 Johns. 73; Hornbeck v. Sleight, 12 Johns. 190; Parsons v. Miller, 15 Wend. 561; Maynard v. Maynard, 4 Edw. Ch. 711; Ives v. VanAuken, 34 Barb. 566; Eysaman v. Eysaman, 24 Hun, 430; Stevens v. Adams, 1 Thomp. & C. 587; Edwards v. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Scott County establishing and quieting title to certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. M. Chamberlin and Walter H. Petersen, for appellants:

The grant was of the fee, and not of the right merely to remove the timber.

Gould v. Howe, 131 Ill. 490, 23 N. E. 602.

Mr. J. A. Hanley for appellee.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Both plaintiff and defendants claim title under a deed made by Henry Stone, Sr., and his wife, Betsey, to Ruth Stone, on or about April 9, 1870, the material parts of which read as follows: "Witnesseth: That whereas the said Henry Stone, Sr., is desirous to make provision for his daughter-in-law, the aforesaid Ruth Stone, and for her children hereinafter to be named, against future contingencies and hers and their support; and whereas the aforesaid Henry Stone, Sr., is desirous that his said daughter-in-law and her children should enjoy the proceeds, rents, issues, and income of the real estate hereinafter more particularly described for the full term of her natural life, free from the control, liabilities, or interferences of any husband that she may hereafter have: Now, therefore, this indenture, witnesseth: That Brusha, 18 Okla. 234, 90 Pac. 727; Young's Petition, 11 R. I. 636; Re Palin, 28 R. I. 12, 65 Atl. 282; Strasson v. Montgomery, 32 Wis. 52.

And it has likewise been said that an exception cannot so operate. Craig v. Wells and Parsons v. Miller, supra; Redding v. Vogt, 140 N. C. 562, 53 S. E. 337, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 312.

Although a reservation or exception in a conveyance will not confer title upon a stranger to the instrument, under certain circumstances it may operate as an admission in his favor, or as an estoppel against the grantor. Butler v. Gosling, 130 Cal. 422, 60 Pac. 596.

A reservation will be considered as made to the grantor when valuable rights are secured to him, although others may be benefited by it. Wall v. Wall, 126 N. C. 405, 35 S. E. 811.

Although the fact that a reservation is inoperative to create an estate or interest in one not a party to the instrument will render it void as such, it has, nevertheless, been held that, when so intended, it may operate as an exception to the grant. See Martin v. Cook, 102 Mich. 267, 60 N. W. 679; Burchard v. Walther, 58 Neb. 530, 78 N. W. 1061; Bridger v. Pierson, 45 N. Y. 601; Bartlett v. Barrows 22 R. I. 642, 49 Atl. 31; Redding v. Vogt, supra.

the said Henry Stone, Sr., in consideration of the sum of one dollar to him in hand paid by the said second party, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, has bargained and sold, and does by these presents grant, bargain, sell, convey, and confirm unto the said second party, the following described real estate lying and being situated in the county of Scott, and state of Iowa, to wit: The west half ($\frac{1}{2}$) of the northwest quarter of section No. five (5), township No. seventy-eight (78) north, of range five (5) East, of the 5th P. M., excepting a certain lot of timber growing and standing in the southwest corner of the aforescribed quarter section, the land upon which said timber is situated more fully described as follows, to wit: Commencing at the southwest corner of said premises, running thence north to a certain creek known as the 'Condid Creek;' thence in an easterly direction following the meanderings of said creek to the first bridge across said creek, known as the Old Slough Road Bridge; thence in a southerly direction on and along said Slough Road to the south line of said premises; thence west to the place of beginning, supposed to contain fifteen (15) acres. Said timber reserve is made for the express use, benefit, and behoof of Henry Stone, Jr., son of Henry Stone, Sr., also the east half ($\frac{1}{2}$) of the west ($\frac{1}{2}$) of the southwest quarter of section No. five (5), in township No. seventy-eight (78) North, of range five (5) east, of the 5th P. M., containing forty acres (40), more or less. The intention being to convey hereby absolute title in fee simple to said real estate, to have and to hold the premises herein described in trust for the uses and purposes hereinafter specified. First. To use for the maintenance of herself and for the maintenance, education, and support of her minor children the aforescribed trust for the full term of her natural life, she to pay from the proceeds, products, and use of said trust all taxes that may hereafter be justly assessed against said premises. Second. To leave the premises at her death in as good condition as reasonable use thereof will permit to her two sons named William Stone and Henry Stone. Third. The said Henry Stone, Sr., and Betsey Stone, his wife, hereby declare that upon the decease of the aforesaid Ruth Stone, the aforesaid trust shall cease and determine, and the foregoing described premises shall belong in fee simple to William Stone and Henry Stone, sons of the said Ruth Stone, upon the express condition that the aforesaid William Stone and Henry Stone pay or cause to be paid to their three sisters the following sums, to wit: To their sister Harriet the sum of one hundred dollars (\$100). to their sister Mary the sum of one hundred dollars (\$100), to their sister Ida the sum of one hundred dollars (\$100), said sums to be paid at the time of their taking possession of said premises; and the said party of the second part doth hereby signify her acceptance of this trust, and doth hereby covenant and agree to and with the said parties of the first part faithfully to discharge and execute the same to the true intent and meaning of these presents. In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands and seals, this 10th day of May, A. D. 1870."

Thereafter, and in the year 1901, Harriet Dickinson and her husband, and Mary Shannor and her husband, Ida Waterbury and her husband, and H. H. Stone and his wife conveyed their respective interests in the lands described in the initial deed quoted to plaintiff, William Stone. The three main grantors in these several deeds are brother and sisters of the plaintiff. Henry Stone, Sr., the grantor in the first deed quoted, was the father of Henry Stone, Jr., and the grandfather of plaintiff. Plaintiff's mother, Ruth Stone, was the widow of Miron Stone, who was a son of Henry Stone, Sr. Ruth Stone died in the year 1901, and Henry Stone, who was the husband of the defendant Eliza Stone and the father of the other defendants, died prior to the time of the death of Ruth. Ruth Stone held a like estate in the property in controversy, and, with plaintiff, has been in the possession of the property since the time of the making the original deed in May, 1870. Plaintiff has paid each of his three sisters the $100 provided for them in the deed hitherto set out, and has received the deeds mentioned, and he, plaintiff, has also purchased an undivided one half of his brother Henry's (or H. H. S.'s) interest. Unquestionably, then, plaintiff owns the fee title in said premises, unless it be found that defendants have some interest in virtue of the exception or reservation clause of the original deed, which reads in this wise: "Excepting a certain lot of timber growing and standing in the southwest corner of the aforescribed quarter section; the land upon which said timber is situated, more fully described as follows, to wit: Commencing at the southwest corner of said premises, running thence north to a certain creek known as 'Condid Creek;' thence in an easterly direction, following the meanderings of said creek to the first bridge across said creek, known as the Old Slough Road Bridge; thence in a southerly direction on and along said Slough Road to the south line of said premises; thence west to the place of beginning, supposed to contain 15 acres. Said timber reserve is made for the express use and benefit and behoof of Henry Stone, Jr., son of Henry Stone Sr." Upon this defendants base their claim to 120 acres of the land.

The argument is that the original deed conveyed a fee to Henry Stone, Jr., and that the clause in the deed referring to Henry Stone, Jr., creates an exception, and conveys the lands therein mentioned to Henry Stone, Jr. To properly solve this question, we must have in mind the distinction between reservations, exceptions, and grants. The nature of a grant is pretty well understood. But a grant may be of any kind of an estate which is the subject of transfer. A reservation is the creation in behalf of the grantor of a new right issuing out of the thing granted, something which did not exist as an independent right before the grant. And an exception is a clause in a deed which withdraws from its operation some part of the thing granted which would otherwise have passed to the grantee under the general description. Blackman v. Striker, 142 N. Y. 555, 37 N. E. 484; Biles v. Tacoma, O. & G. H. R. Co. 5 Wash. 509, 32 Pac. 211; Eisley v. Spooner, 23 Neb. 470, 8 Am. St. Rep. 128, 36 N. W. 659; Herbert v. Pue, 72 Md. 307, 20 Atl. 182. Sometimes the terms are used indiscriminately, and what is described in the conveyance as an exception is oftentimes held to be a reservation. Wellman v. Churchill, 92 Me. 193, 42 Atl. 352. A reservation is never of a part of the estate itself, but is something taken back out of that already granted, as rent, or the right to cut timber, or to do something in relation to the estate, while an exception is of some part of the estate not granted at all. Youngerman v. Polk County, 110 Iowa. 731, 81 N. W. 166. A reservation is always in favor of the grantor, and, if it does not contain words of inheritance, it exists only for the life of the grantor. Engel v. Ayer, 85 Me. 448, 27 Atl. 352. A reservation must be in favor of the grantor or party executing the conveyance, and not to a stranger. Karmuller v. Krotz, 18 Iowa. 352.

With these rules in mind, we now go to the deed which lies at the basis of this controversy, and are forced to conclude from an examination thereof that there was an exception rather than a reservation in the deed, and that this exception was of a certain lot of timber rather than the land itself, and that such reservation was for the benefit of Henry Stone, Jr., personally, and terminated with his death. This exception was not of an estate in the land or any part thereof; but, if it were, it is of a life estate only which terminated with the death of Henry Stone. There can be no doubt that the entire estate in the lands described was conveyed in trust to the grantees named, but that a certain amount of timber was excepted from the grant. This exception was for the personal benefit of Henry Stone, Jr., and would terminate by his death. Henry Stone, Jr., has conveyed all his right, title, and interest in and to the property to the plaintiff, and we do not think that defendants have any interest therein. If any they have, it is upon the theory that something remained in the grantor, Henry Stone, Sr., after his conveyance in April of the year 1870 which passed by descent to his heirs. As already observed, we do not think that anything remained in him, but that the title passed by the deed save and except the timber growing upon a certain part of the premises which was excepted from the grant, and the use thereof given to Henry Stone, Jr., who has since conveyed all his right, title, and interest to plaintiff herein.

The trial court correctly established plaintiff's title, and quieted it against all of the defendants; and its decree must be, and it is, affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

W. E. RATLIFF, Appt.,

v.

J. O. ELWELL et al.

Homestead — pension — exemption — prior debt.

A homestead purchased with pension money belonging to a man, and, by his direction, conveyed to his wife, is not subject to execution upon a judgment against her, although it is based on a claim antedating the acquisition of the homestead, if the purchase was made without the intention of making her the real owner of the property.

(February 18, 1909.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the District Court for Union County dismissing the petition in an action brought to subject defendant's homestead to the payment of a judgment recovered by plaintiff against defendants after the acquisition of such homestead but on an indebtedness antedating the acquisition thereof. Affirmed.

Statement by McClain, J.:

Action to subject the homestead of defendants, who are husband and wife, the property having been acquired with the husband's pension money, and, at his request, conveyed to the wife, to the payment of a judgment recovered by plaintiff against defendants after the acquisition of such homestead, but on an indebtedness antedating such acquisition. After a trial on the merits the court dismissed plaintiff's petition, and he appeals.

Note.—See case note to Bremseth v. Olson, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 170, as to right of husband, as against creditors, to claim homestead as exempt where title is vested in the wife.

Messrs. Robbins & Wilkie, for appellant:

Property purchased with pension money belonging to the husband, but, at his direction, conveyed to his wife, and subsequently occupied by them as a homestead, is not exempt from execution sale for a debt of the wife, contracted prior to its acquisition.

Whinery v. McLeod, 127 Iowa, 11, 109 Am. St. Rep. 364, 102 N. W. 132; Marquardt v. Mason, 87 Iowa, 136, 54 N. W. 72.

Mr. N. W. Rowell for appellees.

McClain, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As plaintiff's judgment was on an indebtedness against both husband and wife antedating the acquisition of the homestead, the property would not be exempt to the wife from sale, under the judgment as against her, although purchased with her husband's pension money, if she was in fact the owner. Whinery v. McLeod, 127 Iowa, 11, 109 Am. St. Rep. 364, 102 N. W. 132. But it was alleged in the answer that the husband was vested with and held the equitable title, although the legal title was in the wife; that the whole consideration paid for the property was paid by the husband with his pension money, and that after the payment of the consideration, and without any intent to relinquish, release, or part with his equity in said property, he, on his own motion, and without any previous arrangement with his wife or procurement on her part, directed the legal title to be placed in her by means of conveyance from the person to whom the purchase money had been paid. This allegation was supported by the testimony of both husband and wife, and there was no evidence to the contrary, nor were any facts shown casting discredit on such testimony. That one who pays the entire consideration for the purchase of property, and, for his own purposes, causes title to be placed in another, to whom he owes no duty to make conveyance, and without the intention of thus making the grantee the real owner, remains the equitable owner of the property under a resulting trust, seems to be well established. Malley v. Malley, 121 Iowa, 237, 96 N. W. 751; Seeberger v. Campbell, 88 Iowa, 63, 55 N. W. 20; Hagan v. Povers, 103 Iowa, 593, 72 N. W. 771; Culp v. Price, 107 Iowa, 133, 77 N. W. 848. The case before us differs, therefore, from that of Whin-

ery v. McLeod, supra, in the retention of equitable title by the husband paying pension money for its purchase. As the real title was not in the wife, the homestead cannot be subjected to the payment of plaintiff's judgment as against her; and, as the husband acquired his title solely by the payment of pension money, he holds such title exempt from judgment, even for antecedent debts. See Code, § 4010.

The decree of the trial court is therefore affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY EX REL. T. G. ALBRITTON, Revenue Agent, Appt.,

v.

W. W. RUBEL et al., Commissioners of Sinking Fund of Lebanon Waterworks Company.

(— Ky. —, 112 S. W. 1128.)

Tax—municipal sinking fund.

Money and interest-bearing securities in a sinking fund accumulated by a municipal corporation under legislative authority to retire bonds issued to secure a waterworks system, the income from which has never exceeded the expense of maintenance, are held for a public purpose, and are not subject to taxation.

(O'Rear, Ch. J., and Nunn and Carroll, JJ., dissent.)

(October 22, 1908.)

A PPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County reversing a judgment of the County Court in his favor in a proceeding to assess securities in defendants' sinking fund. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. W. Spalding for appellant.

Mr. H. S. McElroy, for appellees:

The fund in question is public property used for public purposes, and is exempt from county and state taxes.

Mr. J. P. Thompson also for appellees.

Note.—COM. EX REL. ALBRITTON v. RUBEL presents a phase of the question as to what municipal property is taxable, which is apparently new to the courts, as an extensive search has disclosed no other authorities in point.

Lassing, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was instituted in the Marion circuit court by T. G. Albritton, revenue agent, for the purpose of assessing certain dividend-paying stocks, bonds, and cash held by the sinking fund commissioners of Lebanon, Kentucky. In 1884 a charter was granted by the state legislature to J. M. Cardwell and others as incorporators of the Lebanon Waterworks Company. The capital stock of this company was fixed at $100,000. The company was organized under this charter to supply the town of Lebanon with water. In 1886 the charter of the Lebanon Waterworks Company was amended so as to authorize the city of Lebanon to purchase its stock up to an amount not exceeding 750 shares of a par value of $100 each, and, for the purpose of making this purchase, the city was authorized to issue its bonds, which were to mature at a stated time. The act further provided that, for the purpose of paying the bonds which the city should thus issue, a sinking fund should be created, and that the city should annually pay into said fund a sum sufficient to liquidate the bonds at maturity. For the purpose of managing this fund a commission of three was appointed. It appears from the record that $55,000 of the stock of the water company were at that time delivered to the city and a like amount of city bonds were issued to the water company, and by it sold upon the market. At the time of the institution of this suit there had been paid into the sinking fund each year a sum approximating $1,600, and the aggregate amount then in the hands of the commissioners was about $26,000. The case was submitted to the county court upon the pleadings, there being no disagreement as to the amount of funds on hand. The county judge decided that the property of the sinking fund was liable for state and county taxes, and directed it to be assessed accordingly. An appeal was taken from this judgment to the circuit court, where, in due course of time, a judgment was rendered, in which it was held that all of the property in the hands of the sinking fund commissioners was, under § 170 of the Constitution, exempt from taxation. The petition of the revenue agent was accordingly dismissed, and, from that judgment, this appeal is prosecuted.

For the state, it is urged that the city holds these stocks and bonds and this cash in a private or proprietary capacity, and not in its governmental or public capacity, and that, therefore, it is subject to taxation; whereas, the sinking fund commissioners contend that it is held for a purely governmental or public purpose, and is exempt from taxation. The debt which this sinking fund was created to liquidate was originally incurred by the city by legislative authority in the erection and installation of a waterworks system for the city. The same act which authorized the city to incur this indebtedness required that a fund be created for the purpose of liquidating this indebtedness at its maturity. The city owns all of the stock of the waterworks company, and the waterworks company, in addition to supplying the city with water, is held and operated for the purpose of extinguishing fires, sprinkling streets, flushing gutters and sewers, thereby ministering, not only to the comforts and necessities of the citizens of said town, but promoting and subserving the public health and conveniences of the city. The sinking fund was created for the sole purpose of liquidating the bonded debt incurred by the city in the purchase of the waterworks. It appears that the income from the sale of water has never been equal to, or at least exceeded, the expense of maintaining the plant.

The city is an arm or branch of the state government, and in the administration of its public affairs it acts as an agent of the state, and no property held by it for a purely public or governmental purpose is subject to taxation any more than the public property of the state itself is subject to taxation. In the case of Louisville v. Com. 1 Duv. 295, 85 Am. Dec. 624, Judge Robertson, speaking for the court, held that a courthouse, prison, and such property as was necessary or useful to the administration of municipal affairs, and devoted to such uses, were exempt from taxation; but, when such property was used by the city in its private capacity, such as market houses, fire engines, etc., it was subject to taxation. Since the date of this decision the trend of legislative enactment, and judicial interpretation as well, has been to extend and enlarge the exemption from taxation of the different classes of property held by cities in their governmental capacity, and contributing to the health, comfort, and convenience of its citizens; and the rule announced by Judge Robertson has been materially modified and extended. In the more recent case of Owensboro v. Com. 105 Ky. 344, 44 L.R.A. 202, 49 S. W. 320, it was held that property used by a city in connection with its fire department, and even public parks, was exempt from taxation. In the case of Frankfort v. Com. 29 Ky. L. Rep. 609, 94 S. W. 648, it was held that "the legislature authorizes municipalities to levy and collect taxes for the purpose of building and maintaining waterworks and lighting plants. They are acquired for public purposes and maintained for public purposes. They are paid for with money that arises from the levy and collection of taxes, which can only be levied and collected for public purposes. Water is essential to the comfort, health, and safety of the citizens of the municipalities. . . . Therefore the legislature has recognized waterworks and lighting plants as public necessities. The right of municipalities to tax their inhabitants for the purpose of raising money to build and maintain these plants is not even questioned, and this court has repeatedly recognized that it can be done." In the case of Covington v. Highlands, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 323, 110 S. W. 338, the principle announced in the case of Frankfort v. Com. supra, is recognized and approved. The waterworks being acquired and maintained for a public purpose, paid for with money raised by pledging the city's credit, under special legislative authority, granted only upon condition that there should be created by the city a sinking fund for the purpose of redeeming the bonds at their maturity, it could hardly be said that this fund, which the city was required to create to redeem its bonds, should be subject to taxation. The debt was created for a governmental purpose, and must be paid off and satisfied by taxation. It is too great a burden to be borne by the municipality in any one year, and hence the legislature wisely provided that the burden of its payment should be distributed over a number of years. This annual tax, when collected and set aside for the purpose of redeeming these bonds, is no more subject to taxation than would a balance in the hands of the city treasurer be subject to taxation if there remained a balance at the end of the fiscal year. It is not held by the city for the purpose of making any profit out of it, but only for the purpose designated in the act of the legislature which authorized and directed its creation. But it is urged for the commonwealth that it is invested in interest-bearing stocks and bonds, and therefore the city derives a profit from its use. This is true, but the profit derived from its investment in such stocks and bonds is added to the principal fund from time to time, and this will continue to be done until the amount on hand in the sinking fund is sufficient to satisfy and pay off the bonds. When this period has been reached, the citizens of the municipality will then be relieved of any further burden on this account, and this tax, which has been collected through a number of years, will then be applied to the purpose for which it was collected.

Considered in its true light, the sinking fund in the hands of the commissioners is but so much taxes collected by the city for the purpose of liquidating an indebtedness created for a purely public purpose, and 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

hence it is not subject to taxation, and, the circuit judge having so held, the judgment is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

CITIZENS' FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY et al., Appts.,
v.
LOCHRIDGE & RIDGEWAY.

(— Ky. —, 116 S. W. 303.)

Insurance — party wall — recovery.

The owner of a building supported by a party wall which is injured by the burning of the adjoining building may recover, under the insurance policy on his building, diminution in its value because of the injuries to the party wall, which may include the full value of the wall.

(February 9, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Graves County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due under a fire insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stanfield Brothers for appellants.

Mr. W. J. Webb, for appellees:

Complainant is entitled to full damages for the loss of the party wall.

Spaulding v. Grundy, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 951, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 149, 104 S. W. 293; Sanders v. Martin, 2 Lea. 213, 31 Am. Rep. 598; Willford v. Gerard, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 203, 56 S. W. 416; Campbell v. Mesier, 4 Johns. Ch. 334, 8 Am. Dec. 570.

Case Note. — Insurance; liability of insurer for value of party wall.

But one other case has been found upon the question presented in CITIZENS' F. INS. Co. v. LOCHRIDGE as to the right of an owner to recover under a fire insurance policy for loss or injuries to a party wall.

The case of Montelone v. Royal Ins. Co. 47 La. Ann. 1563, 56 L.R.A. 784, 18 So. 472, presents the same question where a defendant insurance company endeavored to escape liability for the whole value of the party wall on the ground that the adjoining owner was liable for half the cost of rebuilding the wall. The court held that the defendant company was liable for a constructive total loss, and that the plaintiff should be reimbursed for the whole value of the wall. The court, however, recognized the defendant's right by subrogation to recover of the adjoining owner for the half of the wall, and reserved that right to the company.

O'Rear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellees were insured by appellants, a number of fire insurance companies, against loss or damage by fire to their four-story business house in Mayfield. Appellees and Mrs. Bollinger owned adjoining lots. When they bought them, there were buildings on each which joined, and were separated by a common party wall. The wall stood one half on each lot. The buildings were each two-story brick houses. Appellees' house having become damaged or partially destroyed, they began the erection of another and larger house,—the subject of the insurance involved in this suit. They attempted to contract with Mrs. Bollinger as to building the party wall between them two stories higher than it was, but the parties failed to agree. Appellees went ahead and rebuilt their house, using the old party wall as it stood, but extended the party wall so as to accommodate their four-story building. They paid all the cost of building the addition to the party wall. Mrs. Bollinger refused to pay them any part of it. Appellees insured their building with appellants as stated. Mrs. Bollinger's house caught afire one night, and was destroyed. The heat sprung, and otherwise impaired, the stability of the partition wall. Appellees declared upon it as a damage to their property under the policies of insurance. The trial resulted in a verdict, finding that the wall was damaged by the fire, and fixed the amount of the loss occasioned thereby to appellees on their building. We will not stop to discuss whether the damage to the wall was as great as the jury found. There is ample evidence in the record to sustain their verdict. And there is enough, too, to have sustained a verdict for a much less sum. It all depends on which of the testimony the jury believed, and that was their affair solely. So we assume that the wall was damaged to the extent found in the jury's verdict; that is, that the damage to appellees' building was in the sum found by the jury.

The court gave the jury these instructions:

"The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the fire which occurred in the Bollinger building on February 15, 1908, damaged by fire the building of plaintiffs, you will find for the plaintiffs the damage, if any was sustained by them, to the said building, not exceeding the sum claimed, $4,335. And in estimating such damage you will estimate the difference in value, if anything, between said building just before the fire occurred and the same building immediately thereafter that you may believe was approximately caused by the fire; such difference, if any, in value, to 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

be determined by the reasonable cost of repairing or restoring any damage or injury caused solely by the fire.

"The court instructs the jury that the west wall of the plaintiffs' building is a party wall, and one half of same belongs to plaintiffs to the second story, and all the balance belonged to the plaintiffs, but plaintiffs had the use of all the said wall, and the jury are instructed in this case, in estimating the plaintiffs' damages, to consider the difference in value of this wall to their building as the same exists as the result of the fire afterwards."

This court this day, in an opinion handed down in Bright v. Bacon, 116 S. W. 268, had occasion to consider the law applicable to party walls. It is not deemed necessary here to restate the reasoning advanced, or the authorities cited, in that opinion. It is enough to reiterate that each party to the party-wall agreement, in a situation such as this record discloses Mrs. Bollinger and appellees to have been in, was legally entitled to use the whole of the party wall as a means of support of their respective buildings; that each owned the fee to the center of the wall, and an easement in the rest of it; that either had a right to build the wall higher so as to increase the height of his building, but at his own cost; and, if the other subsequently came to also use the extension, the matter of compensation was regulated by the opinion of this court in Spaulding v. Grundy, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 951, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 149, 104 S. W. 293. This is substantially the criterion of appellees' title in the wall given to the jury by the instructions last quoted above. Appellants contend that this gives to the appellees the full value of the party wall in case it is destroyed, and to the other party the full value, also in case her building was similarly insured. So be it. The thing insured was not the wall, nor any particular interest in it. It was appellees' house as a house. A tenant may have an insurable interest in a house, while his landlord also has an insurable interest in it. If each is insured, and the house is destroyed by fire, is not the tenant damaged the value of his unexpired term, and is not the landlord damaged the value of the building, although but one building was destroyed?

Mrs. Bollinger, even if she had insurance upon her building, which was paid to her, could not be compelled to rebuild or repair the party wall. If it was so damaged by the fire that it had to be torn down and a new wall built so as to support appellees' building, then appellees alone had to bear that whole expense. If they do so rebuild it, and if Mrs. Bollinger subsequently elects to rebuild her house so as to tie onto or build into the party wall, she might have to repay appellees one half of the cost, or one half of its then value, but that fact detracts nothing from appellees' present loss. Their building is not a whole building without that wall, and its damage is the diminution in its value by reason of the damage to the wall. That sum which it would require to restore the building in substantially as good condition as it was just before the fire represents the damage done to it by the fire.

We think the instructions fairly submitted to the jury the elements of appellees' loss, and the verdict must be affirmed.

Note. — The distinction, noted by the court in the foregoing case, between invoking the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to justify an inference of negligence as the responsible human cause of an accident the physical cause of which is known, and invoking that doctrine for the purpose of justifying an inference as to the physical cause as well as negligence, is commented upon at page 355 of the case note to Fitzgerald v. Southern R. Co. 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 337, dealing with the general question as to the applicability of the rule of res ipsa loquitur as between master and servant. The position of the court that the rule res ipsa loquitur cannot be invoked for the purpose of establishing the physical cause of the accident seems to be well founded in principle and authority.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Baltimore City Court in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. L. Marbury and Jesse Shingluff, for appellant:

The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is inapplicable.

Mr. Thomas C. Weeks for appellee.

Worthington, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit by an employee against his employer to recover damages for an injury which the former sustained while engaged in the performance of his duties. The defendant is a mercantile corporation carrying on business in the building of the northeast corner of Howard and Lexington streets, in Baltimore city. Plaintiff was at the time of the accident complained of employed by the defendant to make himself generally useful on the fourth floor of its place of business. Some of his duties were to clean furniture, to help carry out furniture, and, more to the point so far as this suit is concerned, to open in the morning and to close in the evening the windows of that floor. The plaintiff testified that he had performed this duty every day during the five or six months of his employment there. These windows were large, their dimensions being 6 by 8 feet, each containing a single pane of heavy plate glass from about $\frac{3}{8}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ an inch in thickness. The windows were opened and closed by means of fixed pivots, one at the top and one at the bottom of the window frame. There was also attached to the bottom of each window frame a device for controlling the window and holding it open or shut, or at any angle desired. It is not deemed necessary for the purposes of this case to minutely describe this device, as there is no contention that it was not in good condition. On the afternoon of June 4, 1906, the plaintiff had just closed one of these windows, when in an instant a great many fragments of broken glass from the pane in that window fell upon the backs of his hands, cutting and injuring him severely.

The manner in which the accident happened is briefly described by the plaintiff as follows:

Q. Will you describe to the jury how you closed that window?

A. It works on a pivot in the middle, and you had to push. The window closed very readily. I had the window closed, and my left hand was resting on the sill, and I was in the act of pulling down the blinds with the right hand and, like a flash, I should judge about 1,000 pieces came out and struck me here [indicating the backs of his hands].

Q. Did the glass fall outward or inward?

A. Some fell outward and some fell inward.

This was all the evidence offered by the plaintiff as to the manner in which the accident happened, and, as he was, at the time of the accident, hidden from view by some furniture in the room, no one but himself saw how it happened, though another employee of the defendant, a Mr. Gregg, a floorwalker, who had charge of the room, testified that he could see the top of the window at the time it was closed; that the window closed rapidly, with a bang, and then he heard a terrible smash of glass. He said he examined the window immediately after the accident, and found the window glass broken out with the exception of some large pieces adhering to the beading around the edge. He also testified that, as far as he could see, the strips or beads which held the glass in the window sash were in perfect condition.

The defendant proved very satisfactorily that the window in question had been properly constructed, and the plaintiff does not on his part seriously contend that the window was not so constructed in the first place, but does contend that it was not maintained in a reasonably safe condition, and that, therefore, for its alleged failure so to maintain this window the defendant is chargeable with negligence. In what respect it was not maintained in a safe condition was not shown, and no evidence, except the fact of the breaking of the window under the circumstances above narrated, was adduced to prove any defect therein, unless the testimony of Mrs. Harman, plaintiff's wife, to the effect that, a few days after the accident, she was standing on the street and saw Mr. Kauffman, the glazier, putting new strips around the window, and the testimony of two other witnesses to the effect that, when they examined the window some time after the accident, they found the strips had been changed since the original construction, might be so considered. The evidence of Mrs. Harman as to what occurred several days after the accident does not prove or fairly tend to prove any defect in the window at the time the accident happened. These strips or beads to which she referred were used to secure the glass in the sash after it had been set in the rabbet, and were fastened to the sash from the outside. Possibly the old strips were broken or injured in removing the fragments of glass that adhered to the sides of the sash after the accident happened. Possibly they were broken while being removed, preparatory to putting in a new glass. When the question at issue is the liability of defendant for the alleged faulty construction or improper maintenance of an appliance, evidence of events transpiring after the happening of the accident is usually inadmissible. Columbia & P. S. R. Co. v. Hawthorne, 144 U. S. 202, 36 L. ed. 405, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 591; Ziehm v. United Electric Light & P. Co. 104 Md. 48, 64 Atl. 61. We think, therefore, that, as this evidence was objected to, it should have been excluded, but, as the defendant upon cross-examination elicited evidence to the same effect, the ruling of the trial court in this regard furnishes no reversible error. Leffler v. Allard, 18 Md. 545. In the view that we take of the case, however, we do not consider this evidence important.

The defendant showed that the windows in the building had been in the first instance properly constructed by a competent builder; that such construction was a safe one; that the glass was good plate glass of glazing quality; and that the beading used to hold the glass in the sash was of the usual size and sufficient to make a good construction. Mr. Grim, a carpenter employed by the defendant, testified that he boarded up the opening the afternoon after the glass was broken out, and that the beads that held the glass in the window were in proper condition; no part of them being moved out of the way. Mr. Gregg, floorwalker for defendant, testified that he went to the window immediately after the accident, and found the window glass broken out, with the exception of some large pieces adhering to the beading around the edge, and that, as far as he could see, the beading seemed to be in perfect condition. He did not see where any of it was gone. Mr. Kaufman, the glazier who put the glass in the sash when the building was originally constructed eight or nine years before, testified that he put a new glass in the window after the accident, and that, when he went there for that purpose, he found the beads and everything all right, except that the glass was gone. This witness also testified that the beading originally put on the window to hold in the glass was $\frac{5}{8}$ of an inch, and that when he went there to put in the new glass he found the beading to be $\frac{3}{4}$ of an inch. The witness Morrow also testified that the beading which held the glass in place was $\frac{5}{8}$ by $\frac{3}{4}$. On cross-examination this witness stated that the beading at the time of the trial was larger than that originally used for the purpose of securing the glass. When the larger beading was put on the window did not appear, except from the testimony of Mrs. Harman, as above stated. The only evidence in the case therefore, to show that the window was in any respect defective on the day that the accident happened is the inference to be drawn from the testimony that beading slightly different from that used in the original construction was put in the window after the accident. This inference is rebutted by the direct testimony of two witnesses who examined the window immediately after the accident happened, and who stated that the beading was then in good condition.

But, assuming that there was sufficient evidence of a defective beading at the time of the accident to justify submitting that 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

question to the jury, what evidence is there that such defective beading caused, or in any way contributed to, the accident and injury? How was the beading defective? How did such defect, if any, contribute to the accident? Even if we assume that some defect in the beading did in some unexplained manner contribute to the accident, still where is the evidence legally sufficient to show that defendant did not use due and reasonable care to maintain the window in a safe condition? In order to recover in this case, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show, not only how the accident happened, but also that the defendant was remiss in respect to some matter which caused the accident. Buswell, Personal Injuries, 111a. The master's liability, if any liability attaches at all, depends altogether upon a breach by him of some imposed duty. Now, the law imposes upon the master the duty toward his servant of exercising due and reasonable care to provide and maintain proper and safe materials and appliances with which the servant may perform his work; but a master is not an insurer of his servant's safety. Wood v. Heiges, 83 Md. 269, 34 Atl. 872. When the servant engages to perform certain services for compensation, it is implied as part of the contract that, as between himself and his employer, he assumes all the risks incident to the service. In the absence of any rule or custom of the employer to inspect and test appliances with which his employees perform their respective services, and in the absence of any rule of law requiring him to do so, the employees themselves are expected to exercise circumspection for their own safety. As stated in Buswell on Personal Injuries, § 204: "The principle is that, where the servant has as good an opportunity as the master to ascertain and avoid the danger himself, he will have no recourse against the master in case he is injured thereby, and he accepts the employment upon this implied condition." Upon this principle, the case of McGorty v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. 69 Conn. 635, 61 Am. St. Rep. 62, 38 Atl. 359, was decided. In that case the plaintiff, who was employed as a lineman by defendant, climbed an old pole for the purpose of removing the wires and cross-arms therefrom, and while thus engaged the pole fell, by reason of its being rotten at the base, and the plaintiff, falling with it, received serious injuries. It was not shown that there was any rule or practice of the defendant to inspect and secure poles before linemen were sent to work upon them; and the court, in disposing of the case, said: "Whether it is incumbent upon the master or the servant to perform such a duty is usually a question of fact depending upon the terms of the contract of employment; the servant's knowledge of the hazards of the work in which he is engaged; his ability and opportunity to discover the dangers to which he is exposed, and to avoid them; and upon other circumstances." And it was determined, under the circumstances of that case, "that each lineman should look out for his own safety in climbing poles," and that the master was not guilty of negligence for failure to provide a system of independent inspection. The same principle was also applied in the case of Piper v. Cambria Iron Co. 78 Md. 249, 27 Atl. 939, where this court said: "While employers should be held to a strict performance of duty towards employees, yet the latter must be required to exercise some prudence, and to use the necessary means supplied to them to enable them to do their work in a safe and expeditious manner."

In the present case there is no pretense that the defendant had established any rule or custom of independent inspection of the windows in the building; and, as the window in question was of simple design, and the plaintiff had ample opportunity to examine its condition from day to day for several months before the accident happened, no system of independent inspection would seem to have been necessary. The plaintiff was a man about fifty years of age, and there was nothing to show that he was not possessed of ordinary intelligence and capacity. It was therefore incumbent upon him to observe the condition of the windows from time to time for his own protection as well as that of the defendant. In fact, Mr. Gregg, the floorwalker, testified that it was the plaintiff's duty to report to him if any of the windows on that floor were out of order, and, while the plaintiff denied this when examined in rebuttal, yet we think that, under the circumstances of this case, this duty was imposed upon him by the very nature and character of his employment. As stated by Mr. Justice Field in Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 755, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 590, "If . . . [the servant] failed to exercise that prudence, care, and caution which prudent men under similar circumstances would ordinarily exercise, and . . . thereby contributed approximately to the injury, he was not entitled to recover." In Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Eddy, 72 Ill. 138, where an employee was injured by a fall from a ladder of which he had been for some time in constant use, the fall having been caused by reason of some defect in the ladder, it was held that it was the duty of the employee himself to see and to know that the ladder was in repair, and, if not, to report the fact to the proper person for repair; that it was negligence on his part not to do so; and that the company was not liable.

Thus far we have proceeded upon the assumption that the plaintiff had proven, or given evidence tending to prove, some defect in the window, which caused or which directly contributed to the accident and injury complained of, while in fact no such evidence has been offered. The plaintiff contends, however, that the mere fact of the falling of the glass is itself evidence of such defect, and also of the defendant's negligence in not maintaining the window in good repair,—in other words, that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is applicable to this case; and in this contention he is sustained by the ruling of the trial court in granting his first prayer. But, before this doctrine can be applied, the efficient cause of the accident must be shown by the testimony. Evidence of some defect, by reason of which the accident happened, must be adduced. Ordinarily it is necessary to show how the accident happened, and then to prove negligence on the part of the defendant in respect to some matter which caused the accident; and the mere fact that an accident happened which caused the injury is not of itself generally sufficient to authorize an inference of negligence. Buswell, Personal Injuries, 111a. Until it is known what occasioned an injury, it cannot be said that the defendant was guilty of some negligence that produced the injury. Benedick v. Potts, 88 Md. 56, 41 L.R.A. 478, 40 Atl. 1067. To mulct a defendant in damages without proving what caused the accident is to punish it, not for any wrong it has done, or for any duty which it has omitted, but because we cannot prove what we wish to find out. South Baltimore Car Works v. Schaefer, 96 Md. 105, 94 Am. St. Rep. 560, 53 Atl. 665.

To test the soundness of plaintiff's contention, let us suppose that the whole pane had fallen out, unbroken, and had struck and injured the plaintiff on the first day of his employment. The reasonable inference is that such an accident could only have happened from some defect in the window, and the mere fact of its falling whole and entire from the sash would be evidence of such defect, and, in the absence of satisfactory explanation by the defendant, it would speak against him as to the exercise of due care on his part. In such a case the rule would be applicable, because it could be fairly and reasonably inferred from the circumstances themselves that negligence on the part of the defendant in properly constructing or in properly maintaining the window caused the accident. But in this case the glass was broken into "a thousand pieces," to use the expression of the plaintiff, before it fell, and such breaking may have been caused by its being struck with a piece of furniture, in moving it, during the day, or by the force of the wind, or, as seems most likely, by its being shut with too great violence by the plaintiff himself. If it occurred under any of these circumstances the defendant would not be liable, because the plaintiff was in charge of the window and had opened and shut it daily for five or six months in absolute safety, and, if there were defects in the window and he failed to discover them, or if he broke the window by shutting it too violently, in either event his own negligence was the cause of the injury, and he could not recover. It has been held in a number of cases that the sudden breaking of machinery is not of itself sufficient to warrant the court in sending the case to the jury. South Baltimore Car Works v. Schaefer, supra. As was said by this court in the case of Benedick v. Potts, 88 Md. 54, 41 L.R.A. 478, 40 Atl. 1068: "The negligence alleged and the injury sued for must bear the relation of cause and effect. The concurrence of both and the nexus between them must exist to constitute a cause of action." The negligence alleged and chiefly relied on in this case is that "the defendant failed to maintain said window in such condition that it could be safely used;" and the only evidence of any such defect is the inference to be derived from the testimony that, after the accident happened, new beading was used to hold the window in place; but there is no evidence whatever that any defect, if any existed, caused the accident complained of, or that there was any connection between such alleged defect and the injury. In Schaefer's Case, supra, this court, quoting from Stringham v. Hilton (Stringham v. Stewart) 111 N. Y. 197, 1 L.R.A. 483, 18 N. E. 873, said: "The same machine was continued in use for several years. When used with ordinary care, there was no reason to suppose that harm or mischief could result." "This fact" said the court "brings the case directly within the rule that when an appliance or machine not obviously dangerous has been in daily use for a long time, and has uniformly proved adequate and safe, its use may be continued without imputation of negligence." We think this language is applicable to this case. The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply, at least, not against the defendant.

It follows from what we have said that there was error in granting the plaintiff's first prayer, and, as we do not think the plaintiff is entitled to recover, the judgment appealed from will be reversed without a new trial.

Judgment reversed, with costs.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

CLEMENTS GERHARD, by Next Friend,
v.
FORD MOTOR COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(— Mich. —, 119 N. W. 904.)

Evidence — conclusion.

1. A question on cross-examination of plaintiff, in an action to recover damages for injuries caused by being struck by an automobile, "And this accident happened simply because you were in a real hurry, . . . and you jumped down off the wagon, didn't you?"—is incompetent as calling for a mere conclusion.

Highway — lookout for automobiles — negligence.

2. A pedestrian is not bound, as matter of law, when lawfully using the public highways, to be continuously looking or listening to ascertain if auto cars are approaching, under penalty that, upon his failure to do so, if he is injured his own negligence must be conclusively presumed.

Trial — jury — highway — pedestrian — automobile.

3. The question of the negligence of a delivery boy who is struck and injured by an automobile is for the jury, where the evidence tends to show that, before leaving his wagon, he looked but did not see the automobile, and that, after he reached the ground and secured the packages he was to deliver, he walked a few steps beside the wagon, waiting for it to pass so that he could go behind it to reach the house where the packages belonged, when he was struck by the automobile coming rapidly up behind him.

Case Note.—Duty of pedestrian in street to watch for automobiles.

The earlier cases upon this subject will be found in the notes to Christy v. Elliott, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 215, and Hennessey v. Taylor, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 345.

It is generally held that a pedestrian and the operator of an automobile have reciprocal rights and duties when using a street car highway, and that neither must so exercise those rights as to injure the other. Hennessey v. Taylor, 189 Mass. 583, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 345, 76 N. E. 224, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 396; Apperson v. Lazro (Ind. App.) 87 N. E. 97; Brewster v. Barker, 113 N. Y. Supp. 1026; *Seaman v. It not being the duty of a pedestrian when crossing a street or walking in a highway constantly to be on the lookout for the approach of automobiles, it is for the jury to determine how far a failure to observe the amount and kind of travel is indicative of such want of care as will bar a recovery ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Fred L. Vandever, for plaintiff in error:

Plaintiff was negligent in not seeing the approaching automobile.

Messrs. Pelton & McGee and George A. Safford, with Messrs. Lillis & Hymers, for defendant in error:

The question, "And this accident happened simply because you were in a real hurry to get the deliveries made, and you jumped down off the wagon, didn't you?" was properly excluded as calling for a conclusion.

5 Enc. Ev. pp. 651, 662; Kelley v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. 80 Mich. 237, 20 Am. St. Rep. 514, 45 N. W. 90; Ireland v. Cincinnati, W. & M. R. Co. 79 Mich. 163, 44 N. W. 426; Harris v. Clinton Twp. 64 Mich. 447, 8 Am. St. Rep. 842, 31 N. W. 425.

A person in a public street has a right to by one injured by an automobile. Hennessey v. Taylor, supra; Arseneau v. Sweet; Apperson v. Lazro; Belleveau v. S. C. Lowe Supply Co. and Lampe v. Jacobsen, Tiffany & Co. v. Drummond,—infra.

So, in the following cases it is held to be for the jury to determine whether due care was exercised.

Where one stepped into a street to board a street car at a usual stopping place without looking for, seeing, or hearing an approaching automobile, which did not give any warning, as he might reasonably assume that others would use due care with reference to his position; and he was not, therefore, required absolutely to keep the lookout for approaching automobiles. Arseneau v. Sweet (Minn.) 119 N. W. 46.

Where one crossing diagonally at the point of intersection of two busy city streets, after taking a few steps, was struck by a slowly moving automobile which he testified he did not see before leaving the sidewalk, there being conflicting testimony as to whether any warning of the approach of the automobile was given. Lampe v. Jacobsen, 46 Wash. 533, 90 Pac. 654.

Where, before starting diagonally to cross a street intersection where the street car track was torn up, one looked both ways without seeing an approaching automobile, but it did not clearly appear how frequently he afterwards looked in the direction from which the automobile approached. Tiffany & Co. v. Drummond, 168 Fed. 47.

Where a woman alighted from a street car without looking for approaching vehicles, and was struck by an automobile running upon the wrong side of the street. New York Transp. Co. v. Garside, 85 C. C. A. 285, 157 Fed. 521, affirming 146 Fed. 588.

The failure to look in either direction before alighting, at the conductor's direction, from the front end of a street car, at its usual stopping place in a busy city street, is not such contributory negligence as will prevent a recovery for injuries sustained by being struck, immediately upon reaching the ground, by an automobile running 6 miles an hour in the same direction as the car. Brewster v. Barker, supra.

As one, apparently a child, who has safely crossed in an easterly direction beyond the middle of a street, may assume that an automobile will avoid him, he is not guilty of contributory negligence where, as he looks back, he is struck by the lamp upon an automobile moving slowly in a southerly direction; but such question is properly left to the jury. Benoit v. Miller (R. I.) 67 Atl. 87.

An infirm person with defective eyesight, who was struck by a rapidly driven automobile coming from the rear while he was walking in the traveled portion of a highway, was not guilty of contributory negligence, where the course of the automobile was not changed or its speed slackened, although he was visible for from $\frac{1}{8}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ mile, until its sudden approach so startled him as to cause him to jump to one side, just as the automobile swerved and struck him; whether he exercised due care being a question for the jury. Apperson v. Lazro (Ind. App.) 87 N. E. 97.

The question of due care is for the jury where one walking with two companions, on a dark night, along a country road, with street-car tracks at the side, was struck by an automobile with lamps lighted, coming from the rear; and it is error to exclude evidence that they frequently looked in that direction, and, just before the accident, one of the party looked back and said: "There are two cars coming;" and, looking again, also said: "let's hurry up, we can catch the second car at Reed's corner," as it cannot be held, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff could not rely on his companions, and whether he was justified in so doing was a question for the jury; and, if so justified, what was said was competent as tending to show, in connection with the other facts in the case, the circumstances under which he acted, and with reference to which his conduct must be judged. Belleveau v. S. C. Lowe Supply Co. 200 Mass. 237, 86 N. E. 301.

It is for the jury to determine the contributory negligence of, as well as what rely upon the exercise of reasonable care on the part of drivers of vehicles to avoid causing injury, and a failure to anticipate the omission of such care does not render him negligent.

Caesar v. Fifth Ave. Coach Co. 45 Misc. 331, 90 N. Y. Supp. 359; Hayward v. North Jersey Street R. Co. 74 N. J. L. 678, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1062, 65 Atl. 737; Kathmeyer v. Mehl (N. J. degree of care should be observed by, one walking backwards while greasing a street-car track at a curve upon the south side of a street, who was struck by an automobile running at a high rate of speed without sounding any warning, which approached from the rear on the north side of the street, and, instead of continuing around the corner upon the right-hand side of the street, turned to the left so as to strike him. King v. Green, 7 Cal. App. 473, 94 Pac. 777. The court, in substance, said that, as the plaintiff's occupation required his presence in that part of the street devoted to the use of vehicles, he was not the same as an ordinary pedestrian, not because he was bound to exercise any less care, but because the care to be exercised must be determined from a different standpoint.

A verdict for the plaintiff will not be disturbed where it appears that at the time of the accident he was standing on the edge of a pavement with one foot on the curb in the act of stepping upon the roadway when he was struck by an automobile which was driven upon the curb, either through reckless management or inexperience of the driver. May v. Allison, 30 Pa. Super. Ct. 50.

In two Delaware nisi prius cases the jury was instructed, in substance, that, while it is the duty of one crossing a city street to make reasonable use of all his senses to observe impending danger, and a failure so to do is negligence, yet such reasonable use means such as an ordinary prudent and careful person would use under like circumstances; and, if a pedestrian saw an automobile before it struck him, or might have seen it in time to have avoided injury by the reasonable use of his senses, there can be no recovery; but, if the accident, by the exercise of reasonable care, could not have been avoided by the pedestrian, he would not be guilty of such negligence as will defeat a right to recover. Hannigan v. Wright and Simeone v. Lindsay, supra.

It is for the jury to determine whether it was contributory negligence for a boy of twelve years, in throwing up a ball, to run into the street to catch it, where he was struck by an automobile running at full

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was injured on September 10, 1906, at about 5:30 P. M. He was two or three months over the age of fourteen. The accident occurred on Piquette avenue, which runs at right angles to Woodward avenue. Plaintiff was employed as a "jumper" on a delivery wagon, and in the performance of his duties it was necessary for him to follow the instructions of his driver and deliver packages to the proper addresses. The first street east of Woodward avenue, and parallel thereto is John R., and next east of John R. is Brush street. The delivery speed, which gave no warning, and, as it approached the boy, "twitched" and hit him. Turner v. Hall, 74 N. J. L. 214, 64 Atl. 1060.

But it was held contributory negligence for a boy of twelve years to run suddenly into the street, in the middle of a block, to pick up a ball that had rolled therein, where he was knocked down and killed by an automobile operated in a careful manner. Jordan v. American Sight-Seeing Coach Co. 129 App. Div. 313, 113 N. Y. Supp. 786.

Freedom from contributory negligence is not shown where an aged man attempted to cross a crowded city street without observing the approach of an automobile, looking only at the people in front of him; it not appearing that he tried to avoid the various vehicles filling the street. Wilkins v. New York Transp. Co. 52 Misc. 167, 101 N. Y. Supp. 650.

So, due care is not shown by a pedestrian who, in crossing a street, apparently walked into a slowly moving automobile, notwithstanding its horn was sounded and bystanders shouted a warning, there being no evidence or inference that the driver of the automobile did not exercise due care, or that he omitted to do anything in his power to prevent a collision after he saw one was inevitable. Seaman v. Mott, 127 App. Div. 18, 110 N. Y. Supp. 1040.

It was contributory negligence for one to leap from a slowly moving trolley car in the nighttime, when its momentum was such as to carry him forward so that he could not look back and see an approaching automobile with lights burning brightly, which struck him the moment he attempted to cross a much-traveled highway, although before jumping from the car he looked up and down for approaching vehicles. Starr v. Schenk, 25 Montg. Co. Rep. 18.

One who observes an automobile 130 feet away before starting to cross a street, and does not look again in its direction, and is struck by it, is guilty of contributory negligence. McCormick v. Hesser (N. J. L.) 71 Atl. 55.

As to the duty of a pedestrian to avoid passing teams, see the case note to Borg v. Spokane Toilet Supply Co. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 160.

wagon approached Piquette avenue from the south on John R. street. Upon reaching Piquette avenue, the driver turned his horse to the right on Piquette avenue, and drove east toward Brush street. An automobile controlled by one of the employees of the defendant came to Piquette avenue from Woodward avenue coming from the south. When Piquette avenue was reached, the driver turned his automobile to the right, going in an easterly direction. When the wagon was a few feet from Brush street, the automobile attempted to pass on the north side of it, and struck the boy, who was badly injured. The case was tried before a jury who rendered a verdict for plaintiff. A motion was made for a few trial for the following reasons: (1) That said verdict was against the clear weight of the evidence offered and received at the trial of the said cause. (2) That the evidence establishes that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence, and that a verdict of no cause of action for the defendant should have been directed. (3) Because of the refusal of the court to peremptorily give those instructions of the defendant which would have ended the case, and not permitted the same to have gone to the jury for its consideration and deliberations. The court overruled the motion, giving his reasons therefor in writing. The case is brought here by writ of error.

There are eleven assignments of error grouped by counsel under three subdivisions. The first of these as stated by counsel is as follows: "The following question was asked plaintiff: 'And this accident happened simply because you were in a real hurry to get the deliveries made, and you jumped down off the wagon, didn't you?' Counsel feels as though it should have been permitted a good deal of latitude in the cross-examination of the plaintiff, especially in view of the testimony that had preceded this question." The question should be taken in connection with what preceded and what followed it.

Q. Now, as a matter of fact, Clements, you were in a good deal of a hurry that night to make this delivery up on Brush because it was getting late, wasn't it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. It was getting late, about half past 5, wasn't it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the quicker you got your deliveries made the quicker you got home?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And this accident happened simply because you were in a real hurry to get the deliveries made, and you jumped down off the wagon, didn't you? (Objected to as incompetent and immaterial.) The Court: 20 L.R.A. (N.S.),

I think I will exclude that. Exception to defendant.

Q. You were in such a hurry to get these deliveries made that you jumped down off of the wagon without stopping to look if an automobile was coming, did you not?

A. I looked before I got down off of the wagon, first looked at the side of the wagon and did not see it, and was struck just after I got down out of the wagon. I was taken over to the north curb of the north side of Piquette avenue; that is, after being picked up after the automobile had struck me. I was on that side of the street, and it was the closest to carry me.

It is apparent the question called for the conclusion of the witness. It is equally apparent that counsel was not prevented from cross-examining fully the plaintiff in relation to the occurrence.

The next subdivision relates to whether a verdict should have been directed in favor of defendant. In support of his contention, counsel cite Moore's Treatise on Facts, §161, Payne v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 136 Mo. 562, 38 S. W. 308, and other authorities. The law applicable to the case is not in dispute. The troublesome question is one of fact. The plaintiff claims that, before getting off the wagon to deliver his package, he looked toward Woodward avenue and saw no automobile, that the horse was then walking; that plaintiff jumped off the wagon with one bundle under his arm, alighting about 1½ feet from the wagon and a few feet in advance of the front wheels; that he then took two small packages from the bottom of the wagon just back of the dash, then began walking at the side of the wagon, to let the horse pass so he could go around back of it; that he had taken about 5 or 6 steps, when the automobile struck him in the back and left side; that he was knocked to the pavement, pushed and dragged across Brush street for a distance of about 66 feet, and dropped free of the auto; that after plaintiff became free of the machine it ran about 100 feet before stopping. It is also his claim that no warning was given of the approach of the automobile, and that, when he looked, it was either so near the south curb that his point of view was cut off by the wagon, or else that it was still in Woodward avenue approaching him at a great rate of speed, as was indicated by the distance the machine traveled after he was struck. It is also the claim of plaintiff that the driver had a clear space of 30 feet between the wagon and the north curb in which to pass, and that it was gross negligence to strike him with the machine when he was walking by the side of the wagon within 1½ feet of it, with his back toward the oncoming machine. There was testimony tending to support these various claims of the plaintiff. In an action for injuries a street-car conductor who was struck by an automobile as he stepped from the forward end of his car to pass to rear of same, the evidence disclosed that the car which was bound south had come to a full stop before plaintiff alighted; that at that time the automobile was 15 to 18 feet distant, proceeding in a southerly direction at the rate of from 3 to 5 miles an hour, parallel and about 3 feet away from the track on which the car was standing, with a clear space of from 12 to 15 feet between the track and the curb of the westerly sidewalk; that the operator of the automobile had a clear view ahead of him; and that the plaintiff, as he stepped from the car, looked in the direction in which the car was to proceed; and it was held that questions of negligence and contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff were for the jury. In this case the court said that the plaintiff had a right to rely upon the exercise of reasonable care on the part of the drivers of vehicles to avoid causing injuries to persons in the street, and that his failure to anticipate the omission of such care did not render him negligent. Caesar v. Fifth Ave. Coach Co. 45 Misc. 331, 90 N. Y. Supp. 359. It has been held that one running an automobile is bound to take notice of a person standing in the roadway conversing with a friend sitting in a carriage, and to use care not to injure him. Kathmeyer v. Mehl (N. J. L.) 60 Atl. 40. There is no imperative rule of law requiring a pedestrian, when lawfully using the public ways, to be continuously looking or listening to ascertain if auto cars are approaching, under the penalty that, upon the failure so to do, if he is injured, his own negligence must be conclusively presumed. Hennessey v. Taylor, 189 Mass. 583, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 345, 76 N. E. 224, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 396. In this case the plaintiff testified she looked to see if there was any danger, but did not observe the defendant's automobile, nor hear any sign of its approach sounded. A witness called by her, who stood by her side before she attempted to cross the street, had observed the defendant's machine at some distance; but it was not shown that she communicated such information to the plaintiff. Upon such evidence, the court said that no such balancing of probabilities by plaintiff, with a willingness to take the risk of safely getting over before the defendant came up, was shown as to convict her of contributory negligence as a matter of law; and that, even if she had seen the defendant's machine approaching, and decided it was sufficiently distant to enable her safely to pass, she 20 L.R.A.(N.S.)

might have been found by the jury to have exercised due care, though the accident proved her judgment erroneous. See also Spina v. New York Transp. Co. (Sup.) 96 N. Y. Supp. 270; Büschler v. New York Transp. Co. 106 App. Div. 493, 94 N. Y. Supp. 798. The testimony of the driver shows that for some time before he overtook the delivery wagon he saw it, that he knew what it was. "I recognized the rig as a delivery wagon, but do not know as I ever saw that particular wagon on the street, but have seen that type of wagons before. I was thoroughly familiar with the kind of a wagon it was, and knew it was a wagon that was used in delivering packages, and I knew from observation about the streets of Detroit the character of the business that the people in charge of the wagon was doing. . . . I did not know whether one delivered the parcels and another drove the horse, but I did know that someone in charge of the wagon was in the habit of getting off of the wagon and running into houses to deliver parcels."

In view of the testimony, it was not a question of law to be determined by the judge in a directed verdict, but was a question of fact to be submitted to the jury under proper instructions. The other assignments of error do not call for discussion.

Judgment is affirmed.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

MARY E. CUNNINGHAM

v.

C. R. PEASE HOUSE FURNISHING COMPANY.

(74 N. H. 435, 69 Atl. 120.)

Sale — dangerous substance — injury to user — liability.

1. A merchant selling stove blacking which explodes in use under such circumstances as to render him liable to the purchaser for injuries thereby caused is liable also to a member of the purchaser's family so injured, although he did not have him in mind when the blacking was sold, if he knew that the blacking was to be used on a stove, and that other members of the family were likely to use it.

Note.—As to liability of dealer for personal injuries from articles not obviously dangerous, see case note to Clement v. Rommeck, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 382.

As to liability of vendor for injuries to one not in privity with him, see case note to Tomlinson v. Armour & Co. 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 923.

Same — negligence.

2. To entitle a purchaser of stove polish to hold the seller liable for its explosion because of his negligently selling it as safe for use, the purchaser must show that the seller's negligence was the sole cause of the injury.

Same — negligent or false statement.

3. One selling stove polish which explodes to the injury of the purchaser, when the latter attempts to use it, is liable for such injury if he knew that his statement, made to induce its purchase, that it was safe for the intended use, was false, or if he negligently made the statement believing it to be true, when the ordinary man having no more knowledge of the danger than he had would not have done so.

(February 4, 1908.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Hillsborough County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, which resulted in a nonsuit. Sustained.

Defendant sold to plaintiff's mother a can of 6-5-4 Self Shining Stove Lustre. The mother, having been attracted by an advertisement of the polish, went to defendant's store, where it was for sale, and was told that it could be put on a warm stove, the warmer the better. An attempt to use it on a warm stove resulted in an explosion to the injury of the plaintiff.

The action was in case declaring on the common-law count for negligence and upon certain sections of the statutes. A demurrer was sustained to the latter count, and a nonsuit ordered upon the former.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Doyle & Lucier, for plaintiff:

The defendant did not know that the article in question was safe to use in the manner in which he said it might be safely used, and in the manner in which he must have known it would be used by the plaintiff or someone else; and is liable for the injury caused by reason of such recommendation and sale.

Messrs. Burnham, Brown, Jones, & Warren, for defendant:

The defendant did not sell the polish to the plaintiff or for her use, and there can be no privity of contract between them, and no liability that sounds in breach of contract either by way of implied warranty or otherwise.

Young, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants' position is like that of one who "puts destructive . . . materials in situations where they are likely to produce mischief." Ricker v. Freeman, 50 N. H. 420, 432, 9 Am. Rep. 267. Such a person must respond in damages to those who are injured because of his acts, if he either knew or ought to have known that the materials were dangerous, and that the persons injured might come in contact with them. Hobbs v. G. W. Blanchard & Sons Co. 74 N. H. 116, 124 Am. St. Rep. 944, 65 Atl. 382; Scott v. Shepherd, 3 Wils. 403, s. c. 2 W. Bl. 892; Cooley, Torts, 78.

Although the defendant probably did not have the plaintiff in mind when it sold the blacking to her mother, it knew the mother bought it to use on her stove, and that other members of the family were likely to use it. Consequently the plaintiff can recover if her mother could have recovered had she been injured instead of the plaintiff. The defendant will not be prejudiced by the assumption that the plaintiff cannot recover if her mother could not, and by the omission to consider whether the situation might not be such that recovery might be had against both the mother and the defendant. Ricker v. Freeman, supra. The case, therefore, is considered as though it were an action by the mother. The declaration does not sound in either assumption or deceit. Whether she could maintain an action for a breach of warranty need not be considered; and whether she could recover for deceit will be considered only so far as is necessary to distinguish between facts constituting an intentional injury and those constituting a negligent one.

The common law imposes upon the seller the duty to refrain from falsely representing material facts for the purpose of misleading the buyer. The seller may praise the good qualities of his wares as much as he pleases, and is not bound to disclose their defects to the buyer, even if he knows of them, and is aware that the buyer believes he is purchasing sound goods. But if, for the purpose of inducing the prospective buyer to change his position, the seller sees fit to make any representation, either express or implied, in respect to facts which are material to the subject-matter of the sale, he must tell the truth. Shackett v. Bickford, 74 N. H. 57, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 646, 124 Am. St. Rep. 933, 65 Atl. 252; Spעד v. Tomlinson, 73 N. H. 46, 61, 68 L.R.A. 432, 59 Atl. 376; Stewart v. Stearns, 63 N. H. 99, 56 Am. Rep. 496; Rowell v. Chase, 61 N. H. 135; Springfield v. Drake, 58 N. H. 19; Pettigrew v. Chellis, 41 N. H. 95; Hanson v. Edgerly, 29 N. H. 343; Mahurin v. Harding, 28 N. H. 128, 59 Am. Dec. 401.

The defendant admits its liability for an intentionally false statement of fact, but contends that it is not liable for a false statement honestly believed to be true, though negligently made. Although there are authorities which sustain that position (Derry v. Peek, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 337; Angus v. Cliford [1891] 2 Ch. 449, 470), it is not the view which obtains in this jurisdiction. In this state a person who acts upon a false representation made for the purpose of inducing him to change his position may recover the damages he sustains in an action of deceit, when the maker of the statement knew it to be false, and in an action of negligence when he ought to have known it to be so. Shackett v. Bickford, supra; Hewett v. Woman's Hospital Aid Assn. 73 N. H. 556, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 496, 64 Atl. 190; Pittsfield Cottonwear Mfg. Co. v. Pittsfield Shoe Co. 71 N. H. 522, 60 L.R.A. 116, 53 Atl. 807; Edwards v. Lamb, 69 N. H. 599, 50 L.R.A. 160, 45 Atl. 480; Judge Jeremiah Smith in 14 Harvard Law Rev. 184.

If, therefore, the defendant's false representation that it was safe to use the blacking on a hot stove was the cause of the plaintiff's injury, the facts that it thought 20 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the statement was true and had no intent to deceive do not necessarily bar her right to a recovery. Proof of those facts would merely require her to prove facts not essential to her case, if the representation was deceitfully made. If the representation was deceitful, she could recover by showing that its fault contributed to cause her injury; but, if it was merely negligent, she must show that it was the sole cause of her injury. 14 Harvard Law Rev. 188. The reason for this is that the law makes it the duty of everyone to use ordinary care to avoid being injured by another's negligence; but it imposes on no one the duty to use such care to avoid being injured by another's intentionally wrongful act. In actions for negligence contributory negligence is a defense; in actions for intentional injuries, it is not.

There is a difference, also, between intentional and negligent wrongs as to the facts necessary to establish the defendant's fault. If an injury is intentionally inflicted, proof that the defendant did the act establishes his fault; but, where negligence is charged, proof of the act must be supplemented by proof that the average man would not have done it. So in this case, if the defendant, for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to buy the blacking, told her it could be safely used on a hot stove, and if neither knew nor cared whether its statement was true or false, it would be liable. Shackett v. Bickford and Spעד v. Tomlinson, supra. But, if it had no thought of deceiving her, it would not be enough to show that it made the representation. She must then go further and show, that the ordinary man would not have made it. 14 Harvard Law Rev. 188. The test, therefore, to determine whether the defendant was in fault for making the representation, is to inquire whether the ordinary man, having no more knowledge of the situation and its dangers than the defendant is shown to have had, would have told the plaintiff it was safe to use the blacking on a hot stove.

It cannot be said as a matter of law that the ordinary man would have made such a representation, unless it is common knowledge that the average man who engages in trade is accustomed to tell his patrons, not what he believes to be the truth in respect to his goods, but what he thinks will induce them to buy. It can be found from the evidence that the defendant thought the plaintiff was looking for a blacking to be applied to a stove in which there was a fire, and that it represented the blacking sold to the plaintiff as safe to use in that way, for the purpose of inducing her to purchase it, when it either knew that the representation was false, or did not know it to be true. It is not common knowledge that the ordinary man is accustomed to make such representations to induce customers to buy his goods; and it cannot be said as a matter of law that an ordinary man selling a new blacking would affirm that he knew it would do all, and more than all, its makers claimed for it, when, in fact, he knew nothing of its qualities, and had done nothing to inform himself as to the soundness of the makers' claims.

The plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury on the common-law count. The demurrer to the statutory count was properly sustained, for it is not alleged that the defendant sold the blacking as an illuminating oil (Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 126, § 26), or that it sold naphtha under an assumed name (Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 126, § 28).

TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO, Appt.,

v.

CHARLES R. JONES.

(— N. M. —, 99 Pac. 338.)

Gaming — slot machines.

1. Slot machines, where the chances are unequal, with the chances in favor of the machine, are ejusdem generis with "gambling games" specifically mentioned in § 1, chap. 64, p. 25, Laws 1907, and are illegal. Same — "banking games."

2. Slot machines of the kind described in the stipulation filed in this case are "banking games," and come within the inhibition of § 1, chap. 64, p. 25, Laws 1907.

(September 3, 1908.)

Headnotes by MILLS, Ch. J.

Case Note.—Operation of slot machine as gambling.

Although, on account of the difference in the statutes involved, the question is variously presented in the following decisions, the generally prevailing opinion seems to be that the operation of slot machines will be considered as gambling, or as coming within the inhibitions of statutes against lotteries or gambling, where the return to the player is dependent upon an element of chance, and this even though he is assured of his money's worth of some commodity, and hence cannot lose.

APPEAL by the Territory from a judgment of the District Court for Guadalupe County sustaining a demurrer to an information charging defendant with having unlawfully operated certain gambling games. Reversed.

Statement by MILLS, Ch. J.:

On April 6, A. D. 1908, an information was filed in the district court of the sixth judicial district, sitting within and for the county of Guadalupe, charging Charles R. Jones and William H. Gleason with having unlawfully run and operated (1) a banking game of chance, to wit, a slot machine; (2) with having unlawfully run and operated a banking game of chance, to wit, roulette; and (3) with having unlawfully run and operated a certain banking game, to wit, a slot machine. The defendant Gleason was not found, but Charles R. Jones was taken into custody. On April 6, 1908, the territory dismissed the second count of the information, being the count which charged the defendants with having unlawfully run and operated the banking game of chance known as roulette. The defendant filed a demurrer to the information, but later entered a plea of not guilty. The demurrer was afterwards sustained by the court, and the information dismissed, to which action of the court the territory excepted, and prayed an appeal to the supreme court. On the 6th day of July, 1908, a stipulation was entered into between the several attorneys in the case, which omitting the caption and formal parts, reads as follows, to wit: "Stipulation of Facts: It is hereby stipulated and agreed by the undersigned that the following facts shall be and constitute the basis upon which the supreme court may act in determining its action upon the appeal in the above-entitled cause, upon the appeal to the territory from the order of the district court in sustaining defendants' demurrer to the informations filed herein: That, on the date mentioned in said information, the defendant Charles R. Jones, being the owner and proprietor of a saloon in Santa Rosa, Guadalupe county, New Mexico, did run and operate the follow-

In general.

In Jeffries v. State, 61 Ark. 308, 32 S. W. 1080, one who employed another to "look after" a slot machine which stood in the saloon of a third party, to keep it from being broken, into which machine persons would slide a nickel, and, if the machine opened, would get all in the box, and, if the machine did not open, the person putting in lost his nickel, was held properly convicted of "keeping and exhibiting a gaming machine."

In Kolshorn v. State, 97 Ga. 343, 23 S. E. 829, it was held that, where it appeared from the evidence that the accused kept and maintained a machine so contrived that, if

ing device or apparatus, which was kept and exhibited and owned by him at his saloon in said town, and which is the slot machine mentioned in the information filed by the district attorney herein, and to which defendant filed the demurrer above mentioned, namely: A case, box, or frame about 5 feet in height and about 4 feet wide; that on the inside thereof is certain machinery so constructed as to make it work automatically when in running order; that there are a number of slots of different colors on the top of the machine, and, if the player puts a nickel into the slot of any color, and pushes down a crank, it starts a circular disk to revolving, containing colors corresponding to the colors on the slots, and, if the color shown by the indicator over the disk at which the disk stops revolving is the same color as the slot in which the coin is deposited, a certain valve will open and pay out to the player from 1 to 40 times the amount played by the player, according to the color played by him. If the indicator does not stop at the color played, the player loses the amount played. That there is a common fund placed in the machine by the defendant and constantly kept there, against which the players can play, to which the players' losings are added and from which his winnings are taken. In other words, if the nickel is placed in the green slot, and the disk stops at the point so the indicator points at the green color on the disk, it pays 5 times the original nickel played, and the yellow pays 10, the white 20, and the blue one dropped a nickel in a slot therein, it might fall into certain compartments, and nothing would come out, or might fall into some other compartments, from which three nickels would drop out; and that the object and purpose of the accused in keeping and maintaining the machine were to win money in this manner,—he was guilty of unlawfully keeping and carrying on a certain scheme and device for the hazarding of money.

In Conners v. Springfield, 130 Ill. App. 240, the words "or other instrument or device commonly used for the purpose of gaming," as used in an ordinance imposing a penalty upon the keeping of any gambling house or rooms, was held to include slot machines.

In Lyman v. Kurtz, 166 N. Y. 274, 59 N. E. 903, the maintenance of a nickel slot machine, the mechanism of which was such that when a 5-cent piece was dropped into one of the several slots representing several colors, a disk was made to revolve on which were painted corresponding colors, and, when it ceased to revolve, the color upon its face opposite a finger determined whether the player had won or lost, the sum won being delivered by a mechanical device to the player in a cup, was held to violate a condition of a bond that an applicant for a liquor tax certificate should not permit any gambling to be done in the place where the traffic in liquors was to be carried on.

In Lyman v. Brucker, 26 Misc. 594, 56 N. Y. Supp. 767, a saloon keeper maintaining in his saloon a nickel slot machine and permitting it to be used by those who visited his premises, the player of which stood chances of losing his nickel or of having delivered to him by the machine a number of nickels, was held to have violated the conditions of his bond by suffering or permitting gambling to be done in his place of business.

In Heelman v. State, 6 Ohio N. P. 258, it was held that evidence of the placing of a nickel in a slot, whereupon defendant remarked that everybody who put a nickel in the slot was entitled to a cigar or a drink, was insufficient to show that defendant was guilty of suffering a game to be played for gain by means of a gambling machine.

In Christopher v. State, 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 235, 53 S. W. 852, it was held that, although a machine was an automaton, not only receiving the bets but deciding them, and paying the money to itself or to the winner, it was, nevertheless, a gaming device and within the operation of a statute which, after enumerating a number of games, the exhibition of which for the purpose of gaming was prohibited, went on to provide: "It being intended by the foregoing article to include every species of gaming device known by the name of 'table' or 'bank,' of every kind whatever, this provision shall be construed to include any and all games which in common language are said to be played, dealt, kept, or exhibited," although slot machines had not been invented when the statute was passed; the statutes relating to gaming being evidently framed to cover not only every gambling device then known, but all others that might be invented or become known. (Compare Ex parte Williams, infra.)

In Meeks v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 74 S. W. 910, it was held that evidence that defendant kept in his saloon a slot machine, which, when operated upon the insertion of a nickel or a metal check, would display poker hands, such hands winning, in proportion to their value, various numbers of cigars; that, in paying the winnings, the machine did not work automatically, but retained what was played into it, and defendant in person paid the player; that it was generally the custom to pay in trade checks unless cigars were demanded; that there was printed on a card attached to the machine the statement, "Every 5 cents played gets one 5-cent cigar," but that if the party lost, defendant did not pay anything unless he demanded it; and it was not the general rule of players to ask for and receive anything unless they won; that the machine would win in such a rising scale that, while it would play about even, it would lose altogether about four times out of five; that the machine was kept as 40, when any of the same are similarly played. If, on the other hand, the indicator shows on some color which the player has not played, his money so placed by him goes into the common fund, and becomes the property of the defendant, and is lost to the player. Whether or not the player wins or loses is wholly a matter of chance. The machine above described is a game of hazard or chance, in which small sums of money are ventured for the chance of obtaining a larger sum of money. The machine above described is what is known as a percentage game; that is, the chances are unequal in favor of the owner. The above machine and device is not in any way operated with cards or dice. This stipulation is only for the purpose of this appeal, and shall not be used on any trial or hearing on the merits, and shall be settled and used as a bill of exceptions. It is agreed by the plaintiff that the defendant does not waive his right to move for the dismissal of the appeal herein, or any objection he may desire to make to the trial of the case by the supreme court."

Mr. James M. Hervey, Attorney General, for appellant:

A slot machine is a gambling apparatus or device in which the chances are unequal in favor of the exhibitor and against the player, and is a banking game within the inhibition of U. S. Laws 1907, chap. 64, p. 25, § 1.

People v. Carroll, 80 Cal. 157, 22 Pac.

a trade leader for the purpose of attracting crowds into defendant's place of business and increasing his sales,—was sufficient to sustain a conviction for exhibiting a gaming table and bank, commonly called a "slot machine," for the purpose of gaming.

The decision in State v. Gaughan, 55 W. Va. 692, 48 S. E. 210, is sufficiently set forth in the case reported.

In Fielding v. Turner [1903] 1 K. B. 867, it was held that a shopkeeper having in his shop an automatic machine, the player of which, by pulling down and letting go a spring, discharged his penny so that it might go into one of seven compartments, four of which retained the penny in the machine, two of which returned it to the player, and one of which discharged a ticket entitling him to receive from the shopkeeper twopenny worth of articles sold in the shop, was properly convicted under the gaming house act of 1854, § 4, for having opened, kept, and used his shop for the purpose of unlawful gaming being carried on therein. And it was held that, while continuous practice with the same machine might enable the person to acquire knowledge as to the strength of the particular spring, and thereby enable him to be more skilful in making the penny fall into the center compartment than in the case of a person who had not the same practice, the use of the machine did not constitute a game of skill in the proper sense of the word.

In Thompson v. Mason, 68 J. P. 270, it was held that the occupier of a shop, who kept a machine similar to that described in Fielding v. Turner, supra, except that it contained five compartments instead of seven, only two of which retained the money, was properly convicted of permitting the shop to be used for the purpose of unlawful gaming, although there was evidence that dexterity in the play could be acquired to some extent by continuous practice with the machine or with machines of similar construction.

Under anti-lottery provisions.

In Loiseau v. State, 114 Ala. 34, 62 Am. St. Rep. 84, 22 So. 138, evidence that one had in his cigar store a slot machine, which, when a nickel was dropped and a lever pressed, displayed card hands; that three certain parties went into said store, and each of them dropped five nickels into the slot, agreeing among themselves that the one after whose play the machine would indicate the highest card hand should have all the cigars which the said nickels purchased; that the defendant furnished from his stock of cigars a nickel cigar for each nickel which was put into the machine by said three parties; and that, when it was determined which one had made the highest score, the defendant delivered to such party cigars to the amount of and equal in value to the amount of the nickels put into the machine,—was held to support a conviction for setting up or carrying on a lottery; the court saying: "Calling it by name a slot machine instead of a lottery machine does not vary its character; nor does the fact that parties agreed that the winner should receive the value of the money in cigars, instead of the money itself, exert any influence in determining the character of the winning chance to have been by lot."

In State v. Vasquez, 49 Fla. 126, 38 So. 830, it was held that a machine from which one who put in a check, costing 5 cents, stood a chance of getting, in addition to a cheap cigar and a tune from a musical instrument, two or more, up to forty, additional checks that were good for 5 cents each in trade at the place in which the machine was placed, was a gambling apparatus which was not protected by a statute licensing "lung testers, striking machines, weighing machines, chewing-gum stands, or automatic penny in the slot machines, or any other device of a similar nature," especially where the state Constitution expressly prohibits lotteries.

In New Orleans v. Collins, 52 La. Ann. 973, 27 So. 532, it is held that the use of a slot machine where an element of chance determines whether the prizes are to be given brings such operation under the definition of a lottery, whether the prizes given are stock in trade of licensed establishments or not.

As affected by nature of winnings.

In Ex parte Williams (Cal. App.) 87 Pac. 565, a statute making it a misdemeanor to conduct various enumerated games, "or any banking or percentage game, played with cards or dice, or any device for money, checks, credit, or other representative of value," was held not to render unlawful the keeping of a slot machine operated by dropping a nickel and pressing a lever, causing the machine to display various card hands, and where, if the proper combination of cards was shown, the party putting the nickel in the slot was entitled to from one to forty cigars according to the value of the hand shown, for anything better than jacks, other combinations not winning anything. Although the machine as thus operated was a banking game, it was held that the legislature did not intend to include cigars within the words "or other representative of value," especially where, at the time the statute was enacted, such a machine had not been invented. (Compare Christopher v. State, supra.)

In State v. Woodman, 26 Mont. 348, 67 Pac. 1118, a statute imposing a penalty upon the operation of any nickel-in-the-slot machine or other similar machine "for money, checks, credits, or any representative of value, or for any property or claim whatever," was construed as prohibiting the operation of a machine displaying poker hands, the player of which gets one or more cigars for a pair of kings or better, but who, upon a hand of less value, gets nothing. It was contended that the expression "any property or thing whatever," following the particular words, "money, checks, credits," etc., should be held to include only things ejusdem generis with those specifically named, and therefore that

Mills, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As this court stated in the case of Territory v. Lotspeich, 94 Pac. 1025, some doubt may exist as to whether the right of the territory to appeal on quashed indictments includes informations; but, as no question was raised by the appellee on this point, and as the decision of this case is of great interest to a large number of citizens of this territory, we will proceed to consider the appeal on its merits.

The sole question involved in this case is whether or not the running and operating of a slot machine, such as is described in the stipulation of facts set out above, comes within the inhibition of § 1, chap. 64, p. 25, Sess. Laws 1907, which act is entitled: "An Act to Prohibit Gambling in the Terri-nickel-in-the-slot machines for the distribution of cigars or other merchandise do not fall within the prohibition. In ruling adversely to this contention, the court held that the rule invoked is but a rule of construction to be used in ascertaining the legislative intent, and not for the purpose of controlling the words of the statute, or of confining its operation to narrower limits than the legislature intended, and therefore is not applicable where, as in the case under consideration, the expression must signify something beyond the specific articles enumerated, or else must be rejected entirely as having no import whatever.

Where player is not subjected to loss.

In Meyer v. State, 112 Ga. 20, 51 L.R.A. 496, 81 Am. St. Rep. 17, 37 S. E. 96, a dealer in cigars and chewing gum having in his store a machine which, when operated by placing a nickel in the slot and pulling a handle down, would exhibit a number of cards constituting a poker hand, the person depositing the nickel being entitled to a cigar or a package of gum, each valued at 5 cents, and, in addition thereto, to a prize according to the hand displayed, was held to be guilty of violating § 407 of the Penal Code, which declares that "no person, by himself or another, shall keep, maintain, employ, or carry on any lottery in this state, or other scheme or device for the hazarding of any money, or valuable thing."

In Lang v. Merwin, 99 Me. 486, 105 Am. St. Rep. 293, 39 Atl. 1021 it was held that a slot machine displaying poker hands, the player being in any event entitled to a 5-cent cigar, and to additional cigars if the machine showed "three of a kind" or better, was a gambling device within the meaning of a statute prohibiting "every lottery, policy, policy lottery, policy shop, scheme or other device of chance of whatever name or description." The court said: "In the case before us it is idle to assume, or concede, that the person putting his 5

tory of New Mexico." Section 1 of this act, as shown by the engrossed copy on file in the office of the secretary of New Mexico, reads as follows, to wit: "Section 1. It shall hereafter be unlawful to run or operate any banking games of chance, such as faro, monte, pass-faro, pass-monte, twenty-one, roulette, chuck-a-luck, hazard, fan tan, poker, stud poker, red and black, high and low, craps, or any other banking games or games of chance played with dice or cards by whatsoever name known, in the territory of New Mexico." In the bill on file in the office of the secretary the word "craps" is interlined in ink, but no question has been raised as to its being the act which passed the legislature, and which was duly signed by the proper officials and became the law of the territory. It is unnecessary for us to go into a history of the legislation in regard to gambling in this territory, as the same is set out quite fully in the exhaustive briefs filed by counsel in this case. Suffice to say that certain gambling games were permitted by law to be run in the year 1887, upon the paying of a license upon each gaming table and apparatus used in gambling, and, with certain slight changes, usually in the amount of the annual license to be paid, this remained the law up to the sitting of the legislature in the year 1907. In the year 1897 a license was first specifically laid upon slot machines by name, but the license so imposed was not as great as that laid upon gaming tables and other apparatus used in gaming by the law of 1887, and its amendments.

Section 1, chap. 64, p. 25, Laws 1907, which we are now considering, makes it un-cents into the machine may be doing so merely as a means or mode of buying a 5-cent cigar. It is idle to deny that the impelling motive is the hope of getting other cigars for nothing. If the machine did not afford that chance it would not be used. True, the cigar dealer sets up the machine to increase his trade, and is recompensed by that increase for any losses, so that in the end he loses nothing; but he does so by arousing and stimulating the gambling propensity, the very propensity the legislature evidently seeks to repress. The element of chance is the soul of the transaction. The operator hopes by chance to get something for nothing. The dealer hopes chance will save him from giving something for nothing. Each is pecuniarily interested adverse to the other in a result to be determined solely by chance. To use the language of the street, 'it is a gamble' which will win, and we have no doubt the transaction is 'gambling' in the statutory sense of the word."

In Cullinan v. Hosmer, 100 App. Div. 148, 91 N. Y. Supp. 607, the operation of a slot machine into which any person dropping 5 cents became entitled by its operations to at least one 5-cent cigar, and possibly to three, was held to violate the condition of an undertaking of an applicant for a liquor-tax certificate that he would not "suffer or permit any gambling to be done in the place designated," there being absent any element of chance and resulting loss so far as the operator of the machine was concerned; but in Re Cullinan, 114 App. Div. 654, 99 N. Y. Supp. 1097, the same court announced that, upon more mature consideration of the question, and in view of a decision of the court of appeals subsequently coming to its attention, it had arrived at a different conclusion. It was there held that the maintenance in a saloon of a slot machine known as the Yale Wonder Clock, which, upon being operated, discharged disks entitling the player to 5, 10, 15, or 25 cents in trade, was a violation of a provision of the liquor-tax law prohibiting gambling in a saloon. The court said: "The chief element of gambling is the chance or uncertainty of the hazard. The chance may be in winning at all, or in the amount to be won or lost. In using the present machine we may assume that the player cannot lose. By far the greater majority of the checks called in trade for the precise sum deposited in the slot. If every ticket represented 5 cents, the machine would not be patronized. The bait or inducement is that the player may get one of the checks for a sum in excess of the nickel he ventures; and that is the vice of the scheme. If he wins more than he pays, the proprietor must lose on that discharge of the ticket. To constitute gambling it is not important who may be the loser."

In Lytle v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 100 S. W. 1160, it was held that one who, on various occasions, deposited a nickel in a contrivance known as a Yale Wonder Clock, which discharged checks entitling the player to 5, 10, 15 or 25 cents worth of merchandise, working automatically and requiring no personal supervision, was properly convicted of unlawfully betting at a gaming table and bank.

In Ogilvie v. Benigno (1906) 7 F. 82 (as digested in 2 Butterworths' Ten Yrs. Dig. 14), it was held that an automatic machine which involved the manipulation by the players of a cup for the purpose of intercepting a ball, which ball was propelled by a spring so as to fall within reach of the cup as it bounded from various points in its downward course, was an implement for playing a game at hazard, although a certain amount of success in working the machine could be acquired by practice, and though a player, even if unsuccessful, received an article of some value in return for his penny.

lawful to run and operate (1) any banking games of chance such as faro, etc., or (2) any other banking games, or (3) games of chance played with dice or cards by whatever name known. An examination of the stipulation shows that the defendant did run and operate a slot machine in his saloon in the town of Santa Rosa; that there was a fund placed in the machine by the defendant, and constantly kept there, against which the players played, and to which his losings were added and his winnings taken; that the machine is what is known as a percentage game, and that the chances are unequal in favor of the owner of the machine. It is a well-settled rule of law that, where general words of prohibition follow an enumeration of particular games or devices which are prohibited, such general words must be construed ejusdem generis with the games or devices which are specifically named. 20 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 880. Is, then, a slot machine, such as is described above, of the same general kind or species as the particular games prohibited in this territory? No member of this court, perhaps fortunately, has had sufficient personal experience to pass upon the question as to whether or not a slot machine such as is involved in this case is within the same class as the games prohibited by § 1 of the act we are considering; but an examination of the authorities cited by counsel in their briefs convinces us that some of the courts, which have passed upon statutes prohibiting gambling, gave the subject of gaming and gambling devices deep and careful study, and evidently often burned the midnight oil pursuing their investigations and watching the votaries of the Goddess of Fortune as they tempted Fate by the turning of a card, the throwing of dice, or guessing the number and color on which the lively roulette ball would finally come to a stop. In one of the earlier cases decided in this country the court used apt words in classifying games of chance. It says: "This court is not advised that there is, or can exist, but two kinds or classes of games of chance. The first is where the chances are equal, all other things being equal. The second is where, all other things being equal, the chances are nevertheless unequal; that is, in favor of one side. The standard games enumerated, so far as they are understood by this court, are of the second class, and in all three of them the chances are in favor of the exhibitor of the game or table. Now, the playing charged in the information is at a game which, by the evidence, is proved to be a game wherein the chances are unequal, and in favor of the exhibitor of the table. It must therefore belong to the same class, and be of the like kind of gaming, to which 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the enumerated games belong. The advantages or chances in favor of the player or exhibitor of the table are not the same in each case, but in each case the chances are in his favor, and this is the distinctive character which marks them as games 'of the same or like kind;' and, when of the same or like kind, as classed above, it matters not by what denomination they are distinguished, or whether they are played with cards or dice, or in any other manner whatsoever. All such games, when played or exhibited lucris causa, are prohibited by the act under consideration, and subject to the penalties prescribed; but, if exhibited and played, not for the purpose of gain, they may or may not be offenses against the general law prohibiting gaming at cards, etc., according to circumstances." Com. v. Wyatt, 6 Rand. (Va.) 694. Bearing this definition in mind, we are clearly of the opinion that a slot machine such as that described in the stipulation in this case comes within the inhibition of our statute, in that it is a game of chance similar to those specifically named in the act, and that it is also a banking game. A fund was placed in the machine, and constantly kept there by its owner, against which the players bet and to which their losings were added and their winnings taken. The machine was also a percentage game, with the chances unequal in favor of the owner. This machine seems to us to contain all of the elements of the gambling games prohibited by the statute.

The contention of the attorneys for the defense is that there can be no unlawful gambling game run in this territory, unless there is a man in charge of the game who pays the bets, takes in the winnings, etc. We do not, however, regard the presence of the operator of the gambling device as essential. Slot machines are mechanical gamblers, and, being impassive and having no sensations of any sort, they are more likely to win than gambling games which are run by gamblers, who have all of the human passions and feelings. Playing against a slot machine is a struggle between a man and a machine,—a man with nerves and emotions, a machine with no nerves and no emotions. As was well said in Christopher v. State, 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 239, 53 S. W. 852, in speaking of slot machines, "as to whether this is one of the gaming devices inhibited by statutes depends both on its construction and use. We gather from the statement of facts that, although the machine was an automaton, it was very skillfully constructed for the purpose of gaming. It not only received the bets, but decided them, and paid the money to itself or to the winner, without the intervention, for the time being, of the keeper or exhibitor, but we also gather that this machine was put in place and arranged and set in motion, and that, when it was out of order, it was rearranged and repaired so it could operate. It was so skillfully constructed to serve its purpose that, according to the testimony, 'the chances were against the outsiders as four in favor of the machine to one against it.' It also occurs that the machine did not keep the money it won, but that the profits were divided between appellant and his copartner. We think this device comes fully within the meaning of the definition given by Judge Roberts in the case of Stearnes v. State, 21 Tex. 693." In this case slot machines of the kind described in it were declared to be gaming devices within the meaning of the laws of the state of Texas, although that law was passed previous to the invention of slot machines. In the case of Meeks v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 74 S. W. 910, the Texas courts again held that a slot machine, constructed somewhat differently from that described in the case of Christopher v. State, supra, was within the inhibition of the statute.

The last case which we deem it necessary to cite in this opinion is that of State v. Gaughan, 55 W. Va. 692, 48 S. E. 210, which was decided as late as the year 1904, and, as this case is in our opinion decisive of the case at bar, we will quote from it at some length. The indictment in that case charged that the defendant, Gaughan, "did knowingly and unlawfully exhibit a certain gaming table commonly called a slot machine, being a table and machine of like kind to A. B. C. and E. O. tables, and faro bank, wheel of fortune, and keno tables, which machine is played by dropping coins into the slot as indicated by the machine, the coins used being a nickel, a dime, and a quarter, or twenty-five-cent piece, and the games played on said machine are games in which the chances are unequal, all other things being equal, and those unequal chances are in favor of the exhibitor, the said Frank Gaughan, of the said gaming table, the said slot machine." In its opinion in deciding this case, the learned court says: "We think the slot machine is essentially a banking game. When the player wins, if it happens that he does win, the money is paid from the machine, the bank fund or deposits of the previous and less fortunate players. It is played by the machine or exhibitor on the one side, and any and all players who choose to play on the other side, and the chances to win are unequal, with the greater number of chances in favor of the machine or exhibitors. . . . If the use of slot machines, as they are used, is in fact a game, and, being a game, is of such character as may properly and legally be said to be a game of like kind with 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the prohibited games named, within the true intent and meaning of the statute creating and defining the offense, then the power and duty of the courts to punish the keeper or exhibitor of such machines is precisely the same as though the name 'slot machine' was written on the statute. . . . What, then, is meant by table of 'like kind' as used in this section? Is it absolutely necessary that there shall be a real table, or are the games named intended to point out certain forms of gambling and include all games of that particular form and character? I am clearly of opinion that the legislature intended to forbid certain kinds of gaming, amongn which are faro banks and keno tables, and all other games like them. . . . Our legislature has not deemed it necessary to prohibit all forms of gaming, . . . but no game of unequal chances can be played anywhere lawfully. The legislature has, in effect, said that people may indulge in certain games of amusement, or even bet on them to a limited extent, but that no person shall cheat his companion in the game by insisting on playing a game wherein the chances for winning are all on his side. . . . The games prohibited by this chapter—and indeed all unlawful gaming—may be divided into two classes. To the first class belong the games wherein the chances are equal; to the second class belong the games wherein the chances are unequal, and all other things being equal, the unequal chances being in favor of the keeper or exhibitor of the game. The games falling under the second class are enumerated in the statutes as 'A. B. C., E. O., and keno tables and faro banks and tables of like kind.' If the words 'slot machines' were inserted in the statutes and their use prohibited, very soon they would be supplanted by other machines bearing a different name, different in form and construction. . . . In order, then, to ascertain what games not named in § 1 of this chapter were intended to be prohibited, we must determine in what respect the games not named must be like the games named,—to bring them within the terms and meaning of the statute. Of what must the likeness consist? The four games named are all games of unequal chances, and the unequal chances are in favor of the keeper or exhibitor of the games. The skill of the player or his luck cannot affect the general result of the game. From the very nature and character of these games the keeper or exhibitor will win oftener than the player. This I understand to be the distinctive character of these four games, and that all other games possessing this distinctive feature are games of like kind, with them, within the meaning of this statute."

In the West Virginia case the court held that the slot machine in question in that cause was ejusdem generis with the games mentioned in their statute, to wit, A. B. C., E. O., faro bank, and keno, and, furthermore, that it was within the mischief which the legislature intended to reach. We do not think that our statute is substantially different from that of West Virginia. It is true that they use words of "like kind," while our statute reads "such as," but we think that, as used, these words have substantially the same meaning, and we accordingly hold that slot machines of the kind described in the stipulation before us are ejusdem generis with the games mentioned in § 1, chap. 64, p. 25, Laws 1907; and we also hold that the running of slot machines of a kind substantially like the one in question in this case comes under the inhibition of our statute, which forbids the running of "any other banking games."

For the reasons given above, the judgment of the lower court is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the District Court of Guadalupe County, for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion, and it is so ordered.

McFie, Pope, Abbott, and Parker, JJ., concur. Mann, J., having tried this case below, took no part in this decision.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SECOND CIRCUIT.

RE AUGUSTINE L. MCCREA.

(88 C. C. A. 282, 161 Fed. 246.)

Bankruptcy — discharge — refusal.

1. A bankrupt cannot be denied his discharge for wilfully refusing to obey an order to produce his books, if they were lost or destroyed by fire.

Same — absence of books.

2. Failure of one employed as a mine superintendent to keep books of his personal financial affairs shows no fraudulent intent which will deprive him of the privilege of discharge in bankruptcy.

Same — omission of assets — interest in estate.

3. A bankrupt cannot be said to have fraudulently or knowingly made a false oath, which will deprive him of the right to discharge, in not including in his schedule an interest in his deceased father's estate, where it is not obvious what interest belonged to him, or that it was transferable, while he claims to have transferred it, even though the transfer was so informal as not to have been effective.

Same — corporate stock.

4. A bankrupt cannot be deprived of his discharge for failure to include in his 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

schedule stock in a corporation which he had pledged as collateral for a debt, the property of the corporation itself having been disposed of by foreclosure of a mortgage.

Appeal — costs.

5. A creditor upon whose objection a bankrupt is denied his discharge for failure to disclose assets will not be required to pay the costs of appeal, although the decision is reversed, where the bankrupt refused to furnish information necessary to a proper disposition of the case.

(April 14, 1908.)

Case Note. — Omission of bankrupt to keep books as ground for refusing discharge.

Section 14(b) of the original bankrupt act (Act July 1, 1898), chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 550, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3427, provided as a ground upon which a discharge may be refused, that the bankrupt should have, "with fraudulent intent to conceal his true financial condition, and in contemplation of bankruptcy, destroyed, concealed, or failed to keep, books of account or records from which his true condition might be ascertained." The construction placed by the courts upon this provision having been such as to render it practically unavailable, it was amended by the act of February 5, 1903, 32 Stat. at L. 797, chap. 487, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1907, p. 1026, so that such provision now reads, "with intent to conceal his financial condition, destroyed, concealed, or failed to keep books of account or records from which such condition might be ascertained." The present note is limited to the question, under what circumstances a total failure to keep any books of account whatsoever will be taken as indicative of an intent to conceal the bankrupt's financial condition, and does not assume to include decisions as to the inferences to be drawn from the mode of bookkeeping employed, or the failure to keep a record of certain transactions.

The mere neglect to keep books and accounts showing the bankrupt's financial condition is not a ground for refusal to discharge. Re Spear, 103 Fed. 779; Re Blacklock, 118 Fed. 679.

Omission to keep books of account is not available as a ground for refusing to grant a discharge, where the proof shows that the bankrupt, who was employed in superintending a farm and commissary store for his brother with the understanding that he should have his living out of it, has not, since the passage of the act of bankruptcy, nor within more than three years before its passage, been engaged in business on his own account that required or made it appropriate for him to keep books. Sellers v. Bell, 36 C. C. A. 502, 94 Fed. 801.

In Re Lowenstein, 106 Fed. 51, it was held by the referee that where the evidence showed that the bankrupt's business since APPEAL by petitioner from an order of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York denying a discharge in bankruptcy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Lacombe, Cox, and Noyes, Circuit Judges.

Mr. John R. Keeler for appellant.

Mr. George B. Draper for appellee.

Noyes, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Augustine L. McCrea, having been adjudicated a bankrupt, applied in due season for his discharge. A creditor objected upon the following grounds: (1) That the bankrupt had committed an offense punishable by imprisonment under the bankruptcy law in knowingly and fraudulently making a false oath; (2) that he had fraudulently destroyed, concealed, and failed to keep records or books of account; (3) that he had failed to obey a lawful order of the referee for the production of books and papers. The district court referred the matter to a special master, who reported that the creditor had failed to sustain his objections, and that the bankrupt was entitled to his discharge. The court, however, declined to confirm this report, sustained the creditor's objections, and denied the discharge. The bankrupt was entitled to his discharge as a matter of right, unless debarred upon one of the statutory grounds specified by the creditor. We will consider these grounds in their inverse order.

It is charged that the bankrupt disobeyed an order of the referee requiring him to produce certain books and papers. He produced some papers, and explained that others were lost or had been destroyed in a fire. He was not proceeded against for contempt, and the special master, who was also the referee issuing the order, was apparently satisfied that his explanation was correct, and found that he did not disobey the order. Upon an examination of the record, we reach no different conclusion. While the attitude of the bankrupt upon his examination was the opposite of that of a frank witness, a finding that he intentionally violated the referee's order would be unwarranted.

The next objection to the discharge was that the bankrupt fraudulently concealed and failed to keep books of account showing his financial condition. There was no evi-the passage of the bankruptcy act had been that of a merchant tailor doing a very small business carried on by himself with the assistance of a boy, and tended to show that he omitted to keep regular books of account in order to avoid the trouble of keeping them, it did not establish a fraudulent intent to conceal his true financial condition, which would bar a discharge.

In Re Corn, 106 Fed. 143, it was held that a discharge would not be refused on the ground that the bankrupt failed to keep books of account, where the business (the nature of which is not stated) in which he was engaged for some time prior to the filing of his petition in bankruptcy was such that ordinarily books of account would probably not be kept.

Failure to keep books was held to be no ground for refusing a discharge, where it appeared that the bankrupts had been out of business for over two years, and therefore had no occasion to keep any books. Re Prager, 134 Fed. 1006.

In Re Keefer, 135 Fed. 885, it was held that a discharge would not be refused, on the ground of failure to keep books of account, to a school-teacher who also acted as agent for a small estate consisting of a farm, where the evidence did not indicate a failure to keep books of account with intent to conceal his financial condition with the object of defrauding his creditors.

Upon the other hand, in Re Berkowitz, 4 Am. Bankr. Rep. 37, it was held that a discharge would be refused to a bankrupt on the ground of failure to keep proper books of account, where a part of his business was the selling of bicycles on a deferred system of payments, although his business was a small one and the amounts involved were comparatively small.

In Bragassa v. St. Louis Cycle, 46 C. C. A. 154, 107 Fed. 77 (affirming 103 Fed. 936), a discharge was refused to a bankrupt who, after having failed in business, deposited such money as came into his hands in two different banks, in his wife's name, where it was mingled with money deposited by her, without keeping any record showing what funds he had and what disposition was made of them, where he testified that he did this to keep anybody "from jumping on it," it being presumable that he failed to make any record of his receipts and disbursements for a similar purpose.

In Re Bemis, 104 Fed. 672, a discharge was refused to a bankrupt who, having transferred his property and business, that of an eye specialist, to his wife, claiming thereafter to have been employed by her at a salary, failed to keep any regular books from which his state of affairs could be learned, although he kept a bank account in his own name from which he checked out money for the benefit of the property which had been transferred to the wife.

In Re Alvord, 135 Fed. 236, a discharge was refused to a bankrupt, the nature of whose business is not stated further than that he had been connected with certain corporations, and with one of them in the capacity of manager, upon the ground that, though a man of considerable business experience, he had failed to keep any books whatever from which his financial condition might be learned.

dence that the bankrupt concealed any books for it did not appear that he kept any. He was the superintendent of a mine. His personal business did not require the keeping of books. His failure to keep them indicated no fraudulent intent.

The real question in the case, then, is raised by the first objection,—whether the bankrupt was guilty of an offense under the bankruptcy law. The offense charged was that of making a false oath with respect to his property. The objecting creditor claimed that he knowingly and fraudulently withheld from his schedule of assets two items: (1) His interest in his father's estate; (2) his stock in the Standard Pyrites Company. The father of the bankrupt died in 1898, leaving a will in which he left his property in trust during the lives of the trustees. After providing for certain payments from the income to the testator's wife and daughter, the will directed the division of the remaining income among his children, including the bankrupt. Upon the death of either the wife or daughter during the existence of the trust the remainder income is increased. The will further provides that, upon the termination of the trust, the principal estate shall be divided among the children then living and the issue of deceased children. There was no evidence concerning the value of the estate or the income thereof, except that the bankrupt's wife had received in the aggregate $172 therefrom. The real estate described in the will was situated in New York. The inquiry, then, is whether this interest of the bankrupt was property which passed to the trustee in bankruptcy and which should have been included in the schedule of assets, if not previously conveyed away.

With respect to the principal estate, there is ground for two contentions: (1) It may be urged that the right of the bankrupt to take was wholly dependent upon the contingency that he outlive the surviving trustee,—that it cannot be determined until the death of the trustee who the remaindermen will be. Such an interest in many jurisdictions would be held to be a mere contingent remainder, and not "property," the title of which vested in the bankrupt within the meaning of the bankruptcy law. See Re Twaddell (D. C.) 110 Fed. 147; Re Wetmore 47 C. C. A. 477, 108 Fed. 520. (2) It may be contended that a devise of this character constitutes a vested and alienable remainder subject to be defeated by the contingency that the bankrupt may not outlive the trustees. The New York decisions are controlling with respect to the title to said real estate, and, although by no means uniform, seem to support the second contention. See 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Re Hoadley (D. C.) 101 Fed. 233. Moreover, in applying these decisions, we are met by the further inquiry whether the provisions of the will constituted a gift or a direction to divide. It is unnecessary for us to decide these questions. For the purposes of this case it is sufficient to point out their involved character.

The bankrupt's interest in the income is of a less uncertain nature. This interest seems to be vested and alienable. If not conveyed away, it undoubtedly should have been included in the bankrupt's schedule. The bankrupt, however, claims that, some years before the bankruptcy proceedings, and before the creation of the debt due the objecting creditor, he conveyed all his interest in his father's estate to his wife in consideration of love and affection. He failed to produce the conveyance, and his testimony was insufficient to establish the due execution and delivery of a legal conveyance. But, if certain interests in the estate of the bankrupt's father should have been included in the schedule of assets, it does not necessarily follow that the bankrupt knowingly and fraudulently made a false oath when he verified the schedule which did not mention them. It was not obvious what interests belonged to the bankrupt or that they were transferable. Moreover, as we have pointed out, the bankrupt claims that he did not own those interests. Informality in the conveyance and its delivery might have rendered it illegal, and still not affect the bankrupt's good faith. That but very little income had ever been received did not affect the character of the interests as property, but did have a bearing upon the bankrupt's fraudulent intent. Taking into consideration all the testimony and all the circumstances, we cannot say that the creditor has clearly shown that the bankrupt fraudulently and knowingly made a false oath in not referring in his schedule to his interest in his father's estate.

The following language quoted with approval by the circuit court of appeals of the third circuit in Woods v. Little, 67 C. C. A. 160, 134 Fed. 232, seems applicable here:

"Without discussing in detail the particular facts and circumstances of this case, we are of opinion the failure of the bankrupt to return in his schedules the interest complained of is not necessarily attributable to a fraudulent purpose. Indeed, the question of whether he had such an interest as passed under the bankrupt law was not easy of solution. The question of his right to discharge is a close one, but, on the whole, we incline to the opinion a discharge should be granted."

And as said in Re Wetmore (D. C.) 99

Fed. 703: "The burden is upon the exceptant to prove the allegation of fraud to the satisfaction of the court; and this burden she has not sustained. The best that can be said about the testimony is that the existence of a fraudulent intent to conceal may be in doubt. But, considering the technical nature of the arguments in support of the propositions that the interest of the bankrupt under his father's will was a vested interest, and that he now derives his title to the fund from that instrument and not from the will of his mother, the bankrupt can hardly be charged with fraudulent concealment of his interest because he may not have understood its true legal paternity. Merely to omit property from his schedule of assets would rarely be enough to prove a fraudulent intent on the part of the bankrupt."

The further contention of the objecting creditor that the bankrupt made a false oath by verifying his schedule without including his shares in the standard Pyrites Company requires little consideration. While it appears that this stock stands in the name of the bankrupt, it also appears that it is pledged as collateral, and that the property of the corporation has been disposed of upon the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage. There is nothing to show that this stock—and much more the bankrupt's equity in it—is of the slightest value. A bankrupt is not guilty of making a false oath when he omits from his sworn schedule securities which are absolutely worthless. The language of Judge Coxe in Re Eaton (D. C.) 110 Fed. 733, applies: "There is nothing to show the value of the stock . . . when the schedules were filed. It may have become utterly worthless at that time. It had been transferred to a trustee who was authorized to sell it to satisfy unpaid assessments. A receiver had been appointed of all the bankrupt's property, including the stock. . . . In these circumstances a perfectly honest man might have thought that the stock was of no value, and have forgotten to mention it in his schedules."

See also Re Pearce, 21 Vt. 611, Fed. Cas. No. 10,873.

We conclude, therefore, that the report of the special master who heard the witnesses and found that the creditor had failed to sustain his objections should have been confirmed by the court, and that the bankrupt should have received his discharge.

Only the matter of costs remains to be considered. As already stated, the bankrupt was not a frank witness. If discharges were granted only as rewards to bankrupts who freely furnish information to their creditors, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

this bankrupt would be pre-eminently not entitled to one. Undoubtedly this attitude brought upon him the action of the district court; and, while we think the bankrupt entitled of right to his discharge and consequently set aside the action of the district court, we are not inclined to require the objecting creditor to pay the costs of this appeal.

The order of the District Court is reversed, without costs.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

ANNA HENRY, Respt.,

v.

HAMMOND HERRINGTON, Appt.

(193 N. Y. 218, 86 N. E. 29.)

Election of remedy — sale — suit for price — rescission.

One who has sold and transferred personal property to another, and received a portion of the price, has no right to sue him and others to whom he has transferred the property, for conspiracy to defraud her of her property, alleging the sale and transfer in the complaint; and such attempted action will not, therefore, on the theory of election of remedies, bar her right to sue her vendee for the unpaid purchase money.

(October 23, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming a judgment of a trial term for Rensselaer County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the purchase price of certain property alleged to have been sold and delivered. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John T. Norton, for appellant:

In bringing the action for conspiracy the plaintiff elected one of two inconsistent remedies, and was precluded, by such election, from maintaining the action for the purchase price.

Westfall v. Peacock, 63 Barb. 209; Morris v. Rexford, 18 N. Y. 552; Conrow v. Little, 115 N. Y. 387, 5 L.R.A. 693, 22 N. E. 340; Terry v. Munger, 121 N. Y. 161, 8 L.R.A. 216, 18 Am. St. Rep. 803, 24 N. E. 272; Fowler v. Bowery Sav. Bank, 113 N. Y. 450, 4 L.R.A. 145, 10 Am. St. Rep. 479, 21 N. E. 172; Roome v. Jennings, 2 Misc. 257, 21 N. Y. Supp. 938; Re Garver, 176 N. Y. 386, 68 N. E. 667; Crossman v. Universal Rubber

Note.—The effect of choosing, by mistake, a remedy not legally available, is treated in a case note to Clark v. Heath, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 144.

Co. 127 N. Y. 34, 13 L.R.A. 91, 27 N. E. 400; Drexel v. Hollander, 112 App. Div. 25, 98 N. Y. Supp. 104.

Mr. John B. Holmes, with Messrs. Holmes, Bryan, & Holmes, for respondent:

The former action did not amount to an election of remedies which would estop the action for the purchase price.

Kinney v. Kiernan, 49 N. Y. 169; Bowery Sav. Bank v. Belt, 66 Hun, 60, 20 N. Y. Supp. 746; Marsh v. Masterton, 101 N. Y. 406, 5 N. E. 59; Sullivan v. Ross, 113 Mich. 311, 71 N. W. 634, 76 N. W. 309; Stowell v. Chamberlain, 60 N. Y. 272; Morris v. Rexford, 18 N. Y. 552.

The demand of possession of property by the plaintiff, after having requested defendant to pay, which he refused, was not an election to rescind the sale.

Hand*, 13 Johns. 434, 7 Am. Dec. 392; Van-Brocklen v. Smeallie, 140 N. Y. 75, 35 N. E. 415.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover the balance of the purchase money due to the plaintiff from the defendant upon a sale of personal property. The fact of the sale was put in issue by the answer; but the plaintiff recovered a verdict for the amount claimed by her, and the judgment upon the verdict has been unanimously affirmed by the appellate division. This is sufficient to dispose of the controverted facts of the case; but the appellant insists that a serious question of law survives the disposition made below, which has been erroneously determined. That was whether a previous action, brought by the plaintiff against this defendant and other persons, did not bar her from maintaining the present action, upon the ground that there had been an election by her between inconsistent remedies for obtaining relief, to which she must be held. The answer does not plead this defense, as it should have done to make it available (Roberge v. Winne, 144 N. Y. 709, 39 N. E. 631); but it may be that by the course taken by the parties upon the trial, that objection was waived. I think that it was, and, so assuming, it is quite clear that the plaintiff had not been precluded from maintaining this action upon the ground stated. The facts are established for us by the verdict and judgment below, and they show that the property sold by the plaintiff consisted of certain furniture, fixtures, etc., contained in a hotel which she and her husband were conducting. He was the lessee of the hotel, and had transferred to her the personal property mentioned in payment of an indebtedness, and also subject to a chattel mortgage given by him to the defendant to secure a loan of $500. Some time thereafter she made a sale of these chattels to the defendant for the sum of $1,700, and executed a bill of sale thereof. One hundred dollars of the price were paid down. The balance, less the amount due upon the chattel mortgage, was to be paid some two weeks later, and the property sold was, by the direction of the defendant, to be left in the hotel. An explanation of the transaction is furnished in the evidence that the defendant expected to sell the property to Dennin, the lessor of the hotel, or to Ormsby, whom Dennin intended to secure as a tenant. Subsequently the plaintiff and her husband were dispossessed, and Ormsby went into possession of the hotel and its contents, having purchased the latter from the defendant. The defendant failed to pay his indebtedness to the plaintiff upon the bill of sale at the time when it matured, and he refused to admit any liability, referring her to Dennin and Ormsby. Believing, or acting upon the advice, that there had been a plan or conspiracy between Dennin, Ormsby, and the defendant to cause her husband to be dispossessed of the hotel, and herself to be cheated out of the property sold to the defendant, and after making futile efforts to get it back, she commenced an action against the three, and demanded damages against them, upon allegations that they had agreed together and had conspired to defraud her of the possession and ownership of her property. Her complaint, however, set forth the sale to this defendant by the bill of sale, his failure to pay, and that she had "never yet received either the property, . . . or any money, or a return of the bill of sale." When the action came on for trial, it was dismissed upon the pleadings. Thereafter she brought the present action.

If the plaintiff had two remedies open to her adoption in order to right herself, which were not consistent with each other, and she made an election of one in bringing her former action, she must be held to it, and will be deemed to have been concluded thereby from prosecuting the other remedy. This doctrine of the election of inconsistent remedies consists in holding a party, where there is, by law or by contract, a choice between two remedies, which proceed upon opposite and irreconcilable claims of right, to the one taken. Morris v. Rexford, 18 N.

Y. 552; Mills v. Parkhurst, 126 N. Y. 89, 13 L.R.A. 472, 26 N. E. 1041. If it appeared that the plaintiff had a right, either to disaffirm the sale of the chattels, or to treat the sale as absolute and to sue for their price, then, undoubtedly, by commencing an action upon the former theory, she would have concluded herself from ever proceeding upon the other theory. But, as the facts are established, she had no such choice, with respect to the transaction of sale, and that was manifest in her complaint in the former action. Her pleading showed that the title to the property had been transferred to this defendant under a bill of sale, and the action was properly dismissed and refused trial; for there could have been no conspiracy between the parties defendant to deprive the plaintiff of property, which she expressly alleged had been legally transferred by her to another. The proof is that the transaction of sale was complete by the execution of the bill of sale and the part payment of the price, and that the delivery of the subject of the sale was made in accordance with the direction of the vendee. The plaintiff had but the one course open to adoption against the defendant, and that was to compel him to pay what he still owed her. It is not the mere fact of having previously brought some action against a defendant to obtain relief upon such a transaction which would determine the application of the doctrine of election. It would be the fact that a plaintiff, with two courses open to him, had, by his previous action, declared his election or decision to affirm or to disaffirm the transaction, as the case might be. The right to make an election must actually exist; and, if it shall appear that it did not, then it is quite immaterial, in its bearing upon a subsequent action, that some previous action, looking to a remedy for the plaintiff's loss, had been brought. Morris v. Rexford, supra; Terry v. Munger, 121 N. Y. 161, 8 L.R.A. 216, 18 Am. St. Rep. 803, 24 N. E. 272. The plaintiff's previous action was fruitless, because she had no right to maintain it, upon her own showing; but that did not preclude her from subsequently bringing an action in which she asserted a right which she possessed. Kinney v. Kiernan, 49 N. Y. 164, 169. She had made no election, for there was no choice of remedies against the defendant, and in suing him with others, as for a conspiracy, she mistook or misconceived her remedy, and was dismissed; but she did not forfeit her legal right to bring this action to recover from the defendant what he owed her. Any step or action taken by her, which was fruitless because proceeding upon a misconception of the rights which the law gave her, left her 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) unaffected as to any legal remedy which she did possess.

No other question requires consideration, and I advise the affirmance of the judgment.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

LOUIS LEVIN et al., Resp'ts.,
v.

JAMES S. DIETZ, Appt.

(194 N. Y. 376, 87 N. E. 454.)

Contract — unilateral — acceptance.

1. The mere physical acceptance and attempted enforcement by one party of a contract unilateral in form, executed by another, does not make the former a party to the contract so as to bind him to its performance.

Specific performance — unilateral contract.

2. Equity will not specifically enforce a contract to sell real estate which is sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds so far as the vendor is concerned, but which the purchaser does not promise to perform until after the vendor has withdrawn his offer.

(February 23, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for Kings County in complainants' favor in a suit to compel specific performance of an alleged contract to convey certain real estate. Reversed.

Statement by Hiscock, J.:

The action was brought by the respondents

Note.—The right of a party not originally bound by a contract within the statute of frauds because he did not sign the same, against another party who did sign, is discussed in the case note to Western Timber Co. v. Kalama River Lumber Co. 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 397. It will be noted that none of the earlier New York cases upon which the court, in LEVIN v. DIETZ, relies, involved a contract in which the lack of mutuality resulted merely from the fact that the party who sought to enforce specific performance had not signed the contract so as to become bound thereby under the statute of frauds. The somewhat analogous question as to the right to specific performance of an option to purchase, as affected by the lack of mutuality of obligation, is treated in a case note to Pollock v. Brookover, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 403.

as vendees to enforce the specific performance of a contract claimed to have been made by the appellant for the sale of certain real estate. The facts relied on as constituting an enforceable contract are set forth in the findings of fact, and are quite brief. It is there stated that the appellant was the owner of the premises in question, and that, "on December 1, 1904, plaintiff and defendant and said Dakin [a broker authorized by the defendant to sell the real estate in question] met and discussed a sale of the property . . . for $16,500; that, on December 3, 1904, defendant wrote and signed a letter addressed to plaintiffs, in which he stated that he would mail the deeds of said property to certain brokers in Brooklyn, and requiring plaintiffs to be present on December 5th at a place indicated in the letter, with $16,500 in cash, and that they would receive a deed of said property; that, on the day last mentioned the defendant wrote and signed a letter addressed to said Dakin, . . . in which the defendant stated that he had written the intending purchasers . . . [meaning plaintiffs] to be ready at the office of Jackson & Dombek on December 5, 1904, at 3 o'clock P. M., and to have the money ready, and that the property would then be turned over; . . . that the plaintiffs were present at the time and place on the day mentioned, . . . and . . . produced and tendered the sum of $16,500, and demanded a deed of the premises, . . . and that the defendant was not then and there present, and that no deed of said premises was offered to plaintiffs." There was no finding of any other or different contract, by parol or otherwise, than that above set forth.

Mr. Hadley M. Greene, for appellant:

The contract is unilateral, and unenforceable by specific performance.

Hiscock, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Respondents, as vendees, are seeking to compel the appellant, as vendor, to specifically perform a contract for the sale of real estate, and he is resisting on various grounds. We deem it unnecessary to discuss more than two of the questions involved in the controversy. We shall assume, simply for the purposes of this discussion, that the letters signed by the appellant and set forth in the findings already quoted constituted a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the statute of frauds. After making this assumption, however, there remain the other questions, whether there was any contract binding respondents to buy the real estate, which it is claimed appellant agreed to sell, and, if not, whether a court of equity, at the suit of a party not himself bound, will enforce performance by his adversary. We think that both of these questions must be answered in the negative, and that it must be held that the respondents were not under any obligation to buy appellant's land, and that therefore there was lack of consideration for the latter's contract, and lack of that mutuality of obligation, which are both essential to the successful prosecution of this action.

It has sometimes been intimated, in earlier cases in other jurisdictions, if not in this state, that the mere physical acceptance and attempted enforcement by one party of a contract unilateral in form, executed by another, made the former a party to and bound by the contract. This doctrine, however, has not been adopted or affirmed by later decisions in this state, even if elsewhere. In certain cases cited by the respondents the court has enforced a contract signed by only one party, but in these cases it expressly appeared, where the agreement sought to be enforced was one to buy, that the seller had agreed by parol to sell upon the terms mentioned in the paper signed by the purchaser (Mason v. Decker, 72 N. Y. 595, 28 Am. Rep. 190); or that the written agreement sought to be enforced gave an option which the party seeking to enforce had expressly accepted within the term of its life (Pettibone v. Moore, 75 Hun, 461, 27 N. Y. Supp. 455; Jones v. Barnes, 105 App. Div. 287, 94 N. Y. Supp. 695); and under these circumstances it was held that there was a "binding agreement" or a "completed bargain," and that the written contract, although unilateral in form, could be enforced. We regard those cases as decided on principles not applicable to this one, where there is not claimed to have been any express agreement by the vendees to buy, and where there has been no acceptance by them of the promise of the vendor, except such as was involved in their offer to perform at a time when he had withdrawn from his promise. On such facts, we see no opportunity to claim that the respondents were under any obligation to buy appellant's land, or that there was any mutuality of obligation; and thus we come to the remaining question.

The decision in this state of the question whether equity will enforce against one party performance of a contract not imposing mutual obligations on the other has been attended by more or less confusion and conflict of authorities. This was early exemplified by the opinions of Chancellor Kent in two cases. In the early case of Benedict v. Lynch, 1 Johns. Ch. 370, 373, 7 Am. Dec. 484, he wrote, in an action for specific performance of a contract relating to the sale of real estate: "I need not stay to examine how far the objection of a want of mutuality is applicable to this contract, since the decision can be placed with more satisfaction upon the intrinsic merits of the case. But, the point being stated by the counsel, I am unwilling to pass it by without observing that it has been ruled in several cases [citing them] that a bill for specific performance will not be sustained, if the remedy be not mutual, or where one party only is bound by the agreement. This doctrine received a very clear illustration, and an explicit sanction, in a late decision by Lord Redesdale. . . . Though there are other cases in which an agreement has not been deemed within the statute of frauds, and a specific performance has been decreed, when the contract was signed only by the party sought to be charged, . . . yet the contrary opinion appears, from the most recent decisions, to be now prevailing." Later, in the case of Clason v. Bailey (14 Johns. 489), the chancellor, again writing on this subject, said: "I have thought, and have often intimated, that the weight of argument was in favor of the construction that the agreement concerning lands, to be enforced in equity, should be mutually binding, and that the one party ought not to be at liberty to enforce, at his pleasure, an agreement which the other was not entitled to claim. . . . But, notwithstanding this objection, it appears from the review of the cases that the point [that a contract not mutual would be enforced] is too well settled to be now questioned." And cases may be found in this state sustaining this later view of the chancellor. Re Hunter, 1 Edw. Ch. 1; McCrea v. Purmort, 16 Wend. 460-465, 30 Am. Dec. 103; Justice v. Lang, 42 N. Y. 493, 1 Am. Rep. 576.

One case is especially relied on by respondents, as deciding that a contract may be enforced notwithstanding lack of mutual obligations and resulting consideration, which cannot fairly be cited as authority for that doctrine, and that is the case of Worrall v. Munn, 5 N. Y. 229, 55 Am. Dec. 330. Because of its apparent direct conflict with the later cases hereafter to be referred to, this case deserves especial attention. It was brought by plaintiff to compel the specific performance by defendants of a contract for the sale of real estate. The defendants had executed an agreement to convey the lands in question. A counterpart of the agreement was executed by "Henry Worrall for Noah Worrall," the plaintiff, the seal being affixed at the end of the agent's name. It was contended, amongst other things, that the agreement was not properly executed in behalf of the vendee and plaintiff, Worrall, by his agent, and that therefore the agreement, not being binding on him, was not binding on defendants for want of mutuality. Judge Paige finally reached the conclusion that the contract executed by the agent was binding on his principal, and this determination established the proposition that there was an agreement executed by both vendor and vendee, and therefore free from the vice of lack of mutuality. Having done this, he then proceeded further, and reached the view that, even if the agreement was void as to the vendee because of lack of proper execution, still it could be enforced notwithstanding the lack of mutuality. Thus, he placed his opinion on two grounds, and, this being so, the concluding paragraph of the opinion does not make it plain on which ground the majority of the court concurred with him in his conclusion that specific performance should be enforced.

However, whatever conflict and uncertainty may have been created by earlier decisions, in comparatively recent years a series of cases have come to this court, finally leading up to that of Wadick v. Mace, 191 N. Y. 1, 83 N. E. 571, whereby it has been finally and firmly established that specific performance of a unilateral contract will not be adjudged against the party who has executed it on behalf of the opposite party, who is not in any manner bound by the contract. Palmer v. Gould, 144 N. Y. 671, 39 N. E. 378, was an action to enforce specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. A judgment decreeing specific performance was reversed, and, although the other members of the court reached this decision on other questions, Judge Gray very fully reviewed the authorities bearing on the question whether specific performance of a contract for the sale of lands would be decreed if there was not a mutual obligation and remedy, and very decisively reached the conclusion that it would not be so decreed. Stokes v. Stokes, 148 N. Y. 708, 716, 43 N. E. 211, 214, was an action to enforce specific performance of a contract for the sale of certain stock, and this court, in upholding the judgment of the trial term dismissing plaintiff's complaint, approved the rule that "a contract must possess certain elements in order that a court of equity may exercise jurisdiction to compel its performance. 'It must be upon a valuable consideration. . . . It must be, in general, mutual in its obligations and its remedy.'" Mahaney v. Carr, 175 N. Y. 454, 460, 67 N. E. 903, 905, was an action to enforce specific performance of an alleged agreement to adopt a child and give it a certain share of the adopted father's property. This court reversed the judgment of the courts below awarding plaintiff a recovery, and Judge O'Brien, writing for a majority of the court, said: "If this was a contract, it certainly was not a mutual one, binding the child and her father [claiming to have made and seeking to enforce the contract] as well as the grandfather. . . . In order to justify a court of equity to decree specific performance, there must be a contract which in general is mutual in its obligations and its remedy, reasonably certain as to its subject-matter, its stipulations, its purposes, its parties, and the circumstances under which it is made." Ide v. Brown, 178 N. Y. 20, 39, 70 N. E. 101, 105, was an action to enforce a contract somewhat similar in its nature to the one involved in the last action. And again Judge O'Brien reiterates the doctrine that a contract, in order to be specifically enforced by the court, must be mutual; and that "a party not bound by the agreement itself has no right to call upon a court of equity to enforce specific performance against the other contracting party, by expressing his willingness, in his plea to perform his part of the agreement. His right to the aid of the court does not depend upon his subsequent offer to perform the contract, upon his part, but upon its original obligatory character." The last case, that of Wadick v. Mace, was an action like the present one, brought by the vendee to compel specific performance of a contract for the sale of lands. The contract sought to be enforced contained a provision, "that, in the event of a breach of the within contract by the party of the second part [vendee and plaintiff], and the said party of the second part being unable to fulfil the terms and conditions of the within contract, then this contract shall be null and void, . . . and no suit or action whether for specific performance or damages shall be maintained by the party of the first part against the party of the second part." Page 3 of 191 N. Y. It was assumed that the clause thus quoted resulted in the same lack of mutuality of obligations as would have existed if the contract had simply been executed by the vendor, and, on this assumption, Judge Willard Bartlett discussed the question whether specific performance would be enforced of a contract thus lacking in mutual obligations, and, after a review of many authorities bearing on that question, and including those last above cited, he reached the conclusion, concurred in by all of the members of the court, that such specific performance of a contract would be denied in the absence of mutuality of obligation and remedy in both parties to the contract.

In view of the principles thus approved and adopted, it must be held that the order and judgment appealed from were erroneous, and must be reversed, and a new trial awarded, with costs to abide event.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

MARTHA CHRISTENSEN, by Guardian ad Litem, Respt.,
v.

OREGON SHORT LINE RAILROAD COM-PANY, Appt.

(— Utah, —, 99 Pac. 676.)

Carrier — slamming door — injury.

1. Negligence on the part of a railroad company will not be inferred from the mere fact that a car door slammed shut, catching and crushing the hand of a passenger, who, while attempting to pass through it, rested his hand on the door jamb.

Same — contributory negligence.

2. It is not necessarily negligence per se for a passenger to rest his hand on the door jamb while attempting to leave a car, so as to prevent his holding the carrier liable in case the door slams shut, catching and crushing his fingers.

(January 13, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Weber County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. P. L. Williams, George H. Smith, and John G. Willis, for appellant:

The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is not applicable.

3 Thomp. Neg. §§ 2977, 2978; Goss v. Northern P. R. Co. 48 Or. 439, 87 Pac. 149; Harwick v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 85 Ga. 507, 11 S. E. 832; Skinner v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 128 N. C. 435, 39 S. E. 65.

The passenger's negligence in placing her hand on the door jamb precludes recovery.

Texas & P. R. Co. v. Overall, 82 Tex. 247, 18 S. W. 142; Guthman, v. Manhattan R. Co. 53 N. Y. Supp. 139.

Mr. C. R. Hollingsworth also for appellant.

Messrs. W. L. Maginnis and S. T. Corn for respondent.

Frick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of appellant. The action was prosecuted by respondent as guardian ad litem for the benefit of his daughter, a minor. After alleging the corporate capacity of appellant, and that the appellant, on the 15th day of September, 1907, did receive the minor aforesaid as a passenger for hire, the complaint states the following as constituting negligence on the part of appellant, namely: "That the said defendant company so managed, constructed, and operated its passenger car in which the said Martha Christensen was riding that the door thereof would stand open, and was permitted to swing upon its hinges, and that, when the said Martha Christensen undertook to alight from said train at Bountiful, and while waiting for other passengers to alight, standing in the aisle, by a sudden jerk of said train she was thrown against the said door, and the same closed upon her fingers, catching the three first fingers of the left hand between the door and the jamb thereof, crushing the same." It is further alleged "that said accident was caused by reason of the said door not being held firmly in its place, and also by reason of the careless and negligent causing of said train to jerk whilst the passengers were alighting therefrom." It will be observed that no negligence is directly charged except to "jerk" the train. No defect is alleged in any appliance or instrumentality, nor is it alleged that the door was left open negligently, or that the appellant was negligent because the door was "not being held firmly in its place." The negligence, therefore, if any, must be inferred from the facts stated, except that the appellant was negligent in causing the train to "jerk," as stated above.

The evidence upon the part of the respondent to establish the foregoing allegations is, in substance, as follows: Martha Christensen, the injured minor, as appears from the printed abstract, testified: "My name is Martha Christensen, and I am thirteen years old. About the middle of last September, I went with my father from Ogden to Woods Cross. Father bought a ticket for me. I put my left hand on the door frame, and the door came shut on it. I was going out of the car. Father went out of the car ahead of me, and was out on the platform. The car had stopped before I got up to go out. I came out and was outside on the platform of the car. I just came out and then put my hand on the door frame. I was on the platform outside. I don't know what I put my hand on the door frame for. I can't describe just what I was doing, and how I happened to put my hand on the door frame. I was going out, and then I just put my hand on the door frame, and then the door slammed shut on it." On cross-examination she said: "I noticed the door was slamming when I was sitting in the car, and that was before I got up to go out. It was just about soon after I got on the train that I noticed the door. . . . That was soon after I got on the train at Ogden, and it continued to slam backwards and forwards."

The father, after stating that he and Martha, on September 15, 1907, were passengers in appellant's train, in part testified: "The accident happened through the door shutting on her fingers as she was getting off. The first I knew of it (I was already down on the platform of the station at Woods Cross) was when she came down crying and holding her hand. When I got off the train, it had stopped. . . . I noticed the door on the train. It was on the swing, and every little while when the train slacked up it would go shut with a crash. I have no knowledge as to what caused it to go shut at the time it crushed her hand. I didn't see that. I have frequently observed passenger cars and the doors to them, most of them which I have seen have a catch. When the train is stopped at a station and the passengers are getting off the car, the door is fastened back with a catch. . . . I do not know just what kind of a catch it is. It is a clasp that goes back. A clasp comes back to that hook to hold it, with a spring on it. . . . It is automatic, and you just push it back and it catches. It is for the purpose of holding it open." On cross-examination the witness said: "The door was open back when I got off. I couldn't tell particularly when was the last time I saw it swing to with the noise. It was before I got to Woods Cross, but I couldn't tell you just where it was."

The conductor testified: "I first learned of it [the accident] when she stepped off the station platform down on the ground. I made an examination of the door of the car. It was O. S. L. 151, I think. I made an examination of the fastenings provided for holding the door open. They were in perfect condition. The door held when it was pushed back. I simply looked to see what was the cause of the door slamming. I got up to see after the train started. . . . The fastening was all right on the door." He further said, on cross-examination, that he made the examination after the train had left the station; that he could not say whether the door was clamped back at the time the girl got off the train; that both doors of the car were open all the way from Ogden to Salt Lake City; that they were open because the weather was warm.

The foregoing substantially is all the evidence adduced at the trial. At the close of the evidence, the appellant requested the court to direct the jury to find for it. The court refused the request, and submitted 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the case to the jury upon the evidence. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of respondent, upon which the court entered judgment, and hence this appeal.

The appellant excepted to the refusal of the court to direct a verdict, and now urges that the court erred in submitting the case to the jury upon the evidence adduced at the trial. There certainly is no evidence whatever to sustain the allegation of negligence with regard to the moving or jerking of the train. This, therefore, is eliminated from the case. Is there any evidence of negligence in any other respect? It certainly cannot be contended that there is any direct evidence that any appliance or instrumentality in use by appellant was defective, or that the injury was caused by any such defect. Is there any indirect or circumstantial evidence from which such negligence may be inferred, or are the facts and circumstances, as disclosed by the evidence, such as bring the case within the maxim of res ipsa loquitur? In other words, are the circumstances surrounding the accident in question such that negligence upon the part of appellant may be assumed or inferred from the mere happening of the accident? Appellant contends that there is no evidence of negligence, either direct or circumstantial, and that the undisputed facts, as they appear from the evidence, do not bring the case within the maxim aforesaid. Upon the other hand, respondent insists that the facts and circumstances are such as bring the case within the maxim, and that all that was incumbent upon him to prove to entitle him to a verdict at the hands of the jury was proved at the trial. We have very recently had occasion to discuss and apply the maxim of res ipsa loquitur as between carrier and passenger in the cases of Dearden v. San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. 33 Utah, 147, 93 Pac. 271, and Paul v. Salt Lake City R. Co. 34 Utah, 1, 95 Pac. 363. The maxim Res ipsa loquitur is merely a rule of evidence applicable in a certain class of cases, and is generally applied in cases of injuries to passengers.

The maxim, when applicable to the facts and circumstances of a particular case, is not intended to, and does not, dispense with establishing negligence. In all cases when negligence is the gist of the action, the negligence must be proved, but in case of an injury to a passenger he is only required to prove that the injury was occasioned by a collision, derailing or upsetting of coaches, breaking of machinery or appliances, or things of that character, or through some act or acts of the servants operating the machinery or appliances, or in the management of the instrumentalities or the means used in the business over which the carrier has control, and for the conduct and management of which he is responsible. Paul v. Salt Lake City R. Co. 30 Utah, 49, 83 Pac. 563. The law imposes the duty upon the carrier of exercising the utmost care to protect his passengers against accidents; and, in case an accident occurs, the inference arises that the carrier has not exercised that high degree of care which the law imposes. If such care had been exercised, the inference is that the accident would have been avoided; that is, if the degree of care which the law imposes had been exercised in the construction and maintenance of the track and in the selection and inspection of machinery, instrumentalities, and appliances of all kinds, and in handling them, by the servants, then it may be inferred that the accident would not have occurred. But this inference in its last analysis amounts simply to one way of proving or establishing negligence. It means, too, just what the maxim implies. "The thing speaks for itself." That is, an accident has happened, therefore it may be inferred that, by the exercise of the degree of care required, it could have been avoided. The only difference between an ordinary case of negligence arising between master and servant, or between those sustaining other relations, and one arising between a carrier and passenger, consists in the manner of establishing the negligence constituting the gist of the action. In the first instance referred to, the happening of the accident causing the injury ordinarily is no proof of negligence; while, as between carrier and passenger, when arising as above indicated, the happening of the accident may be, and usually is, prima facie proof of negligence. It must not be assumed, however, as it sometimes is, that the maxim of res ipsa loquitur is limited to cases arising between carrier and passenger. This is well illustrated by the New York court of appeals in the case of Griffen v. Manice, 166 N. Y. 188, 52 L.R.A. 922, 82 Am. St. Rep. 630, 59 N. E. 925, in which case there is a learned and interesting discussion with regard to the application and legal effect of the maxim. Nor should it be assumed that the maxim is applicable under all circumstances as between carrier and passenger. There may be, and are, accidents which cause injuries to passengers where the maxim cannot be applied. The conditions under which the maxim does or does not apply are illustrated and applied in the following, among other, cases: Herstine v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 151 Pa. 244, 25 Atl. 104; Græff v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 161 Pa. 230, 23 L.R.A. 606, 41 Am. St. Rep. 885, 28 Atl. 1107; Morris v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 106 N. Y. 678, 13 N. E. 455; Griffen v. Manice, supra; Pennsylvania 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

R. Co. v. MacKinney, 124 Pa. 462, 2 L.R.A. 820, 10 Am. St. Rep. 601, 17 Atl. 14; Goss v. Northern P. R. Co. 48 Or. 439, 87 Pac. 149; Paul v. Salt Lake City R. Co. 30 Utah, 41, 83 Pac. 563; Dearden v. San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. and Paul v. Salt Lake R. Co. supra.

Referring now to the evidence in this case, does it show any negligence on the part of appellant? As we have seen, there was no negligence in the management of the train. It stood still before the accident occurred, and remained so until after it had occurred. There is no evidence that any act of an employee in any way caused or contributed to the happening of the accident. There is no evidence of any defect in any appliance or instrumentality used by appellant, unless such defect may be inferred from the fact that a door closed while the passenger was in the act of alighting from the train after passing through the open door. But can it be inferred that there is some defect in an ordinary door simply because it swings upon its hinges, and closes unexpectedly? If we bear in mind that a door swings upon hinges, that it is intended to open and close for the use of passengers to enter and leave the car, how can any inference of negligence arise merely because a door closes at a time when it was not expected to do so by a particular person, and for some unexplained reason? Can it be said that, because there is some evidence that car doors are usually provided with a catch to hold the door open while passengers are passing in or out of the car at stations, and that because this door was not held open, therefore the catch was defective? Before this inference can prevail, it seems to us it should be made to appear that the door was in fact placed back so as to come in contact with the catch, and that it was not held in place by it. If, under such circumstances, the catch did not hold, it might possibly be inferred that the catch was defective. Can it be assumed that the appellant was negligent in not seeing that the door was placed back sufficiently to interlock with the catch? This, it seems, would be wholly unreasonable. Car doors, as a matter of common, if not universal, knowledge, are not entirely under the control of the employees of the railroad company, but are used at pleasure by the passengers for the purpose of passing in and out of the car, or in passing from car to car. If, therefore, it be said that it is the duty of the railroad company to see that every car door is fastened back when it is opened, it must follow that the company must station a servant at every door to attend to the fastening of it in case the passing passenger either leaves it unlatched in closing it or unfastened to the back catch when opening it.

To merely have a servant fasten the door, and then leave it, would be of little, if any, use, since any passenger might unfasten it the next moment. If the law does not impose the duty upon the railroad company to keep a constant watch upon the car doors, then no negligence is shown in this case. There is no evidence that the door was not fastened back at the proper time, unless the fact that it closed raises a presumption that it was not so fastened. If such a presumption arises at all, it cannot prevail against the known fact that both ingoing and outgoing passengers interfere with car doors. There is evidence that there were other passengers on the car platform, but there is no evidence whatever to show that the door was not caused to be closed by some passenger or someone in the car or from some other natural cause. The movement of the train did not cause it to close because the train did not move. It is not shown that any act of the appellant or of any servant caused the door to close. Therefore the real cause is left to mere conjecture. When it is remembered that doors are made to swing upon their hinges for the purpose of opening and closing at any time, then the closing of a door is such a usual and natural occurrence that no negligence can be inferred from the simple fact that the occurrence took place. But, if an inference would arise that the back catch was defective because the door closed, this inference was entirely overcome by the positive testimony of the conductor, who testified that the catch provided to hold the door back when open was in perfect order and held the door in place when it was forced back into the catch. There is no evidence disputing this testimony. The rule, therefore, applies which is well and tersely stated in a similar case by the supreme court of Oregon in the syllabus of that case in the following language: "Where the evidence of negligence is entirely inferential, and the testimony for the defendant is clear and undisputed, to the effect that there was no negligence, the plaintiff's case is overcome as a matter of law, and it becomes the duty of the judge to take the case from the jury." Goss v. Northern P. R. Co. supra.

Taking the whole evidence in this case, we are unable to see how respondent can sustain the judgment in the light of sound reason and correct principles. But the decisions need not be rested upon reason and principle alone. There is direct, and what we consider good, authority to sustain our conclusions.

In the case of Skinner v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 128 N. C. 435, 30 S. E. 65, the facts were almost identical with those in this case. The only difference between that case and this is that there the train was moved, while in this case it stood still. The court, in the course of the opinion at page 437 of 128 N. C., disposes of the alleged negligence as follows: "We cannot see the least negligence in the management of the defendant's train, and there was no testimony of any fault in the condition or construction of the coach door. The occasion was purely an accident. Nothing short of stationing a man at both doors in each coach at every stopping place to watch the doors to prevent injury to passengers could prevent just such accidents, and such a requirement would be most unreasonable under present conditions."

A similar accident was before the court in the case of Goss v. Northern P. R. Co. 48 Or. 439, 87 Pac. 149, wherein the supreme court of Oregon held that the mere closing of a door does not come within the maxim of res ipsa loquitur, but it should be made to appear that there was some defect in the door or in the fastening, or that the door was closed by some other act of negligence on the part of the company. It is true that in that case it was also held that it constituted negligence upon the part of the passenger to place his fingers on the door frame against which the door naturally closed.

In the case of Hardwick v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 85 Ga. 507, 11 S. E. 832, it was held that the closing of a car door by which a passenger's hand was injured under circumstances which raised a much stronger inference of negligence than is present in this case was a pure accident, and did not authorize a recovery.

No case has been cited where, under circumstances as disclosed by this record, a recovery was permitted, and we do not think such a case can be found. It is possible that in case of an adult passenger the fact of exposing himself to such an injury may be held to be negligence upon his part which would prevent a recovery. Some of the courts held it to be such as a matter of law. 3 Thomp. Neg. § 2987. But the cases, so far as we know, all hold that an injury caused by the mere closing of an ordinary car door, either while the train is in motion or while standing still, is a pure accident for which the carrier is not liable, unless the injury is caused by some defect in the door or its appendages, or is attributable to some act constituting negligence upon the part of the carrier. It seems to us that this is good law and good sense in view that the carrier is not an insurer as against an injury to passengers. If, in view of the evidence in this case, it should be held that respondent can recover, it would have to be based upon the theory that a common carrier of passengers assumes and insures against every risk and danger to which a passenger may be exposed, including the consequent injury arising therefrom. Such is clearly not the law. While the carrier is required to exercise the utmost degree of care to prevent accidents and injury to his passengers, he nevertheless is not an insurer of their safety. We remark, however, that, independent of the fact that the injured passenger in this case was an infant, we are not prepared to subscribe to the doctrine that, under all circumstances in case of an injury to a passenger by the closing of a car door against his hand, it should be held negligence as a matter of law for the passenger to place his hand upon the door frame at the place where the closing of the door would cause him injury. We prefer to rest our decision upon the ground that the evidence in this case does not establish culpable negligence under any rule of law by which negligence is established, and hence there can be no recovery. Upon the question of contributory negligence, therefore, we express no opinion.

From what has been said it follows that the court erred in refusing appellant's request to direct a verdict, and in submitting the case to the jury, and in entering judgment for respondent on the verdict. The cause is reversed, with directions to the trial court to grant a new trial, appellant to recover costs.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

CHARLES T. WILMORE, Appt.,

v.

HARRY MINTZ.

(42 Colo. 328, 95 Pac. 536.)

Election of remedies — judgment — replevin.

Obtaining a judgment and execution to enforce the alleged lien under a clause in a lease giving the landlord the first lien on all crops and chattels of the lessee for rent and damages precludes the maintenance of a replevin suit to obtain possession of the property on the theory that the contract was a chattel mortgage, in the absence of anything to show that the property could not be secured by the sheriff under an execution.

(March 2, 1908.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for the City and County of Denver in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover possession of certain chattels. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thomas B. Stuart and Charles A. Murray, for appellant:

The lien clause in the lease is a chattel mortgage.

The court has determined the case wholly upon an entirely new question which is contrary to the settled policy of the court.

Case Note. — Attempt to enforce lien under clause in a lease giving landlord lien on crops and chattels, as election preventing its enforcement as a chattel mortgage.

The plaintiff in the foregoing case, in his first action to establish a lien upon the crops, proceeded upon the theory that the title thereto was in the defendant. In his second action, however, he proceeded upon the theory that, under the terms of the lease, the title to the property was in himself upon the failure of the defendant to fulfill the requirements of the lease. This falls clearly within the general principle that no suitor is allowed to invoke the aid of the courts by contradictory principles of redress upon one and the same line of facts. 7 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 363.

A search has failed to reveal any other case in which the lessor attempted to recover possession of the crops and chattels under the terms of the lease after having attempted to enforce an alleged lien thereon; but there are two or three cases in which the plaintiff has attempted to assert his title to property after he has sought to enforce a lien thereon. These cases present

Fallon v. Worthington, 13 Colo. 559, 6 L.R.A. 708, 16 Am. St. Rep. 231, 22 Pac. 900.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the year 1900 the appellant made a lease of certain property in Jefferson county to one Milstein, the lease containing the following clause: "(9) That all goods and chattels, or any other property used or kept on said premises, shall be sold for the rent or damages under this lease, whether exempt from execution or not, meaning or intending hereby to give the party of the first part a valid and first lien upon any and all goods and chattels, crops and other property belonging to said party of the second part." About the 29th day of April, 1901, Milstein assigned the lease to appellee. Appellee took possession of the property and held it until the expiration of the lease. Milstein owned certain personal property which he kept upon the premises until he assigned the lease to appellee, at which time he sold it to appellee, and it continued to remain on the premises until appellee moved away, at which time he took all of the property with him. Later appellant brought an action in the county court of Jefferson county against Milstein, appellee, and one Rosenbaum. Appellant obtained judgment on the 25th of June, 1902, against the defendants in that action for $400, in which judgment it was held that "the plaintiff has and holds a first lien for the amount of the judgment herein upon the property of the defendant, Mintz, described as follows [then follows a description of the property], and that said lien accrued on the 29th day of April, 1901, and that said property be sold as other property is sold upon execution for the payment and satisfaction of the plaintiff's judgment herein." The judgment also provides for the issuance of an execution. Nothing appears to have been done under this judgment, and in November, 1902, the appellant brought this action in the district court of Arapahoe county to replevin the property mentioned in the decree, and which is the same that was owned and kept by appellee upon the premises leased from appellant. At the trial in the district court and upon proof of the acts hereinbefore stated, a judgment of nonsuit was rendered, and plaintiff appeals to this court.

the same question, and the decisions are in line with WILMORE v. MINTZ.

In James v. Avery, 3 Ga. App. 357, 59 S. E. 1118, it was held that one who, in the sale of personal property, reserved title thereto, might, by trover, recover the same, even against the purchaser at a judicial sale; but, where personal property to which title has been reserved, is sold, and the vendor, who has reserved the title, elects to claim a lien upon the fund, he is estopped thereafter from asserting his title as against the property, and is confined to the proceeds of the sale.

In McFadden v. Thorpe Elevator Co. (N. D.) 118 N. W. 242, the plaintiff, in his original complaint, based his right of recovery upon a chattel mortgage, claiming 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

merely a special property in the grain. Subsequently he was permitted to amend his complaint by abandoning such theory and alleging ownership of the grain by virtue of a farm contract. As a matter of fact the chattel mortgage had not yet attached to the grain, and it was subsequently held that there had been no election of remedies, as the plaintiff, in bringing the first action, was merely mistaken in attempting to pursue a remedy which he did not have, and this could not be construed as an election to waive or abandon the only remedy which he did possess.

As to the waiver of a lien or chattel mortgage by attachment or execution, see note to Dix v. Smith, 50 L.R.A. 714.

The basis of the replevin suit was the clause contained in the lease hereinbefore set forth, to the effect that appellant should have a first lien upon the property and the judgment of the county court, wherein the amount of damages sustained by appellant had been determined. The appellant contends that the clause in the lease operated as a chattel mortgage, and that upon default in the payment of the rent he was entitled to possession of the property; while the appellee contends that the clause created but an equitable lien in favor of the landlord, and that the landlord was not entitled to possession of the property upon a breach of the conditions of the lease, but that a suit should be brought to foreclose the lien. It is not necessary for us to determine in this action whether the lease amounted to a chattel mortgage or simply created an equitable lien, for the reason that the appellant has determined that question for us. An election once made with knowledge of the facts between coexisting remedial rights which are inconsistent is irrevocable and conclusive, irrespective of intent, and constitutes an absolute bar to any action, suit, or proceeding based upon a remedial right inconsistent with that asserted by the election. 15 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 262, and cases therein cited. In bringing his action in the county court of Jefferson county, and obtaining a decree that he was entitled to a lien upon this property and that the same should be sold under execution, appellant elected to treat his contract as one of lien, and, having done so, and having obtained his judgment, he could not abandon those proceedings and treat the matter as a chattel mortgage, pure and simple, after having obtained a judgment authorizing the issuance of an execution and the taking of this property to satisfy the judgment. He did not have the right to ignore these proceedings and take personal possession of the property for the purpose of satisfying the lien.

In the absence of a showing that the judgment was ineffectual, and that the possession of the property could not be secured by the sheriff upon the execution, the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain the action.

The judgment of the District Court being correct, it will not be disturbed, and is therefore affirmed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

NATIONAL FIRE PROOFING COMPANY

v.

TOWN OF HUNTINGTON et al.

(81 Conn. 632, 71 Atl. 911.)

Mechanics' lien — public building.

A statute providing for a mechanics' lien on any building does not include a building belonging to the public, such as a school-house.

(February 16, 1909.)

RESERVATION by the Superior Court for Fairfield County for the advice of the Supreme Court of Errors of a suit brought to foreclose a mechanics' lien on a public school building. Judgment for defendants advised.

Statement by Baldwin, Ch. J.:

Action by a subcontractor against the town of Huntington and sundry other subcontractors, who, like the plaintiff, had filed certificates of mechanics' lien on a town schoolhouse, to foreclose the plaintiff's lien, to ascertain what balance was due from the town on the "purchase price," and the respective amounts of the several liens, and to have the balance due from the town apportioned among the several lienors, brought to the superior court for Fairfield county and reserved (Gager, J.) for the advice of this court on a stipulation as to the facts. One of these was that the town of Huntington in the case of the plaintiff's lien

Case Note. — Mechanics' lien on public buildings.

This note is confined to a review of the decisions since 1896, collected in the note appended to First Nat. Bank v. Malheur County, 35 L.R.A. 141. From the authorities reviewed in that note it may be laid down as an almost universal rule of law that there can be no mechanics' lien upon public buildings unless expressly permitted by statute, though Kansas and perhaps Louisiana have adopted a contrary rule. The later authorities also almost unanimously deny the right of a mechanics' lien upon public buildings, even though the statute may not expressly exclude such right. Thus, in all the following cases it was held that, under such statutes, a mechanics' lien could neither be acquired nor enforced upon or against public buildings: Scruggs v. Decatur (Ala.) 46 So. 980; Union Sheet Metal Works v. Dodge, 129 Cal. 390, 62 Pac. 41; Kruse v. Wilson, 3 Cal. App. 91, 84 Pac. 442; Florman v. School Dist. No. 11, 6 Colo. and the lien of each of the defendants appearing had on hand at the time of the filing of the lien and of the service of notice of intention to claim lien an amount of money sufficient to pay such lien, and subject to such lien under the contract with the contractor if such lien is valid.

On the other hand, in Pullis Bros. Iron Co. v. Natchitoches Parish, 51 La. Ann. 1377, 26 So. 402, it was held that a court house was subject to a mechanics' lien; which conclusion would seem to be in accord with the Louisiana decisions cited in the earlier note above referred to.

And a mechanics' lien statute, though not expressly so providing, was held, in McArthur v. Dewar, 3 Manitoba L. Rep. 72, to apply to a city hall; and in Moore v. Protestant School Dist. 5 Manitoba L. Rep. 49, to a schoolhouse.

contractor or subcontractor having a claim for over $10 for material furnished or services rendered in the construction of "any building, or any of its appurtenances." These general words, if taken literally, cover every kind of building, public or private. It is clear, however, that they could not be construed to embrace buildings belonging to the state. State v. Kilburn, 81 Conn. 9, 11, 69 Atl. 1028. Nor do they include any public buildings belonging to corporations or communities created by the state as governmental agencies for purely public purposes, to defray the cost of which they can freely exercise the power of taxation.

The mischief which the statute was designed to remedy is an important guide in ascertaining its meaning. A thing within the letter of a statute may be unaffected by its provisions, if not within the intention of the makers; and if what was this intention sufficiently appears from the terms which they used, in connection with the conditions calling for such legislation. Bridgeport v. Hubbell, 5 Conn. 237, 243; Wetherell v. Hollister, 73 Conn. 622, 625, 48 Atl. 326; Kelley v. Killourey, 81 Conn. 320, 70 Atl. 1031. The statute under consideration created a new means of securing the claims of a particular class of creditors. It is in derogation of the common law, and of a kind calling for a strict, rather than a liberal, construction. Chapin v. Persse & B. Paper Works, 30 Conn. 461, 79 Am. Dec. 263; Hubbell v. Kingman, 52 Conn. 17, 19. The mischief to be prevented was loss to those furnishing services or materials in the construction of a building if unable to collect what might be due them on such account from the owner of the real estate. The original contractor for the erection of a public building for such a public corporation as has been described is always sure of his pay. His debtor commands the resources of the whole community. As no lien is necessary for his protection, it is not to be presumed, in view of what such a lien would put it in his power to do, that the general assembly intended to give him one. The possessor of a mechanics' lien on real estate can gain title to it by foreclosure. If such a lien can be imposed upon public buildings, they can thus be turned into private buildings. If it can attach to a schoolhouse, it is difficult to see why it would not equally attach to a city hall, a county courthouse, or a county jail. It would be intolerable to put it in the power of a private citizen, in case the negligence of a county should result in his obtaining a foreclosure of a mechanics' lien, to take possession of a courthouse, and turn out the courts, or of a jail, and turn out the prisoners.

It is suggested that the statute may be so construed as to permit a lien, but not its enforcement against the public corporation. This would strip the privilege of most of its value. The right and the remedy must stand or fall together. True, should the corporation sell the building to a private citizen, such a lien might be foreclosed; but it is ordinarily to be presumed that a building devoted to public uses will continue permanently to be devoted to them. It is therefore our opinion that the statute was not intended to give any lien on a public building to an original contractor. This being so, it cannot have been within its purpose to give one to subcontractors. To them the owner of the building owes no debt. Their equities are derived from their relation to the original contractor, and are not superior to his. We have held that a railroad station owned by a railroad corporation may be the subject of a mechanics' lien. Botsford v. New Haven, M. & W. R. Co. 41 Conn. 454. Such a corporation, being a private one, though serving public as well as private uses, and having no power of taxation to pay its debts, is not at all in the position of a strictly governmental agency, such as is a town or county. Bradley v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 21 Conn. 294, 306; McKeon v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 75 Conn. 343, 348, 61 L.R.A. 730, 53 Atl. 656.

The claims for relief other than that for a foreclosure are subsidiary to that, and must fall with it.

The Superior Court is advised to render judgment for the defendants; and they will recover costs in this court.

The other Judges concur.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

ELIZABETH B. STEER

v.

M. IVAN DOW.

NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Trustee.

(75 N. H. 95, 71 Atl. 217.)

Garnishment — Insurance commissions.

1. Renewal commissions due by an insurance company to its general agent under contract are subject to garnishment in the hands of the company in favor of his creditor, although they accrued partly from the efforts of subagents and, under the contract, were payable at his residence in another state.

Same — foreign corporation.

2. A foreign insurance company authorized to do business within the state is chargeable there as trustee for money due its agent for commissions on business done there, under a statute providing that a person doing business in the state and residing outside may be charged as trustee, as if he were an inhabitant of the state, for any credits of the defendant by reason of contracts performed within the state.

(November 4, 1908.)

TRANSFER by the Superior Court for Hillsborough County for the opinion of the Supreme Court of a garnishment proceeding to reach funds alleged to be due to plaintiff's debtors. Trustee charged.

Case Note. — Place of payment of debt as affecting jurisdiction to garnish the same.

This subject was covered in a case note to Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Allen, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 608. A number of decisions in point have been rendered since the preparation of that note. As there shown, while the United States Supreme Court, in Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Sturm, 174 U. S. 710, 43 L. ed. 1144, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 797, settled the proposition—so far as the duty of a court of one state under the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution to recognize a judgment rendered in another is concerned—that a court of a state in which the debtor is domiciled has jurisdiction to subject the debt to garnishment, although the creditor is a nonresident and is served constructively, and the debt is payable generally, and not expressly payable in the jurisdiction in which it is sought to garnish it. The same court, in Harris v. Balk, 198 U. S. 215, 49 L. ed. 1023, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1084, removed any doubt as to the jurisdiction, for the purposes of the full faith and credit clause, under circumstances otherwise the same, although the garnishee is a nonresident, if personal jurisdiction can be obtained over him by service of process within the state. While the principle upon which these decisions rest seems broad enough to cover a case where the debt is, in express terms, payable in a state other than that in which it is sought to garnish it, the question, under such circumstances, has not been definitely and authoritatively settled by that court, even for the purposes of the full faith and credit clause, and the state courts are, of course at liberty in any event to deny their own jurisdiction in domestic garnishment proceedings under such circumstances.

The Alabama supreme court, in Planters' Chemical & Oil Co. v. A. Waller & Co. (Ala.) 49 So. 89, upon the authority of the decisions of the Federal Supreme Court, held that a court of Alabama had jurisdiction to garnish an indebtedness due from an Alabama corporation to a Kentucky corporation. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Upon the disclosures first made by the trustee no debt appeared, but at a subsequent date the trustee was shown to be indebted to the defendant. He had been its general agent in New Hampshire with sub-agents in his employ. His contract entitled him to renewal commissions on business transacted in New Hampshire, which, by a modification of the contract, were payable to him in Boston, at which place he had acquired a residence.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Andrews & Andrews, for plaintiff:

The insurance company, although a non-resident, is chargeable.

Goodwin v. Claytor, 137 N. C. 224, 67 L.R.A. 217, 107 Am. St. Rep. 479, 49 S. E.

tion which was served constructively only and appeared specially for the purpose of questioning the jurisdiction. It will be observed that in this case the debtor was a domestic corporation of Alabama and the debt seems to have been payable in Alabama. The ground on which the majority opinion attempts to distinguish the earlier Alabama cases suggests that the result might have been different if the garnishee had been a foreign corporation and the debt had been contracted in and payable in another jurisdiction. McClellan, J., while concurring in the decision, was of the opinion that the former decisions should have been expressly overruled, and the decision in the case at bar referred to the broad principle underlying the Sturm Case that the jurisdiction of the court in garnishment proceedings rests upon its juridical power over the person of the garnishee. This, not necessarily because the position formerly taken by the court, that the situs of a debt for the purpose of garnishment is at the domicile of the creditor, was wrong in principle, but as a matter of expediency and justice in view of the necessity, in consequence of the decisions of the Federal Supreme Court, of abandoning that position when a judgment of garnishment rendered in another state is concerned. He elaborates his views on this subject at length in an able opinion in the case of Shuttleworth v. Marx (Ala.) 49 So. 83, in which the court held, with his concurrence so far as the decision was concerned, that a court of Alabama had jurisdiction to garnish a debt due from residents of that state to persons domiciled in Kentucky, who were served constructively only. The defendant's plea to the jurisdiction, a demurrer to which was sustained, alleged that the indebtedness was for goods sold and delivered to the garnishee in Kentucky, and "that such debt was payable at Louisville in that state, and not in Alabama." It is difficult to determine whether the decision of the majority in that case may properly be regarded as authority for upholding the jurisdiction under such circumstances, when the debt is expressly payable in another state, as distinguished from

Mr. Henry N. Hurd for defendant.

Messrs. Burnham, Brown, Jones, & Warren for the trustee.

Parsons, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A trustee is chargeable, not only for the funds of the defendant in his hands at the time process is served upon him, but also, with certain exceptions, for all that may come to his hands up to the time of disclosure. Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 245, § 19; Gove v. Varrell, 58 N. H. 78; Palmer v. Noyes, 45 N. H. 174, 178; Smith v. Boston, C. & M.

a case where the debt is payable generally; for the reason that it does not appear whether the language above quoted from the plea imports that the debt was, by express terms of the contract, payable in Kentucky, or was merely by legal implication payable there. If used in the latter sense, the debt would seem to fall within the category mentioned in the Sturm Case of debts "payable generally," and the decision, therefore, upon its facts would be subject to the same limitation as the Sturm Case. The opinion of McClellan, J., argues that the place of the payment of the indebtedness does not affect the question of jurisdiction whether the garnishee be a resident or nonresident, assuming that such garnishee is personally subject to the jurisdiction of the court. He was apparently of the opinion that the grounds upon which the majority decisions in these two cases rest leave the question as to the jurisdiction in doubt if the garnishee is a nonresident though personally subject to the jurisdiction, and the indebtedness did not arise out of business transacted in the state, and is in express terms payable in another state, or possibly if, under such circumstances, it is payable generally and not in express terms payable in the jurisdiction in which it is sought to be garnished.

The Georgia supreme court, in Harvey v. Thompson, 128 Ga. 147, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 765, 119 Am. St. Rep. 373, 57 S. E. 104, upheld the constitutionality of the act of August 13, 1904 (Acts 1904, page 100), expressly providing that, when any suit is brought by attachment against a nonresident of the state, and the attachment is levied by service of summons of garnishment, the situs of any debt due by the garnishee to the defendant shall be at the residence of the garnishee in Georgia, and any sum due the defendant in attachment shall be subject thereto—notwithstanding that the doctrine was previously established in that state that the situs of a debt for the purpose of garnishment was exclusively at the residence of the creditor,—at least if there was no agreement as to the place of payment. The court further said that the 20 L.R.A.(N.S.)

R. Co. 33 N. H. 337, 345; Edgerly v. Sanborn, 6 N. H. 397. Wages for labor performed by the defendant after service upon the trustee are an exception. Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 245, § 20. If the renewal commissions are payments for labor performed in placing the original policy, the fund disclosed is not within the exception because it is to be inferred such labor was performed before the defendant left the state prior to the service, and for the further reason that the wages excepted are only those accruing as payment for purely personal service. A fund created in part by the labor of others than the wife and minor children of the defendant is not excepted. Robbins v. Rice, 18 N. H. 507, 510; Hale v. Brown, 59 N. H. 551, 47 Am. Rep. 224; Gray v. Fife, 70 N. H.

fact that the contract under which the debt sought to be garnished arose is by its terms payable in another state would not oust the jurisdiction, in the event that the court had personal jurisdiction of the garnishee, although the latter was a foreign corporation.

The question in the last case having been decided by the supreme court in answer to a question certified to it by the court of appeals, its conclusion was accepted and acted upon by the latter court. (Harvey v. Thompson, 2 Ga. App. 569, 60 S. E. 11.)

It is also held in A. B. Baxter & Co. v. Andrews, post, 268, that the fact that a debt due a nonresident is payable in the state where the principal defendant resides does not prevent its subjection to garnishment in Georgia. The garnishee in this case was a national bank located in Georgia.

In Central R. Co. v. Collum, 130 Ga. 434, 60 S. E. 1060, holding that since the passage of the act of 1904 the situs of a debt for the purpose of garnishment is the residence of the garnishee, it does not appear where the debt was payable.

It will be observed that, while the indebtedness which was held subject to trustee process in STEER v. DOW (even assuming that the trustee was to be regarded as a nonresident doing business in the state) was payable in another state, it arose out of business in New Hampshire.

In Cavanaugh Bros. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (N. H.) 72 Atl. 694, which holds, upon the authority of STEER v. DOW, that a debtor is properly chargeable in New Hampshire upon a transitory cause of action, even if the debt due from it to the principal defendant (a nonresident corporation) is payable in another jurisdiction, the trustee was a resident of New Hampshire.

In Ryan v. Kimberly, 118 Ill. App. 361, where it was said that it is well established in Illinois that a debt payable outside of Illinois is subject to garnishment in Illinois, the creditors were nonresidents, and were served by publication. For aught that appears the debtor (garnishee) was a resident of Illinois.

It will be observed that in McShane v.

89, 85 Am. St. Rep. 603, 47 Atl. 541. Where "no means are furnished by which it is possible to extricate the privileged labor from the other ingredients composing the cause of indebtedness and to ascertain its value," the trustee is chargeable.

Prior to the act of June 30, 1841 (Laws 1841, chap. 601, p. 527; Rev. Stat. 1843, chap. 208), a trustee could not be charged on account of his liability to the defendant on a negotiable promissory note or by reason of any chose in action of the defendant in his possession. The negotiable character of the instrument evidencing his liability in the first case whereby, if he were charged, a bona fide holder might suffer a loss or the maker be compelled to pay twice, and the lack of means for enforcing the security in the second, were the reasons for the holding that such liabilities or securities were not included within the terms "money, goods, chattels, rights, or credits," used in the act

Knox, post, 271, holding that the place of payment is not material upon the question of jurisdiction to garnish a debt due to a nonresident, both the principal defendant and the garnishee were personally served with process within the state, so that it was not necessary to proceed in rem.

In Krafve v. Roy, 98 Minn. 141, 116 Am. St. Rep. 346, 107 N. W. 966, holding that an indebtedness, due to one foreign corporation from another foreign corporation maintaining an agency in Minnesota for the transaction of business, was subject to garnishment in Minnesota, the court emphasizes the facts that the indebtedness grew out of a transaction that took place in Minnesota, was payable at Minneapolis (the usual method of payment being by draft upon a bank in Minnesota mailed to the creditor corporation at its place of business in Washington). The court said, however, that a debt has its situs, for the purpose of attachment, wherever the debtor can be found; and that wherever the creditor might sue for its recovery there it might be attached as his property; and that the place of payment is immaterial. The court suggests that there may be an exception to the rule in case of a debtor temporarily within the state.

In Johnson v. Union P. R. Co. 145 Fed. 249, it was held that an indebtedness due from the New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (incorporated in Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, its affairs being administered by one board of directors and by a single organization) to the Union P. R. Co. (a foreign corporation), payable at the principal office of the former company in Connecticut, was subject to garnishment in Rhode Island, whether the garnishee be regarded as a single corporation incorporated in three states, or three corporations which practically have become so consolidated that their affairs cannot be separated. The court does not appear to have considered the effect upon the jurisdiction to garnish the debt of the fact that the debt was expressly payable in another state, apart from its possible effect upon the question whether the court had personal jurisdiction of the debtor.

The decision in the last case was followed by the Rhode Island supreme court in Johnson v. Union P. R. Co. (R. I.) 69 Atl. 298, upon the same state of facts.

In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Swartz (Tex. Civ. App.) 115 S. W. 275, holding that a debt due by a railroad company for wages earned by a resident of Texas for services rendered partly in Texas and partly in Oklahoma—they being usually paid in Texas, and that being where the principal defendant expected to receive them—were subject to garnishment in Missouri, where the company operated a line, it does not expressly appear whether or not the garnishee was a domestic corporation of the latter state. That, however, in any view, would seem to be immaterial, since the debt does not seem to have been in express terms payable in Texas, and was therefor within the category of debts "payable generally," mentioned in the Sturm Case, and so the case fell directly within either the Sturm Case or the Balk Case.

The same is true of Hadacheck v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 74 Neb. 385, 104 N. W. 878, holding, upon the authority of the Sturm Case, that a judgment of garnishment rendered in Mississippi for wages due a laborer for services performed in Nebraska was binding upon a Nebraska court. It seems to have been assumed, although it is not expressly so stated, that the creditor (the principal defendant in the garnishment proceedings) was not a resident of Mississippi, and was served constructively only.

It is provided by statute in Illinois that wages earned out of the state and payable out of the state shall be exempt from attachment or garnishment in all cases where the cause of action arose out of the state, unless the defendant in the attachment or garnishment suit is personally served with process. It was held in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Freeze, 169 Ind. 370, 82 N. E. 761, that, it not appearing that the cause of action upon which garnishment proceedings in Illinois were predicated arose outside of that state, it was error to strike from the evidence in an action in Indiana a transcript of a judgment rendered by a justice of the peace in Illinois garnishing a debt due to a nonresident for wages which, it appeared by the agreement of the parties, were earned and payable outside of Illinois.

In Rykard v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 80 S. C. 52, 61 S. E. 252, the court refused to give effect to a judgment of garnishment rendered by a court of limited jurisdiction in Georgia, because the record did not show that the court had jurisdiction of the garnishee, or that there was due service by publication upon the principal defendant, a non-resident.

of 1791. By the act of 1841 negotiable promissory notes "made or payable in this state, or the parties to which, at the time of making the same, resided in this state," were made subject to attachment by this process. The legislation was subsequently extended (Gen. Stat. 1867, chap. 230, § 21) so as to include all negotiable paper "made and payable in this state, or the parties to which, at the time of making the same, resided in this state." Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 245, §§ 21, 22; Laws (ed. 1792) p. 151; Cox v. Severance, 70 N. H. 86, 85 Am. St. Rep. 602, 46 Atl. 739; Kibbling v. Burley, 20 N. H. 359; Fletcher v. Fletcher, 7 N. H. 452, 453, 454, 28 Am. Dec. 359; N. H. I. F. Co. v. Platt, 5 N. H. 193; Stone v. Dean, 5 N. H. 502. Therefore, where it is sought to hold the trustee as liable upon negotiable paper, the trustee will be discharged, unless the instrument comes within the description of the statute. Chadbourn v. Gilman, 63 N. H. 353; Carbee v. Mason, 64 N. H. 10, 4 Atl. 791.

By the terms of the contract between the defendant and trustee, the fund in question was, at the time of the attachment, payable in Massachusetts. It does not appear that the original contract or the variation relied upon were reduced to writing. But, assuming that they were, the instrument was not negotiable. So far as it is disclosed, it was a mere contract of employment specifying the agreed remuneration for service rendered. It is not within the exception existing before the legislation extending the process of foreign attachment to cover certain negotiable paper, and the provisions of the statute have no application. The plaintiff is not seeking to enforce the contract, but to reach property in the trustee's hands which the contract shows to belong to the defendant. The contract is material only on the question of title, and performs the same office as a bill of sale or deed of land in a proceeding to hold the trustee for the purchase price of goods or land. The fund in the possession of the trustee here is attachable, regardless of the agreement of the trustee to transport it to the defendant at Boston, precisely as a horse or car load of goods would be. The fact that payment of a debt is agreed to be made out of the state is not an answer to the trustee process. Sturtevant v. Robinson, 18 Pick. 175; Blake v. Williams, 6 Pick. 286, 315, 17 Am. Dec. 372. It does not appear that, by the contract, a demand by the defendant in Massachusetts was made a condition precedent to his right of action to recover the debt. If it were, in the absence of such a demand, the defendant could not maintain an action for the fund here or elsewhere. To the general rule that the trustee can be charged only for what the defendant could recover of him in an action on the contract there are exceptions. Libby v. Mt. Monadnock Mineral Spring & Land Co. 67 N. H. 587, 32 Atl. 772. He may be charged where the defendant could not maintain a suit without proof of a demand, although none has been made. Quigg v. Kittredge, 18 N. H. 137; Woodbridge v. Morse, 5 N. H. 519. "The trustee is to be charged whenever it appears he has money in his hands which the principal has a right to receive upon demand, whether a demand has been made or not."

In argument in this court it appears to be urged that the trustee is not an inhabitant of the state. It has been held that a resident and inhabitant of another state, although served with process here, cannot be charged as trustee except upon a contract to be performed here, or for goods of the defendant actually in his possession here at the time of the service of the writ upon him. Lawrence v. Smith, 45 N. H. 533, 86 Am. Dec. 183; Young v. Ross, 31 N. H. 201; Sawyer v. Thompson, 24 N. H. 510; Jones v. Winchester, 6 N. H. 497. This objection does not appear to have been taken in the superior court, and the facts as to the residence of the trustees are not fully found; but, from the absence of objection to the validity of the attachment by service upon the insurance commissioner, it may be inferred that the trustee is a foreign "joint-stock or mutual insurance company," duly admitted to and doing business in this state subject to its laws. Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 169, § 4. In view of the statutory provisions on the subject (Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 170, § 14; Id., chap. 169, § 4), whether such a party appearing as a litigant in the courts of the state is to be regarded as a resident of the state or otherwise may be a question requiring serious consideration. Time need not be now taken for the purpose; for, assuming that the trustee is to be regarded as a nonresident doing business in the state, the case is fully covered by the statute. "A person doing business in this state and residing outside the state may be summoned on trustee process, . . . and he may be charged as trustee, as if he were an inhabitant of this state, . . . for any rights or credits of the defendant by reason of contracts made or performed within the state." Pub. Stat. 1901, chap. 245, § 5. The credits for which it is sought to charge the trustee accrue to the defendant "from business in New Hampshire, done by him and his sub-agents." In the language of the statute, they are "credits of the defendant by reason of contracts . . . performed within the state," wherever the contract was made, which does not appear. The trustee therefore is to be charged "as if it were an inhabitant of this state."

Trustee chargeable.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

A. B. BAXTER & COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

D. A. ANDREWS.

(— Ga. —, 62 S. E. 42.)

Garnishment — debt due nonresident.

1. A debt due by a resident of this state to a nonresident may be reached by garnishment proceeding sued out upon a tax execution issued by a tax collector for a special tax due the state by such nonresident.

Same — place payable.

2. This is true notwithstanding the debt due the nonresident may have been payable in the state where the creditor of the garnishee resided.

(July 22, 1908.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Muscogee County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in a garnishment proceeding on a tax execution to reach a general bank deposit in the name of a nonresident. Affirmed.

Statement by Beck, J.:

A. B. Baxter & Company, incorporated, the plaintiff in error, was in the year 1904, from January until some time in February, engaged in Columbus, Georgia, as brokers or dealers in futures. In February of the year 1904, Baxter & Company failed. The tax collector issued a fi. fa. for the special state tax of $1,000 for that year. This fi. fa. was levied upon the office furniture of Baxter & Company, which was sold, and the proceeds applied to the execution. No other property was found. While Baxter & Company were engaged in business, and up to the time and date of their failure, they transacted their banking business with the Fourth Headnotes by Beck, J.

Note. — The general question as to the right to garnish a debt due to a nonresident when the latter is not personally subject to the jurisdiction is treated at length in the note to Goodwin v. Claytor, 67 L.R.A. 209; and the effect on that general question of the fact that the debt is payable in another jurisdiction is specifically treated in a case note to Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Allen, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 608, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

National Bank of Columbus, Georgia, as a depository. E. W. Wood was the local agent or manager up to the time of failure, and deposits were made in said bank in the name of A. B. Baxter & Company, Inc., and additional deposits were made in the name of E. W. Wood, manager of A. B. Baxter & Company, thus making two deposits. The deposit in the name of A. B. Baxter & Company was not subject to the check of the local manager, E. W. Wood, but it is set forth in the answer of the garnishee, the bank, that it was payable in New York, the residence of A. B. Baxter & Company, by New York draft, and sometimes by wire, upon the order of Baxter & Company from New York. The deposit was general and not special. "The money would be forwarded to Baxter & Company by New York check or by wire. The deposit was not checked against, but this garnishee, after such deposits were made, and after notification to the defendant in New York, would pay the same by its check on its New York correspondent, or by wire, as requested." The deposit to the account of E. W. Wood, as manager of A. B. Baxter & Company, was subject to check by the local manager, though the deposit belonged to Baxter & Company, residents of New York. Andrews, tax collector, upon the fi. fa. issued for this special tax, issued garnishments which were served upon the Fourth National Bank as garnishee, who answered, in substance, as above stated, but somewhat more in detail. Baxter & Company were nonresidents of Georgia and residents of New York. At the time of the service of the garnishments they had ceased to do business in Georgia. They had no agents in Georgia. The answer and the amended answers were not traversed or denied. The defendants specially appeared and protested against the jurisdiction of the court, and moved for a dismissal of the garnishment proceedings upon the grounds therein set forth, which are, in substance, as follows: (1) That it appeared from the answer of the garnishee that Baxter & Company were nonresidents of Georgia. That the garnishee was indebted to these nonresidents on a general deposit payable in New York, which debt was sought to be reached by the garnishment proceedings. That the debt was a general deposit in the garnishee bank, constituting a loan. That the situs of the debt, the chose in action, due to Baxter & Company by the garnishee bank, was with the creditor, Baxter & Company, in a foreign state, and was not within the jurisdiction of the trial court, the defendant having done nothing to enable the court to acquire jurisdiction of its personal property. (2) That the trial court was without jurisdiction to render a binding judgment condemning the debt or chose in action due to a nonresident defendant. The court overruled the motion, and the defendant excepted. Andrews, tax collector, introduced in evidence the tax fi. fa. with the entries of levy thereon of the service of garnishments, and of the sale of personal chattels under the levy and the application of the proceeds to the reduction of the fi. fa., and, there being no other evidence, moved for a judgment against Baxter & Company and the surety on the bond dissolving the garnishment and a judgment against the funds in the hands of the garnishee. Baxter & Company, still specially appearing for such purpose, objected to such judgments being rendered, upon the ground that the answer of the garnishee had not been traversed, and that Andrews, tax collector, was not entitled to judgment upon such answer, that the defendant was a nonresident of Georgia, residing in the state of New York, and the debt due by the garnishee was due and payable in New York, and that the court was without jurisdiction of the defendant and without jurisdiction to seize such debt. The court overruled the objections, and rendered judgment against the defendant and against the debt due by the garnishee. To this judgment defendant excepted.

Messrs. Charlton E. Battle, for plaintiff in error:

Under the laws of Georgia the situs of a debt is with the creditor; and, where the creditor is a nonresident, the court is without jurisdiction to entertain a garnishment proceeding to reach the debt.

The larger deposit, being, by contract, payable in New York, could in no event be touched by the garnishment proceedings.

High v. Padrosa, supra.

Mr. T. T. Miller, for defendant in error:

An execution for taxes is final process, and has all the force and effect of a judgment in personam, and cannot be classed with an attachment where no personal service is had upon a nonresident defendant.

Code, §§ 883-886, 896.

An execution for taxes is classed with ordinary executions as to the period when such executions shall become dormant; and its binding force and dignity is more sacred.

Code, §§ 881, 903.

Beck, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error, in the maintenance of the position taken by it, contends that, under the laws of Georgia, the situs of a debt is with the creditor, and that, where it appears that the creditor is a nonresident, the courts of this state are without jurisdiction to entertain garnishment proceedings which seek to seize or hold the debt due to such nonresident. It is insisted that the rule just stated, relative to the situs of a debt, is general and capable of universal application under the decisions of our court. However varied and conflicting may be the decisions of other courts in this country, touching the universal applicability of that rule, and several decisions of our court cited in support of the theory advanced, an examination of those cases shows that each of them which touches the question under consideration was an attachment case; but in several of them very broad language is used, broad and general enough in fact to support counsel for plaintiff in error in the position taken in his brief. In the case of High v. Padrosa, 119 Ga. 648, 46 S. E. 859, it was said: "In the case of Central R. Co. v. Brinson, 109 Ga. 354, 77 Am. St. Rep. 382, 34 S. E. 597, which was followed in Johnson v. Southern R. Co. 110 Ga. 303, 34 S. E. 1002, each being a decision by six justices, the rule that the residence of the creditor fixes the situs of the debt was recognized and applied in garnishment cases. This rule was also applied in the cases of Henry v. Lennox-Haldeman Co. 116 Ga. 9, 42 S. E. 383, and Beasley v. Lennox-Haldeman Co. 116 Ga. 13, 42 S. E. 385; each being a decision by only five justices. Application is now made to review the two decisions first mentioned. Respectable authority may be found on either side of the questions involved in this case; but, after diligent investigation and mature reflection, the court as constituted when the decisions referred to were rendered adopted and followed the line indicated in the opinions in those cases." But the case of High v. Padrosa is a case in which summons of garnishment issued in proceedings begun by attachment and the cases cited in the decision under consideration were of a similar nature, and the rulings there made are not necessarily controlling in the present case. So far as we are advised, it has never been ruled in this state, in a suit where there has been personal service such as would authorize the rendition of a judgment and an execution in personam against the defendant, that, although the defendant might have been a nonresident of this state, a debt due him by a resident of this state, upon whom summons of garnishment could have been served, was not liable to be seized or held by garnishment proceedings properly sued out. Under the circumstances last supposed, the authorities for holding that garnishment proceedings could be maintained to seize and hold such a debt are numerous, and the reasons in support of them seem sound and conclusive. "For most purposes—taxation, distribution, etc.—it has long been a recognized and established fiction of law that their situs is at the domicile of the owner. It would seem almost impertinent to remark that this is a fiction merely, and that it is impossible, from the nature of things, for intangible property to have an actual location, were it not for the fact some courts and text writers have at times appeared oblivious to it. Though it is not discussed in the opinion, Chancellor Kent, as early as 1809 [Embree v. Hanna, 5 Johns 101], seems to have taken it for granted that this fiction does not apply to debts when they are sought to be reached by garnishment in a jurisdiction where the owner does not reside, and the same doctrine has been recognized and applied tacitly, or positively and directly asserted, in almost every court of last resort in America to which the question has ever been submitted since that time, so that, notwithstanding some dissent, and more obiter, we may lay it down as a general proposition that the residence of the defendant does not affect the question as to whether the debt should be considered as having a situs within the jurisdiction of the court for the purposes of garnishment, whether such principal defendant was personally served with process within the jurisdiction or not." Rood, Garnishment, § 242. The writer from whose work the above extract was taken cites a large number of decisions directly in point. The same writer, in a subsequent section of his work, said: "It is impossible to bring harmony out of chaos. Let us for a moment consider the reason and nature of things. It is essential elements, a garnishment suit is a suit brought by the principal defendant against the garnishee in the name and for the benefit of the plaintiff. The plaintiff is empowered by law to step into the shoes of the garnishee's creditor and acquire his rights; no more, and no less. Whatever he could do, the plaintiff, under the statutory novation of garnishment, may do, as his assignee and attorney in fact, by operation of law. Wherever the garnishee could be sued by the defendant for the demand, he may be charged as garnishee on account of it. Other states must recognize this right, if they recognize garnishment at all. This would seem to follow as of course, and the writer offers it as his humble opinion that this is the only true solution of the matter. The following cases declare 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the doctrine, and to these the reader is referred." [§ 245.] In addition to submitting several sound reasons for the conclusion reached, Mr. Rood again cites a large number of cases in support of the position taken by him. With a large number of strong authorities and well-reasoned cases holding that a debt due to a nonresident may be reached by garnishment proceedings, we are unwilling to extend the ruling made by this court in attachment cases, unless the issue in the case at bar is of such a nature as will necessarily bring it within the rulings made in those cases, and, after a careful examination of the decisions by this court above referred to and the reasoning upon which they are based, we are of the opinion that they are not controlling upon the question raised in this record.

In the absence of personal service or notice, an attachment is a quasi proceeding in rem, or similar to such a proceeding. It depends entirely upon being levied by seizure or by garnishment. If no property can be seized, it is of no effect. The process is mesne, and, if a levy is made, the cause must proceed to final judgment. A tax execution is final, not mesne, process. No further proceeding is necessary upon it than to levy and collect it. It is more nearly analogous to an execution issued upon judgment in a common-law suit. The garnishment issued upon it is more like a garnishment based upon a final judgment. After this court had held that, in attachment cases, debts due to a nonresident did not have such a situs as to authorize seizure by garnishment as a basis for further proceedings, the legislature passed an act declaring that they should have a situs sufficient for that purpose. Thus the legislature evinced an intention to fix the situs of a debt due by a resident debtor as sufficiently in this state to be subject to garnishment. Acts 1904, p. 100. It is true that the act of the legislature only in terms referred to attachment cases, but that was doubtless because the situs had only been declared in attachment cases not to be sufficiently located in Georgia to support a seizure by garnishment. The act of the legislature went as far as the decisions had gone. We hardly think that it was the legislative intent to declare that the situs of the debt should be in Georgia to such an extent as to furnish the basis for the entire litigation, and yet not sufficiently here to furnish a basis for a garnishment based upon final judgment, or upon a tax execution more nearly analogous thereto than to an attachment process. Moreover, it has been held that, where a nonresident had an agent in Georgia who sold goods to him partly on a credit, took notes, and forwarded them to the principal office, and they were collected there, or, if collected in this state, the proceeds were sent to the principal office out of the state, there was sufficient situs to authorize the taxation of such debts in this state. Armour Packing Co. v. Clark, 124 Ga. 369, 52 S. E. 145. In the present case the execution was for taxes on account of the very business of the defendant in Georgia. The money, (which apparently arose from the business) was deposited in a bank in this state. It does not appear that there was any specific contract for its payment elsewhere, but that the bank would telegraph to the defendant and would pay the money as directed, or honor its draft. Thus, there was a tax due on account of the business in Georgia, final process issued therefor, on which a garnishment could be based under the statute, and money of the defendant deposited in a bank in this state. This was on general deposit, and therefore might be called a debt of the bank; but we think that there was such situs in this state as to authorize a garnishment to be served upon the bank and to subject the accounts of such deposit.

Judgment affirmed.

LEWIS L. McSHANE, Appt.,
v.

J. A. KNOX et al.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Garnishee.

(103 Minn. 268, 114 N. W. 955.)

Garnishment — nonresident defendant — personal service — jurisdiction.

1. The courts of this state have jurisdiction to entertain garnishment proceedings against nonresident parties in all cases where the defendant and garnishee are both personally served with process while within the state.

Same — situs of property.

2. Where no personal service is made upon the defendant in this state, the situs of the property sought to be reached by the garnishment determines the jurisdiction of the court; but, where personal service is had upon both defendant and garnishee, the situs of the property, as determined by the residence of the parties, is immaterial.

Same — place of payment.

3. Nor is the place of payment material, where the garnishee interposes no claim that he cannot be compelled to make payment at a place other than that agreed upon.

(February 7, 1908.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from so much of a judgment of the District Court for Clay County as dismissed proceedings against the garnishee in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a certain promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Sharp & Chapin for appellant.

Messrs. N. I. Johnson and L. L. Twichell for respondents.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by plaintiff, a resident of North Dakota, against defendant, also a resident of that state, to recover upon a promissory note theretofore executed by him to one Ellis, and by Ellis transferred to plaintiff. At the time of its commencement a garnishee summons was duly issued therein against the Northern Pacific Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Wisconsin but maintaining an agency and doing business in this state. The summons in the principal action was personally served upon the defendant in the city of Moorhead, this state, on June 17, 1907, together with a copy of the garnishee summons, with the usual notice to defendant and proof of service upon the garnishee.

Note. — See note to Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Allen, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 608, and supplementary note to Steer v. Dow, ante, 263, on the place of payment of the debt as affecting the jurisdiction to garnish the same. With the exception of McSHANE v. Knox, all the cases in those notes proceed upon the assumption that the creditor (the principal defendant) was not personally subject to the jurisdiction of the court, so that if the jurisdiction was to be upheld it must be on the theory that the proceeding was one in rem, and that the debt had a situs within the state so as to support such a proceeding, or at least that the judicial power over the debtor was sufficient to sustain the jurisdiction to condemn the debt without jurisdiction of the person of the creditor. As intimated in the opinion in the McSHANE CASE, there would seem to be no question about the jurisdiction where the principal defendant (the creditor) as well as the garnishee (debtor) were both personally subject to the jurisdiction; at least the question of jurisdiction in such case would seem to depend upon the local statute, and not involve any constitutional question.

The garnishee disclosed an indebtedness to defendant in the sum of $140.10. Defendant made no appearance in the action, and, on July 9, 1907, default judgment was rendered against him for the sum of $124.67. Thereafter application was made to the court for judgment against the garnishee upon its disclosure, on which defendant appeared specially and for the purposes of the motion only, and moved the court to dismiss the garnishment proceedings on the ground that, as all the parties were nonresidents of the state, the court had no jurisdiction. The motion was granted, and plaintiff appealed.

It is contended by defendant, in support of the order appealed from, that the case comes within the rule of Swedish-American Nat. Bank v. Bleecker, 72 Minn. 383, 42 L.R.A. 283, 71 Am. St. Rep. 492, 75 N. W. 740, and McKinney v. Mills, 80 Minn. 478, 81 Am. St. Rep. 278, 83 N. W. 452, and should be affirmed, for the reason that all the parties—plaintiff, defendant, and garnishee—are nonresidents of this state; that the indebtedness sought to be reached by the garnishee proceedings was not payable in this state, but in North Dakota, where defendant was in the employ of the railway company, and did not arise out of a transaction occurring in this state; hence that the court had no jurisdiction. The contention is not sound. The cases referred to are not here in point. Much has been said and written on the subject of the jurisdiction of the courts in garnishment proceedings against nonresident parties, particularly in actions where the property sought to be reached is in the form of an indebtedness due the defendant from the garnishee. Many of the courts maintain with plausible argument that, for the purposes of garnishment, the situs of intangible property, such as debts, is at the domicile of the debtor, and may be attached wherever he may be found, whether in the state of his actual residence or elsewhere; while other courts of equal prominence, and with equal force and earnestness, insist that the debt has its situs with the creditor, and cannot be reached by garnishment proceedings, except in the state of his residence. The authorities are collected and reviewed in a note to Goodwin v. Claytor, 67 L.R.A. 209; 7 Current Law, p. 1868. It is unnecessary to review them in this case, for the question is not here presented. They are all cases where no personal service of the summons was made upon the principal defendant in the state where the action was brought, and were actions or proceedings in rem, pure and simple. In actions of that nature the jurisdiction of the court extends only to the res, the money or property in the hands of the garnishee; and the court has no authority to proceed unless the subject-matter, by 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

proper service of process, is brought within the control of the court. But we have found no case wherein it has been held that the court is without jurisdiction, though it appear that all the parties are nonresidents of the state, where the summons was personally served upon the principal defendant, as well as upon the garnishee, in the state where the action was brought. In the case at bar, while the nonresidence of the parties is conceded, it appears that both the summons in the principal action and also the garnishee summons, with notice to defendant, were personally served upon defendant while within the state; and, further, that the garnishee, a Wisconsin corporation, is permanently engaged in conducting its business in this state, with an agency herein, and that the garnishee summons was served upon it in the manner required by law. Such facts take the case without the rule of any of the cases referred to. The jurisdiction of the court in a case where personal service is had within the state is not, strictly speaking, in rem, but in personam, and, whether the situs of the debt be with the creditor, at his domicile, or with the debtor, the debt in question in this action had a situs in this state within all of the decisions; for both creditor and debtor were found within the borders thereof, and were therein personally served with process in the action. There can be no doubt of the full and complete jurisdiction of the court in such case. Commercial Nat. Bank v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 45 Wis. 172; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Kennedy, 83 Ala. 462, 3 Am. St. Rep. 755, 3 So. 852; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Nash, 118 Ala. 477, 41 L.R.A. 331, 72 Am. St. Rep. 181, 23 So. 825; Young v. Ross, 31 N. H. 201; Harris v. Balk, 198 U. S. 215, 49 L. ed. 1023, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1084; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Deer, 200 U. S. 176, 50 L. ed. 426, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 207; 1 Shinn, Attachment & Garnishment, § 5.

There is no suggestion that defendant was fraudulently induced to come within the state, to the end that the summons might be personally served upon him; and the rule laid down in Chubbuck v. Cleveland, 37 Minn. 466, 5 Am. St. Rep. 864, 35 N. W. 362, does not apply. The place of payment of the debt, if it be conceded that it sufficiently appears in this case that it was payable in North Dakota, is not important; for the garnishee makes no claim that it cannot be compelled to make payment elsewhere than at the place agreed upon with the creditor. Krafve v. Roy, 98 Minn. 142, 116 Am. St. Rep. 346, 107 N. W. 966; Harvey v. Great Northern R. Co. 50 Minn. 405, 17 L.R.A. 84, 52 N. W. 905. Nor is it material that plaintiff is a nonresident of this state.

He had an undoubted right to bring his action in the courts of this state, under the clause of the Federal Constitution guaranteeing to the citizens of each state all the rights and privileges of citizens of the several states. 1 Shinn, Attachment & Garnishment, § 76. The statement in McKinney v. Mills, supra, that garnishment proceedings should in all cases be dismissed where it appears that all the parties are nonresidents of the state, was not intended to apply to cases where personal service was made upon both defendant and garnishee within the state. The learned trial court apparently relied upon the language of that decision in dismissing the proceedings; but there was no personal service in that case, and the proceeding was one strictly in rem. In the case at bar there was personal service both upon defendant and the garnishee, and the case referred to is not in point.

The order appealed from is reversed.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the termination of a trial in a criminal action the appellant was, by the verdict of a jury, found guilty of the crime of manslaughter in the fourth degree. This verdict was returned in the district court of Finney county on the 23d day of November, 1904, and was approved by the court, and appellant was sentenced to the penitentiary for a term not exceeding two years; the sentence being pronounced on December 31, 1904. From this judgment and sentence he appealed to this court, gave bond, and was given his liberty during the pendency of the appeal. While so at large, he was again arrested, tried, and convicted in the same court of the crime of burglary and larceny alleged to have been committed on the 8th day of May, 1905. For this latter crime he was, on the 18th day of July, 1905, sentenced to confinement and hard labor in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding fifteen years, said imprisonment to commence at the expiration of his term in the former case. To test the validity of this judgment the appellant again comes to this court.

The appellant's brief urges several trial errors, but the record is so lacking in statutory requirements that it was conceded on the presentation of the case that the only question for our consideration is whether this cumulative sentence can be sustained. This question must be answered in the affirmative. Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 953; Ex parte Turner, 45 Mo. 331; 19 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 484. It is contended that, under the common law, the rule is that successive sentences are concurrent and not cumulative.

tive, and that a cumulative sentence in this state must be justified, if at all, under § 5695, Gen. Stat. 1901, and that, as this case does not technically come within the provisions of the statute, the sentence herein is erroneous. The authorities do not uniformly support the contention, but are conflicting. The Missouri statute is substantially like our own, yet in Ex parte Turner, supra, we find a sentence sustained which is very analogous to the one at bar. In that case a prisoner before the expiration of his term escaped, and while at large committed another crime for which he was arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced while still under sentence for the first offense. The second sentence was held valid, and it was also held that the term of imprisonment would commence at the expiration of the term under the former sentence. While our statute only provides for cumulative punishment of an offender who has been convicted of two or more offenses at the same term of court, it indicates the legislative policy and the justice of adapting the punishment to the number as well as to the enormity of crimes committed by one person, and, without regard to strict technicality, it is incumbent upon the courts of the state so to conform the procedure as to make the purpose of the law effective.

It is further contended that a sentence must be so definite and certain that the prisoner and the officers responsible for his custody may know when his term of imprisonment begins and when it ends, without consulting any record except the commitment. This is desirable, but not paramount, and must yield so far as is necessary for the accomplishment of justice. See 19 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 484. In Ex parte Jackson, 96 Mo. 116, 8 S. W. 800, a prisoner was sentenced for three felonies. The term of imprisonment for the second offense was, by the sentence, to commence upon the expiration of the first term, and the third offense to begin upon the expiration of the second term. He appealed, and the second judgment was reversed. He served out his first term, and thereupon, through a habeas corpus proceeding, sought to recover his liberty, but the supreme court of Missouri held that, under the facts, his third term commenced upon the expiration of the first, and denied the writ.

The sentence in this case is as certain as to the beginning and ending of the imprisonment imposed as was possible under the circumstances.

The judgment is affirmed.

Rep. 436, 1 N. E. 836.

Messrs. Gourley, Redwine, & Gourley for appellee J. S. Redwine, superintendent.

Nunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was instituted by appellant against appellees, the Kentucky State Board of Control and J. S. Redwine, superintendent of the Eastern Kentucky Lunatic Asylum, to recover damages for the loss of the life of appellant's intestate by reason of the negligence of the members of the board of control and J. S. Redwine, the superintendent of the asylum. A demurrer was filed and sustained to the petition, and appellant filed an amended petition, which, in substance, contains his real cause of complaint against appellees. It is as follows: "The plaintiff, by way of amendment to his original petition herein, says that he reiterates all the statements made therein,—as much so as if copied herein verbatim. He alleges that the defendant J. S. Redwine is a superintendent of the Eastern Kentucky Lunatic Asylum, and that said Redwine, as such superintendent, and the Kentucky State Board of Control for Charitable Institutions, manage and control and employ the servants and agents of the Eastern Kentucky Lunatic Asylum for the Insane, located in the city of Lexington, and that the said defendants discharge said servants and employees upon their own volition. Plaintiff says that defendants, the Kentucky State Board of Control for Charitable Institutions and J. S. Redwine, superintendent of the Eastern Kentucky Asylum for the Insane, knew, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence could have known, of the vicious and outrageous tendencies of the servants who had been employed by them who were in charge of the plaintiff's decedent, Fred Ketterer, at the time of his death, and that the said defendants did know, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence could have known, that the decedent, Fred Ketterer, was badly beaten and maltreated by said employees of the defendant before the 22d day of June, 1906, when he was cruelly beaten and bruised by them as alleged in his original petition; and, although the defendants knew, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence could have known, that said servants were mistreating said Ketterer, they still retained them in their employ, and the said Ketterer lost his life through the gross negligence and carelessness of said defendants,—all to this plaintiff's damage in the sum of $50,000." To this amendment a demurrer was also filed and sustained, and, upon appellant's failure to plead further, the court dismissed his action.

This court has several times passed upon similar questions. The policy of the law in this state is to the effect that neither the state nor its officials, such as are sued herein, are liable for the wrongdoing of one acting under them, who, by his negligence, causes an injury to be inflicted upon another. All the authorities relieve the state and such officials from responsibility in such cases and place the responsibility upon those persons who commit the acts which are the direct cause of the injury.

Counsel for appellant rely for a reversal chiefly upon the cases of Herr v. Central Kentucky Lunatic Asylum, 97 Ky. 458, 28 L.R.A. 394, 53 Am. St. Rep. 414, 30 S. W. 971; Central Kentucky Asylum v. Hauns, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1016, 64 S. W. 643; Hauns v. Central Kentucky Lunatic Asylum, 103 Ky. 562, 45 S. W. 890, and Glavin v. Rhode Island Hospital, 12 R. I. 411, 34 Am. Rep. 675. The questions determined in these cases are easily distinguished from the question involved in the case at bar. The first case mentioned was a proceeding to obtain an injunction to prevent appellee from polluting a stream of water which ran through appellant's farm. Of the propriety of this, there can be no doubt. In polluting the stream of water that ran through appellant's farm, appellee decreased the value of his farm, and it amounted to the taking of his property without just compensation and due process of law, and it was an illegal act of the state and the officials in charge of the asylum. The Hauns Cases were similar to the first case mentioned, except in the first there was a judgment against the asylum for polluting a stream of water which flowed through his premises, and the second case related only to the collection of the judgment by execution. The only case cited by appellant in which a similar question arose is Glavin v. Rhode Island Hospital, supra. In that case it was held that the hospital was liable to a paying patient for negligent treatment, although the hospital was administered largely as a charity, with income derived mainly from endowments and voluntary contributions. As will be observed, there is a material distinction between that case and the one before us. In that case the patient injured was paying for services rendered him, and the funds of that institution were of that character which could be diverted and applied to the payment of a judgment, while the funds for the maintenance and support of the institution in the case at bar are appropriated by the state, and are made up of sums collected from the citizens of the state in the way of taxes. The purpose of the appropriations is purely a charitable one,—that is, to take care of the poor, unfortunate ones confined in the institution,—and is a governmental duty, and the institution is managed and controlled by the state with that sole end in view. Neither the state nor officials derive any benefit or profit from the funds appropriated for such purposes, and to allow them to be diverted from their sacred purpose to pay judgments for injuries inflicted by employees, when acting beyond the scope of their employment, would be contrary to law and public policy, and would in time wreck all the charitable institutions in the state, because in the control of these unfortunate people force must necessarily in many cases be used. This is the reason of the law, and the reason why it has been so announced in many cases, and has been directly so held in this state. See the cases of Williamson v. Louisville Industrial School, 95 Ky. 251, 23 L.R.A. 200, 44 Am. St. Rep. 243, 24 S. W. 1065, and Leavell v. Western Kentucky Asylum, 122 Ky. 213, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 269, 91 S. W. 671, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 827. The facts in the first case above referred to were that Williamson, a boy ten years of age, was placed in a school of reform, and it was alleged in the petition, in an action instituted by his next friend, that, without fault on the part of the boy, "one of the servants and employees of the appellees, and known by it to be incompetent and unfit for such service, struck and beat the appellant in such cruel and inhuman manner that he was caused great suffering in mind and body, and was permanently injured and damaged," etc. The lower court sustained a demurrer to this petition, and, on an appeal, it was affirmed by this court. The second case referred to was where a young lady employee of the asylum was engaged in ironing clothes which belonged to the inmates of the asylum, and, when she was in the act of placing a garment between the rollers of the ironing machine, an irresponsible lunatic started the machine, which caught her fingers and injured her severely. She alleged that this lunatic was incompetent and unfit to perform this labor, which fact was known to those in charge of the asylum, but, by their gross negligence this lunatic was permitted to perform this labor, and by their negligence caused the injury to her hand. The lower court sustained a demurrer to her petition and dismissed the action, and upon an appeal this court affirmed the judgment. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Appellant contends that Redwine, the superintendent of the asylum, is personally responsible for the injury and death of his intestate, because he, with the members of the board of control, appointed the subordinate officials of the asylum, including the subordinate who actually inflicted the injury which caused the death of his intestate. The principle respondeat superior does not apply to public officers, such as are sued herein, but only applies to individuals and corporations who employ servants in the furtherance of their private business. A man in private life is not compelled to employ any servants to assist him in his business, and, in fact, is not bound to carry on any business; but, if he does transact business and employ servants to aid him, his responsibility for the acts of the servant will be governed by the rule stated, for they are employed for the purpose of increasing their employer's wealth, which is not so with reference to the officers sued herein. Their relations are very different. The officers sued in the case at bar were appointed to their positions for the purpose of the administration of a public benefit and necessity, and were directed and compelled by law to employ persons to assist in the proper performance of the functions of that office. To apply the rule that exists with reference to master and servant to such officials as appellee would do violence to the principle upon which the rule is based, and would have the effect to prevent persons of responsibility from accepting such a position. In 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 1st ed. p. 495, it is said: "A public officer is not responsible for the acts or defaults of his subordinates [in office] . . . even though they are selected by him and subject to his orders,"—and cites Story on Agency, § 319, and Throop on Public Officers, § 592, and over twenty cases from foreign states supporting the text. The under officers appointed by the board of control and Redwine did not act, in the performance of their duties, as the servants of or for the benefit of the board and Redwine, but were supposed to act for the good of the public in the furtherance of a charity, and therefore the board and Redwine are not responsible for their acts. See United States v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Wheat. 720, 6 L. ed. 199; M'Millan v. Eastman, 4 Mass. 378; Seymour v. Van Slyck, 8 Wend. 403. Many other cases to the same effect could be cited.

In view of the authorities, we are of the opinion that the lower court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to appellant's petition.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

Riot — definition.

1. A riot exists where a hundred or more armed and masked men overawe and terrorize the civil authorities and the inhabitants of a town, and burn and otherwise destroy property of private citizens, which they assume is intended for a use detrimental to their interests.

Insurance — riot — liability.

2. One who has insured property against all direct loss or damage by fire, except as Case Note. — Insurance; liability of insurer for property destroyed by mob or during riot.

An insurance company is relieved from liability, by virtue of a condition in a policy that it shall not be liable "for any loss . . . caused by means of an invasion, insurrection, riot, civil commotion, or military or usurped power," where, in the nighttime, a party of armed men violently and with the discharge of firearms drive away the watchman from insured property, and set fire to it. Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Schwenk, 95 Pa. 89, 40 Am. Rep. 629.

And the destruction of an insured building by fire communicated to it from a building burned by a riotous mob is within a similar exception, notwithstanding the fire was communicated to the insured building through an intervening building. Michigan F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Whitelaw, 25 Ohio C. C. 197, affirmed without opinion in 73 Ohio St. 365, 78 N. E. 1141.

So, where it appears that five masked men broke into and entered a building in the nighttime and compelled the occupants, by threats of personal violence, to vacate, and then burned the building, it is error to sustain a demurrer to an answer of the insurer setting up its nonliability under a 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

hereafter provided, among which exceptions is loss caused directly or indirectly by riot, is not liable for property burned by an armed and masked body of men who overawe and terrorize the civil authorities and inhabitants of a town, and proceed to burn the property, because they think it is intended to be put to a use detrimental to their interests.

APPEAL by defendants from judgments of the Circuit Court for Caldwell County in plaintiff's favor in actions brought to recover the amounts alleged to be due under fire-insurance policies. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles H. Sheld, J. Wheeler Campbell, and Thomas Bates, with Mr. Bernard Flexner, for appellants:

The invasion of a large body of armed men was a riot, within the meaning of the standard insurance policy.

similar clause as the loss fell within such exception. Germania F. Ins. Co. v. Deckard, 3 Ind. App. 361, 28 N. E. 868.

So, the destruction of insured property by fire set by a riotous assemblage will relieve the insurer from liability under such a provision of a policy. Dupin v. Mutual Ins. Co. 5 La. Ann. 482.

And it is immaterial that the rioters originally assembled for a lawful purpose, and were afterwards guilty of a riot. Ibid.

Nor is it necessary, in order to relieve an insurance company from liability, that the guilt of the rioters be first established in a criminal proceeding. Ibid.

The effect of a similar clause relieving the insurer from liability unless proof is made that a loss was due to causes other than a riot is to permit it to demand such proof before being sued. Royal Ins. Co. v. Martin, 192 U. S. 149, 48 L. ed. 385, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 247.

It was held in Drinkwater v. London Assur. Co. 2 Wils. 363, that the burning of insured property by a mob was not within the exception of a policy relieving an insurer if a loss is due to an invasion, foreign enemy, or any military or usurped power.

Messrs. Yeaman & Yeaman for appellee.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These several appeals involve the same questions of law. The litigation grows out of the refusal of the appellant insurance companies to pay the amount of fire policies issued to the appellee tobacco company. The refusal of the companies was rested upon the ground that the property insured was destroyed by fire caused by a "riot," and hence they were not liable because of clauses in the policies that exempted them from liability for fire resulting from such cause. The policy issued by each company contains the same conditions and exceptions. They are what is known as the "Standard Fire Insurance Policy of the States of New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Rhode Island," and stipulate that the company insures the property of the appellee tobacco company against "all direct loss or damage by fire, except as hereinafter provided." These words appear in large printed letters in the body of the policy and as a part of the insuring clause. In small printed letters in the body of the policy are the exceptions that relieve the company from liability. Among these exceptions, and in a separate clause, is the following: "This company shall not be liable for loss caused directly or indirectly by invasion, insurrection, riot, civil war or commotion, or military or usurped power; or by order of any civil authority; or by theft; or by neglect of the insured to use all reasonable means to save and preserve the property at and after a fire, or when the property is endangered by fire in neighboring premises; or (unless fire ensues, and, in that event, for the damage by fire only) by explosion of any kind, or lightning; but liability for direct damage by lightning may be assumed by specific agreement hereon." The defense relied upon was presented in answers, to which a general demurrer was sustained; and, declining to plead further, the petitions were taken as confessed and judgments entered for the full amount claimed by the insured.

So much of the answers to which a demurrer was sustained as is material to the questions involved reads as follows:

"This defendant further says that said policy of insurance was issued by it to the plaintiff and accepted by the plaintiff as aforesaid, and provides that it does insure the Imperial Tobacco Company of Kentucky for the term of one year from the — day of November, 1906, at noon, to the — day of November, 1907, against all direct loss or damage by fire, except that said company shall not be liable for loss caused directly or indirectly by invasion, insurrection, riot, civil war, or commotion or military or usurped power, or by order of any civil authority; and this defendant avers and charges the fact to be that said loss mentioned and set forth in the plaintiff's petition was caused directly or indirectly by invasion, riot, or commotion or usurped power, in violation of the terms and provisions of said policy, and that, under the express terms and conditions of said policy, the same thereby became and at the time of the bringing of this suit and at all times after said fire occurred was and is, wholly null and void.

"This defendant further says that all of the property mentioned and described in said petition, and which is described in and by said policy of insurance, was destroyed and burned by fire on the night of November 30, 1906, or early in the morning of December 1, 1906, by reason of an invasion, riot, and commotion and usurped power, within the true intent and meaning of said provision contained in said policy of insurance above set forth; and that said property was destroyed and burned as aforesaid by a large body of men, about 100 or more in number, who invaded the city of Princeton, Kentucky, on said night of November 30, 1906, or morning of December 1, 1906, and who were armed and disguised at the time of said invasion, and who unlawfully conspired and confederated and banded themselves together for the purpose and with the intention of destroying all the property mentioned and described in the plaintiff's petition, including the three and one story, brick and frame, metal roof building, and its contents, consisting of tobacco in bulk and in packages, and described in the petition, and being the property referred to in the petition as well as a large amount of other property located in said city of Princeton and owned by numerous other parties, and that, in pursuance of said conspiracy, confederation, and unlawful purpose, on the night of November 30, 1906, or morning of December 1, 1906, said large body of men armed and disguised and banded together as aforesaid for the purpose of destroying the property described in plaintiff's petition, as well as a large amount of other property in said city of Princeton, invaded the city of Princeton, Kentucky, and took forcible possession of the police station, and the police force of said city, and also surrounded and took forcible possession of the fire department of said city of Princeton, Kentucky, and also surrounded and took forcible possession of the town hall of said city of Princeton, Kentucky, and of all telegraph and telephone offices in said city of Princeton, and, by the numbers and strength of said invaders, they overawed and intimidated and terrorized and usurped the power of the civil authorities of said city, and took forcible possession of said civil authorities and of the civil administration of said city, and also of the inhabitants and citizens thereof, and by use of their firearms said mob did hold up, overawe, intimidate, terrorize, and utterly subject and usurp the power of the civil authorities as well as the inhabitants of said city of Princeton to their unlawful control, and, after doing this, proceeded to the property of the plaintiff, as well as to large amount of other property in said city of Princeton, and tore down, dynamited, blew up, shot into, and destroyed and burned the property of said plaintiff, as well as the property of other citizens of said city of Princeton, Kentucky, all of said acts being committed and commotion being created in an unlawful and riotous manner by said large body of men who invaded said city of Princeton for the purpose of creating said riot and of destroying said property."

Two questions are presented for our consideration: First. Was the fire that produced the loss caused by "riot?" Second. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

If this be admitted, do the conditions in the policies relieve the companies from liability for loss thus caused.

Taking up these questions in the order named, we will first determine whether or not the fire was caused by "riot," and, in considering this question, the facts stated in the answers to which demurrers were sustained must be taken as true; so that, accepting these facts as true, do they constitute a "riot," within the meaning of that term as used in the policies? Curiously enough, we have no statute defining or describing a "riot," although it is mentioned in § 1268 of the Kentucky Statutes of 1903 as a punishable misdemeanor; and sections 375 and 381 of the Code of Criminal Practice contain provisions for the dispersement and quelling of riotous assemblies. Nor do we find any decision of this court in which the word has received judicial construction. We must therefore look to the common law for a definition of its meaning and a description of the acts that will constitute a riot. In the common-law authorities there is no substantial disagreement concerning the definition of a riot. In 4 Blackstone (Chitty's ed.) p. 147, we find the following: "A riot is where three or more actually do an unlawful act of violence, either with or without a common cause or quarrel, as, if they beat a man, or hunt and kill game in another's park, chase, warren, or liberty, or do any other unlawful act with force and violence, or even do a lawful act, as removing a nuisance, in a violent and tumultuous manner." In 1 Russell on Crimes, p. 265, an old English work of high repute, the author states: "A 'riot' is described to be a tumultuous disturbance of the peace by three persons or more, assembling together of their own authority, with an intent mutually to assist one another against any who shall oppose them in the execution of some enterprise of a private nature, and afterwards actually executing the same in a violent and turbulent manner, to the terror of the people, whether the act intended were of itself lawful or unlawful. . . . It seems to be agreed that the injury or grievance complained of and intended to be revenged or remedied by a riotous assembly must relate to some private quarrel only, . . . or such like manners relating to the interests or disputes of particular persons in no way concerning the public. . . . It seems to be clearly agreed that in every riot there must be some such circumstances, either of actual force or violence, or at least of an apparent tendency thereto, as are naturally apt to strike a terror into the people. . . . But it is not necessary, in order to constitute this crime, that personal violence should have been committed.

. . . But the violence and tumult must in some degree be premeditated; for if a number of persons being met together at a fair, market, or any other lawful or innocent occasion happen on a sudden quarrel to fall together by the ears, it seems to be agreed that they are not guilty of a riot, but only of a sudden affray. . . . But, if there be any predetermined purpose of acting with violence and tumult, the conduct of the parties may be deemed riotous." This definition is also found in 1 Hawkins, Pleas of the Crown, p. 513. Webster defines a riot to be "the tumultuous disturbance of the public peace by an unlawful assembly of three or more persons in the execution of some private object;" and Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, as "a tumultuous disturbance of the peace by three persons or more, assembling together of their own authority, with an intent mutually to assist each other against any who shall oppose them in the execution of some enterprise of a private nature, and afterwards actually executing the same in a violent and turbulent manner, to the terror of the people, whether the act intended were of itself lawful or unlawful." The common-law definition of a riot is generally approved by modern text writers on the subject of criminal law. Thus, Bishop, in his work on New Criminal Law (vol. 2, §§ 1143, 1149), although he makes slight criticism of the definition laid down by Russell on Crimes, says: "A 'riot is such disorderly conduct in three or more assembled persons, actually accomplishing an object, as is calculated to terrify others."

. . . The act of the rioters need not be such as it would be unlawful for one to perform. Whether in this sense lawful or unlawful, if it is done by three or more in a turbulent manner, calculated to excite terror, it is a riot." Wharton, in his work on Criminal Law (vol. 2, §§ 1537, 1539, 1544), defines a riot as a "tumultuous disturbance of the public peace by an unlawful assembly of three or more persons in the execution of some private object. . . . It must be also shown in riot that the assembling was accompanied with some such circumstances, either of actual force or violence, or at least having an apparent tendency thereto, as were calculated to inspire people with terror; such as being armed, making threatening speeches, turbulent gestures, or the like. . . . To constitute a riot it is not necessary that there should be actual fright in the public generally. It is enough if the action of the parties implicated be so violent and tumultuous as to be likely to cause fright, and if individuals are frightened." These general definitions are approved in Aron v. Wausau, 98 Wis. 592, 40 L.R.A. 733, 74 N. W. 354; State v. Stal-

cup, 23 N. C. (1 Ired. L.) 30, 35 Am. Dec. 732; Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Schwenk, 95 Pa. 89, 40 Am. Rep. 629; Dupin v. Mutual Ins. Co. 5 La. Ann. 482; Com. v. Gibney, 2 Allen, 150; State v. Snow, 18 Me. 346; State v. Hughes, 72 N. C. 27. It will thus be seen that the modern definition of a riot is in harmony with and follows the common law definition, and that the legal meaning of the word corresponds with the meaning given to it in ordinary usage. It has no technical import as distinguished from its signification when used in the everyday affairs of life. If we look to either Blackstone or Webster, we have the same result.

But it is said by counsel for appellee that it would be absurd to hold that, if two persons assembled to burn a person's property in a tumultuous manner, the insurance companies would be liable for the loss, but that, if a third man joined them in the unlawful enterprise, the companies would not be liable. Hence, it is argued that the definitions noted should not control, but that a riot, in the meaning of the word as used in the policies, must be a condition more or less analogous in its effect to an invasion, insurrection, civil war, or usurpation of power, something aimed not at a single or several individuals engaged in a particular business, but at society as organized, having for its purpose the overturning permanently or temporarily of the existing order of things. But, in view of the well-understood meaning of the word, it cannot be given this construction. In using it in the policies the companies must have intended that it should have and receive the only meaning given to it by both lawyers and laymen,—in short, its popular and usual meaning. In fact, no other definition can be attached to it without going outside of the standard authorities that have treated on the subject, and doing violence to the accepted rules concerning the construction of words in a contract or writing. It is everywhere agreed that words in a contract must be interpreted according to their ordinary and popular sense, unless from the context it appears to have been the intention of the parties that they should be understood in a different sense, or by the usage of trade or the custom of the country they have and were understood by the parties to have a particular or peculiar meaning as distinguished from their ordinary meaning. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 12; 9 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 578, 583; 1 Chitty, Contr. p. 113. And it may here be observed that what constitutes a riot does not depend so much on the number of persons engaged or assembled, as it does in the manner in which they act. It is the disorder, the tumult, the terrorizing, the putting in fear, the violence, the unlawful acts that are the essential things. Three armed men, banded together for the purpose of doing an unlawful act, with force and violence, acting in a tumultuous and disorderly manner, might be guilty of conduct amounting to a riot; whereas, a hundred or more, although acting in concert, in a disorderly and noisy manner and disturbing the peace, would not constitute a riot, unless some unlawful act was committed, although such a body might be an unlawful assembly. We are not, however, called upon in this case to make any nice or refined distinctions as to what number of persons, or what character of conduct, would constitute a riot if only a few were engaged in it and their actions might leave room for doubt as to whether or not what they did amounted to a riot. We can easily understand that there might be serious doubt as to whether the acts of three, or a small number of persons, or, indeed, any number, acting in concert for an unlawful purpose, would amount to a riot. Whether what they did would or not be a riot within the meaning of the definitions given would depend upon the facts and circumstances presented in the particular case. But we can say without any feeling of hesitation or sense of uncertainty that, if the facts stated in the answers do not describe a riot, it would be impossible to frame an answer that would. If a body of 100 or more men, armed and disguised, unlawfully confederated and banded together for the purpose and with the intention of destroying the property of an individual, and who, in pursuance of such unlawful conspiracy do destroy it, and at the same time intimidate, overawe, and terrorize the inhabitants and civil authorities, is not a riot, we are at a loss to know what facts it would take to constitute a riot under any definition the word has ever received.

As the riot was the direct cause of the fire, the next question is: Did the policies relieve the companies from liability? In the consideration of this feature of the case, it must be kept in mind that the policies only insured against direct loss or damage caused by fire. Loss or damage from any other cause, except lightning, was not insured against. The contract of insurance did not undertake to protect the insured against loss by riot or invasion, or insurrection, or civil war, or military or usurped power, or by order of any civil authority, or by theft; so that the words "except as hereinafter provided," following the words "against all direct loss or damage by fire," if they are to have any meaning at all, or are to be given any effect whatever, must exempt the companies from loss by fire "caused directly or indirectly by an invasion, insurrection, riot, civil war, or commotion, or military or usurped power, or by order of any civil authority," because the policies did not undertake to protect the insured, either directly or indirectly, against loss resulting from either of the causes mentioned. If the words "except as hereinafter provided" had been omitted from the contracts, then the insurance would have been against fire from any and all causes. But, not desiring to assume responsibility for all fires, the companies limited their undertaking and agreed to indemnify the insured against loss by fire except as provided in the policies. It will thus be seen that the words "except as hereinafter provided" are material and important in their effect upon the rights of both the parties to the contracts. It would be folly to say that the purpose was to exempt the companies from loss caused by riot alone, unaccompanied by fire, when nothing but fire was insured against; as in no event and under no circumstances were the companies liable for loss by riot alone or loss not occasioned by fire. Manifestly, when the insurance was protection against fire alone, the companies could not be held liable for the injury or destruction of the property by a riot without a fire. In other words, if the rioters had torn down the building, or had carried off the property covered by the policies, or had injured or damaged it in any way, the companies would not be responsible. Therefore we again repeat that, unless it was intended by the contracts of insurance to relieve the companies from liability for fire caused by riot, the words "except as hereinafter provided" are absolutely meaningless. The companies had the unquestioned right to insert as many reasonable provisions in the policies exempting them from liability as they thought proper or necessary. We know of no rule of law that denies to insurance companies this privilege. They may limit the amount of insurance they will offer, may limit the species of property they will insure, may provide reasonable conditions that the insured must observe, as well as conditions that will in certain states of case operate as a forfeiture of the policies or waiver of the right of the insured to recover upon them, and may protect themselves from loss resulting from causes that they do not desire to offer indemnity against. Why, then, should these words by which the companies undertook to limit their liability be stricken from the policies or ignored in their construction? They are not obnoxious to any principle of law or public policy. They are not surplusage. They are not in conflict with any other provisions in, or words of, the policies. They may be read harmoniously in connection with the other and subsequent clauses, and, when so read, become a material intelligent part of the contracts. They were inserted for a purpose, intended to have a meaning, are not of doubtful or uncertain import, and, when fairly and reasonably applied, they exempt the companies for loss by fire when the fire is caused by riot. In the construction of policies the same rules obtain as do in the construction of other contracts, with the exception that a policy will be construed in favor of the insured so as not to defeat, without plain necessity, his claim to the indemnity which, in taking the insurance, it was his object to secure; and, when the words are fairly susceptible of two interpretations, that which will sustain his claim and cover the loss must by preference, be adopted. It may also be said that ambiguities, and words, sentences, or clauses of doubtful meaning, will be construed against the insurer; and this for the reason so often declared, that the companies themselves prepare the policies with great care and deliberation; and, as the insured has no election except to accept them as prepared and presented to him, it is fair that they should be construed most strongly against the insurer and most liberally in favor of the insured, so that the purpose for which the insurance was obtained may be effectuated, if this can be done without doing violence to the contract. It is also a familiar principle, everywhere recognized in the construction of contracts, including contracts of insurance, that the intention of the parties is to be gathered from an inspection of the entire instrument; and that all parts of it, and all words employed, should be given meaning and effect if this can be done. May, Ins. § 176; Joyce, Ins. § 271; *American Acci. The views herein expressed as to the proper construction of the contracts and the consequent exemption of the companies from liability is fully sustained by the opinion of the United States circuit court of appeals in Williamsburgh City F. Ins. Co. v. Willard, 164 Fed. 404; Heuer v. North Western Nat. Ins. Co. 144 Ill. 393, 19 L.R.A. 594, 33 N. E. 411; Hustace v. Phenix Ins. Co. 175 N. Y. 292, 62 L.R.A. 651, 67 N. E. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

592; German F. Ins. Co. v. Roost, supra; Insurance Co. v. Express Co. (Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Fargo) 95 U. S. 229, 24 L. ed. 430, and by the opinion of this court in Montgomery v. Firemen's Ins. Co. 16 B. Mon. 427. In that case the boat was set on fire and burned by the bursting of the boiler. The contention of the insured was that the excepting clause merely relieved the company from liability for loss arising from the damage caused by the bursting of the boiler, and not from loss occasioned by fire that resulted from the bursting of the boiler. But the company was held not liable; the court ruling that the exception in the policy saved it from liability for fire that was directly caused by the bursting of the boiler, the contract of insurance and the excepting clause being in all substantial particulars like the contracts here involved. The contract describing the perils or risks undertaken by the insurer as set out in the opinion states that "they are of rivers, fire, enemies, pirates, assailing thieves, etc. And after the usual clause authorizing the insured, in case of loss or misfortune to labor, travel, etc., for the defense, recovery, etc., of the boat, follows a clause by which 'it is agreed that this insurance company is not liable for any loss or damage which may arise from, or be occasioned by, the said boat being unduly laden, nor for any loss arising from the explosion of gunpowder, the bursting of the boilers, the collapsing of the flues, or breaking of the engine, or any part thereof; except from unavoidable external cause or causes.'" Said the court: "We think there is no room for reasonable doubt on the evidence that the fire which actually destroyed the boat was caused directly and immediately by the bursting of the boiler. . . . The argument is that loss by fire being expressly, and loss by bursting of boilers impliedly, included among the perils insured against, and the insurer being by the succeeding clause exempt from liability for loss by bursting of boilers only, the liability for loss by fire remains, whatever may have been the cause of the fire, because the insurance against loss by fire is not restricted by any reference to the cause which may produce it; that the clause containing the exemption is an exception of hazards or losses of a particular description from the general undertaking of the insurer, which must have been understood as including them, and that, as the description of the perils insured against should be liberally construed to effectuate the expected indemnity, the same reason requires that the exception inserted by the insurer for his own benefit should be construed strictly, and forbids the exemption of the insurer from his express undertaking without the express exception of a loss within that undertaking. . . . We think that, when it is plainly said in the negative clause that the company is not liable for any loss arising from the bursting of boilers, the insured must have understood this language according to its obvious meaning, and could not have expected the company to be liable for any loss arising from the bursting of boilers; and that although the burning of the boat or any injury by fire does not always nor often attend the bursting of its boilers, yet, as he must have known that it did sometimes, or at least that it might sometimes, be the necessary and inevitable consequence of that cause; and as he must have understood that a loss so happening would be a loss arising from the bursting of boilers,—he could not have expected the company to be liable for such loss, when it was expressly agreed that they were not liable for any loss arising from the bursting of boilers. Even if the policy had expressly insured against the bursting of boilers as well as against fire, it would not have occurred to an ordinary mind that the comprehensive declaration that the company is not liable for any loss arising from the bursting of boilers should be restricted to the immediate effects of the explosive force of the steam, and would not embrace a loss by fire, although it should be in fact the necessary and immediate consequence and attendant of the actual explosion. As the company did not in terms assume the peril of any loss arising from the bursting of boilers, there is no reason on the face of the policy why the declaration of nonliability for any such loss, if regarded as an exception to a liability which would otherwise exist, should not be understood as an exception to the liability for a loss by fire necessarily and immediately caused by the bursting of boilers."

We have endeavored to point out that it was intended by the contracts to exempt the insurer from liability from loss by fire caused by riot, and that the policies when read as a whole have this effect, and have shown that this interpretation is supported by ample authority. But it is strongly pressed upon us by counsel for appellee that the words upon which the exemption is based do not have the effect intended, and that the construction contended for by the companies is not only unreasonable, but at variance with respectable authority. The argument is made: That, if the companies intended to protect themselves from loss by fire caused by riot, they should have inserted in and as a part of the clause the words "by fire," so that it would read: "This company shall not be liable for loss by fire caused directly or indirectly by invasion, insurrection, riot, civil war, or commotion, or military or usurped power, or by order of any civil authority. . . ." That the clause is written only exempts the companies from loss caused by invasion, insurrection, riot, civil war, or commotion, or military or usurped power, or by authority of any civil authority, independent of fire. That the words "except as hereinafter provided," in the sentence before mentioned, mean, when applied to the excepting clause, that the insurer shall not be liable for loss caused by riot alone, but not loss caused by fire that is the result of the riot. This construction, as we have heretofore noted, does violence to the meaning of the contract, and renders utterly meaningless the words "except as hereinafter provided." But, as counsel for appellee has furnished us with some authority that apparently supports his contention, we will notice the cases relied upon.

The principal case depended upon to support the contention of appellee is Commercial Ins. Co. v. Robinson, 64 Ill. 265, 16 Am. Rep. 557. The policy in that case provided that the company should not be liable "for any loss or damage by fire caused by means of an invasion, insurrection, riot, civil commotion, or military or usurped power, . . . nor for any loss caused by the explosion of gunpowder, camphene, or any explosive substance, or explosion of any kind." It was contended for the company that this clause protected it from liability from any loss by fire if the fire was produced by an explosion. On the other hand, it was argued for the insured that the clause protected the company only against loss occasioned directly by an explosion, and not against loss from fire where the fire was caused by an explosion. In considering the case the court said: "It will be observed that, in a clause of the policy preceding the one under consideration, the company stipulated that it should not be liable 'for any loss or damage by fire caused by means of an invasion, insurrection,' etc. Here exemption is specially secured against liability for losses by fire caused in a certain manner. But the clause under consideration leaves out the words 'by fire.' It secures exemption from liability for losses caused by explosion, but not from liability for losses by fire caused by explosion. The difference in phraseology between the two clauses is so marked that, when we consider their connection with each other, we cannot resist the conclusion that the difference was intended. . . . But, say the counsel for appellant, this company does not profess to insure against losses by explosion, but only by fire, and the clause, construed as we construe it, is unmeaning, or, at least, useless. But not so. The clause was designed to apply to all cases where the explosion was the immediate cause of the loss. Suppose fire is carelessly applied to powder or other explosive substance. An explosion follows which rends furniture and building. This explosion is the result of the ignition of the explosive material, and it might be claimed that the loss caused thereby was a loss caused by fire. The courts might not so hold, independently of the clause in the policy, but we can well understand, when we examine these policies, that the insurers may have introduced this clause for the purpose of leaving no room for argument or doubt. Again, suppose a case where a fire is speedily subdued, but before it is, it has ignited powder, and an explosion has taken place which has caused much damage, but has not extended the fire. In such a case the company would claim they were protected by this clause from the liability for the consequences of the explosion." We gather from this opinion that the ground upon which the court held the company liable was due to the peculiar phraseology of the exemption clauses, as in one clause the words "by fire" were inserted, and in the other omitted, thereby leaving room for doubt whether or not it was intended to exempt the company from liability for fire caused by explosion; and to the further fact that explosion and fire are often so closely identified, as when the fire follows an explosion or an explosion follows the fire, that it was deemed prudent to insert a provision exempting the company from liability for loss caused by the explosion as distinct from the loss caused by the fire.

In Heffron v. Kittanning Ins. Co. 132 Pa. 580, 20 Atl. 698, the exemption clause was the same as the one in the Robinson Case. Here, as in the Robinson Case, the fire was caused by an explosion; and the court followed the reasoning in that case. As illustrating that no little importance was attached to the fact that the fire was caused by an explosion, and for that reason the exemption clause was strictly construed against the company, the court said: "Indeed, damage by these two instrumentalities (that is fire and explosion) are so quite alike that the two are very naturally associated together, and may well appear in conjunction with each other in the midst of excepted losses by fire. Nor are losses by explosion foreign to the risks assumed by insurance against fire. They are like the damages by smoke and water, losses by theft, destruction by the falling of buildings, or injury by fire agencies, without actual ignition, all of which are to be found among the losses excepted against in clauses 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) in policies of insurance similar to the one under consideration. Losses by explosions, as by concussions merely, which we find joined together in this policy, are thus proper subjects of exception from the general liability assumed thereby, and there is nothing which requires us to hold that more than this was intended to be covered." In the case of Boatman's F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Parker, 23 Ohio St. 85, 13 Am. Rep. 228, the fire was also caused by an explosion. The exemption clause was similar to the one in the Robinson Case, and the court, in holding the company liable, turned its decision largely on the wording of the exemption clause; thus distinguishing the case from United Life F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Foote, 22 Ohio St. 340, 10 Am. Rep. 735, in which the same court reached a different conclusion.

Other cases might be cited in which the courts have construed ambiguous exemption clauses against the insurer properly resolving all questions of doubtful construction in favor of the insured; but it would serve no useful purpose to further extend this opinion in distinguishing this class of cases from the ones before us. If we were in doubt as to the correct construction of these policies, we would resolve the doubt in favor of the insured. If the policies were reasonably susceptible of two constructions, we would give them that construction that would save the risk for the policy holder. But, as in our opinion the contracts are not fairly open to any construction other than the one we have given them, the judgment of the lower court in each case must be reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the answer as amended in each case, and for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MISSOURI

v.

ABRAM ROSENBERGER, Appt.

(212 Mo. 648, 111 S. W. 509.)

Intoxicating Liquor — sale C. O. D.

1. Upon the filling of an order for liquor sent from a prohibition county to one where the sale is lawful, by delivering it to a carrier to be transported C. O. D., the sale is complete at the place where the order is filled, and lawful.

Note. — As to when and where title passes upon shipment of liquor C. O. D., see case note to Golightly v. State, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 383, and subsequent case of State v. Mullin, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 609.

Trial — issues — interstate commerce.

2. Whether or not the transportation of liquor from one county, where the sale is lawful, into another in the same state, by a route leading through another state, is interstate commerce, is immaterial to any issue presented by a prosecution for an alleged unlawful sale in the latter county.

(Woodson, J., dissents in part.)

(June 6, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Webster County convicting him of an unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. E. Haymes, J. C. Rosenberger, Clyde Taylor, and E. H. Gamble for appellant.

Messrs. Herbert S. Hadley, Attorney General, and N. T. Gentry for the State.

Burgess, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the September term, 1907, of the circuit court of Webster county, under an information filed by the prosecuting attorney of said county, charging the defendant with selling 1 gallon of whisky in said county, on the 2d day of February, 1907, to one Ira Morton, in violation of the local-option law in full force and effect in said county at that time, the defendant was found guilty, and his punishment assessed at a fine of $300. Defendant appealed in due course, after filing unsuccessful motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment.

The evidence tended to prove that the defendant was a wholesale and retail liquor dealer, with office and place of business in Kansas City, Jackson county, Missouri, and did business under the tradename of "Penwood Company." Ira Morton, a resident of Marshfield, in Webster county, Missouri, some time in January, 1907, ordered a gallon of whisky from said Penwood Company, and, on February 2, 1907, the whisky was received by him from the agent of the Wells-Fargo Express Company at the office of said company in Marshfield. The whisky was sent in a package marked C. O. D., and Morton paid said express agent the price thereof, $3.50, at the time of delivery, and the express agent sent the money to defendant's office at Kansas City, where it was received. Morton testified that he mailed the order to defendant of his own motion, without any solicitation on the part of defendant, or anyone on his behalf, and solely because he wanted the liquor for his own use. The express company received the package containing the whisky from one of the defendant's employees at Kansas City, and shipped the same to Morton, at Marshfield. The evidence further tended to prove that the transaction was carried out by defendant's clerks, without his knowledge, while he was at Hot Springs, Arkansas; that, while he had been making similar sales and shipments on C. O. D. terms to parties in other states, he had no knowledge that his clerks were making for him any such shipments to any local-option county in Missouri; that he had never solicited any business of that kind in Missouri either by agent or through the mails; and that up until the time of his arrest he was unaware that any such shipments had been made, nor had he authorized any. The state introduced evidence tending to prove that at the time of the alleged sale of liquor, and prior thereto, the local-option law was in force in Webster county.

The important question presented by this appeal is whether the place of sale of the liquor which the defendant is charged with selling unlawfully was in Webster county, or Jackson county, Missouri. Defendant insists that the sale was at Kansas City, Jackson county, where he was authorized by law to sell liquor, and that he was guilty of no offense in accepting and filling an order from a party in a local-option county requesting the shipment to him C. O. D. of a specified amount of liquor to a point in said local-option county of Webster. As a general rule, the delivery of goods by the vendor to the carrier, when the goods are to be sent that way, is equivalent to delivery to the purchaser, subject only to the right of stoppage in transitu. 2 Kent, Com. 490; State v. Wingfield, 115 Mo. 428, 37 Am. St. Rep. 406, 22 S. W. 363; Kerwin v. Doran, 29 Mo. App. 397; Garbracht v. Com. 96 Pa. 449, 42 Am. Rep. 550; Dunn v. State, 82 Ga. 27, 3 L.R.A. 199, 8 S. E. 806. And this is true although the purchase money is afterwards collected by the vendor or agent at the place from which the goods are shipped. State v. Hughes, 22 W. Va. 743. But, when the goods are shipped upon order C. O. D., as in the case at bar, there is much conflict in the authorities as to where and when the title passes—that is, whether at the point of shipment or at the point of destination—upon payment of the purchase price. In American Exp. Co. v. Iowa, 196 U. S. 133, 49 L. ed. 417, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 182, it is said: "True, as suggested by the court below, there has been a diversity of opinion concerning the effect of a C. O. D. shipment; some courts holding that, under such a shipment, the property is at the risk of the buyer, and therefore that delivery is completed when the merchandise reaches the hands of the carrier for transportation, others deciding that the merchandise is at the risk of the seller, and that the sale is not completed until the payment of the price, and delivery to the consignee at the point of destination." Among the authorities which hold that a sale C. O. D. is not complete until delivery, acceptance, and payment of the purchase price by the person ordering the goods may be cited: United States v. Shriver (D. C.) 23 Fed. 134; United States v. Cline (D. C.) 26 Fed. 515; State v. United States Exp. Co. 70 Iowa, 271, 30 N. W. 568; State v. Wingfield, 115 Mo. 428, 37 Am. St. Rep. 406, 22 S. W. 363; State v. O'Neil, 58 Vt. 140, 56 Am. Rep. 557, 2 Atl. 586; State v. Goss, 59 Vt. 266, 59 Am. Rep. 706, 9 Atl. 823; United States v. Chevallier, 46 C. C. A. 402, 107 Fed. 434; Baker v. Bourcicault, 1 Daly, 24; Crabb v. State, 88 Ga. 584, 15 S. E. 455; Dunn v. State, 82 Ga. 27, 3 L.R.A. 199, 8 S. E. 806; Wagner v. Hallack, 3 Colo. 176; O'Neil v. Vermont, 144 U. S. 323, 36 L. ed. 450, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693; Canton v. McDaniel, 188 Mo. 207, 86 S. W. 1092. But in 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 301, it is said: "At least so far as cases dealing with intoxicating liquors are concerned, however, the weight of authority is against the foregoing view, and it is generally held that, where intoxicating liquors are ordered to be shipped C. O. D., the sale is completed when the liquor is delivered to the carrier,"—citing Pilgreen v. State, 71 Ala. 368; Hunter v. State, 55 Ark. 357, 18 S. W. 374; Berger v. State, 50 Ark. 20, 6 S. W. 15; Bunch v. Potts, 57 Ark. 257, 21 S. W. 437; Com. v. Russell, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 576; Com. v. Kearns, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 332; Current v. Com. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 764; James v. Com. 102 Ky. 108, 42 S. W. 1107; State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 73 Me. 278; Com. v. Fleming, 130 Pa. 138, 5 L.R.A. 470, 17 Am. St. Rep. 763, 18 Atl. 622; State v. Flanagan, 38 W. Va. 53, 22 L.R.A. 430, 45 Am. St. Rep. 836, 17 S. E. 792; State v. Hughes, 22 W. Va. 743. The same doctrine is announced by the courts of Texas and other states. In Com. v. Fleming, supra, it is decided that the term "C. O. D.," placed upon an express package, means that the carrier is thereby directed to collect the price of the goods at the time of delivering them to the consignee, and to withhold such delivery until payment is made, and is authorized, upon receipt of such payment, to discharge the purchaser of the goods from liability for their price; that "when, in pursuance of an order for goods, directed by the purchaser to be shipped to him C. O. D., the vendor has delivered them to a common carrier, with instructions to collect their price from the consignee before delivering them to him, the transaction as a sale is complete so far as the vendor is concerned. In such 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

case, while the title to the goods does not pass to the purchaser if they be not delivered to him by the carrier, that circumstance does not affect the character of the transaction as a completed contract of sale. The seller's right to recover the price, if the purchaser refuse to take the goods, is as complete as if he had taken them without payment." In that case the facts were that a liquor dealer in a certain county of Pennsylvania received an order for liquor to be shipped to the purchaser in another county of said state C. O. D., and, in pursuance of the order, the dealer delivered the liquor to a common carrier in the county where the dealer resided for shipment to the vendee, at the latter's expense, C. O. D. It was held that the delivery to the carrier was a delivery to the purchaser in such a sense as to complete the sale in the county from which the shipment was made. The same doctrine is announced and upheld by a long line of decisions of the courts of Texas; also, in State v. Flanagan and American Exp. Co. v. Iowa, supra; Adams Exp. Co. v. Kentucky, 206 U. S. 129, 51 L. ed. 987, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 606. What was said by this court upon this question in State v. Wingfield, supra, and in Canton v. McDaniel, supra, was unnecessary to a decision of either of those cases, because the shipments were not C. O. D., and therefore what was said respecting such shipments in those cases may properly be regarded as obiter, and, while the dictum is supported by many high authorities, we are satisfied that the weight of authority is contrary to what is announced in those cases as the law. The great mercantile interests of the country seem to demand that the law by which such interests are governed should be uniform, and we are of opinion that, so far as concerns the title to goods delivered to a carrier for shipment, the same rule applies to C. O. D. shipments as to those in ordinary cases, in the absence of any express contract to the contrary between the shipper and the consignee. There is no question that Morton ordered the liquor in question for his own use, C. O. D., and, when it was so shipped, the sale became complete at the place of shipment.

The defendant next insists that the transaction shown in evidence constituted interstate commerce within the meaning of § 8, art. 1, U. S. Const., for the reason that the route of the shipment was partly through the state of Kansas, and that it is and was beyond the power of the state to restrict, prohibit, or interfere therewith. Upon the other hand, the state contends that the shipment in question was not an interstate shipment; that is, a shipment from one state to another, and that whether it was so or not is immaterial in this case, which is a prosecution for the unlawful sale of liquor in a county which had theretofore adopted the local-option law. The question was properly presented by instructions asked by the defendant, and refused by the court, to which action of the court the defendant saved an exception. Conceding, for the sake of argument, that the shipment was interstate, as contended by defendant, we cannot see how or in what way such fact is available to him as a defense in this case. This is simply a prosecution for the alleged unlawful sale of liquor in Webster county, Missouri, and whether its transportation into the county was a matter of interstate commerce or otherwise, as the liquor was sold in Jackson county, Missouri, is not material to any issue in the case.

Our conclusion is that the sale of the liquor was completed when shipped at Kansas City, Jackson county, Missouri, and not at Webster county, Missouri, as charged in the information.

The judgment should be reversed and the defendant discharged. It is so ordered.

All concur, except Woodson, J., who concurs in what is said with respect to the place of sale of the liquor, but dissents from the view expressed on the last proposition, and Valliant, J., who is absent.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

VILLAGE OF HAVERSTRAW, Resp't.,

v.
J. ESLER ECKERSON et al., Appts.

(192 N. Y. 54, 84 N. E. 578.)

Highway — lateral support.

1. The owner of land abutting on a highway is burdened with the duty of preserving lateral support to the highway as constructed and operated for public use.

Injunction — injury to highway — suit by village.

2. An incorporated village having exclusive control of its highways may maintain a suit in equity to restrain excavation of adjacent lands so as to affect the lateral support and cause or threaten the subsidence of a highway.

(April 14, 1908.)

APPPEAL by defendants from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for Rockland County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to enjoin the removal of lateral support from a highway. Affirmed.

Statement by Gray, J.:

Appeal from an order of the appellate division in the second judicial department affirming an interlocutory judgment, which overruled a demurrer to the complaint. Permission was given to appeal to this court, and the following questions were certified:

"First. Has a village incorporated under the general village law capacity to maintain an action in equity to restrain threatened injury to a public street?

"Second. Has such a village the right to maintain an action in equity to restrain the taking down, removing, or otherwise interfering with the lateral support of a public street by the lands of a defendant abutting on such public streets?

"Third. Has the public any right to the lateral support of the adjacent land abutting upon, but wholly outside of the lines of, such public street, for the purpose of sustaining the bed of the public highway?

"Fourth. Is the land belonging to a private individual, adjacent to a public highway but wholly outside the lines of such public highway, subject to the burden in favor of the public of affording lateral support to such public highway?

"Fifth. Does the complaint in this action state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action?

"Sixth. May the plaintiff, a municipal corporation, maintain this action against the defendants under all the facts and circumstances alleged in the complaint?"

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff

Case Note. — Duty of abutting owner to preserve lateral support to highway.

The decision in HAVERSTRAW v. ECKERSON appears to present for the first time the question of the right of the public to the lateral support of the adjacent land abutting upon a street, for the purpose of sustaining the bed of the road as a public highway.

The case of Milburn v. Fowler, 27 Hun, 568, involving the same principles, is sufficiently commented on in the above opinion. Careful research has disclosed but few authorities on the general subject of the note.

In Finegan v. Eckerson, 26 Misc. 574, 57 N. Y. Supp. 605, excavations along the line of a public street were enjoined, and the restoration of the street ordered, at the suit of an individual adjoining landowner whose building was threatened by the removal of the lateral support afforded by the street, and whose right of access to his property was interfered with. This case was before the appellate division of the New York supreme court (32 App. Div. 233, 52 N. Y. Supp. 993) on an appeal from an order granting a temporary injunction; and, on the authority of that holding and was incorporated under the former village law of the state, and that it is subject to the present general village law, as enacted in 1897. Laws 1897, chap. 414, p. 306. It sets forth the jurisdiction of the plaintiff's board of trustees over its public streets and highways, the existence of a certain street known as "Jefferson street," which, with other streets and highways, had been established and dedicated for the public use, and had been duly accepted by the plaintiff, the public use of the streets for more than fifty years, under the jurisdiction and control exercised by the plaintiff's officers, and the ownership by the defendant Eckerson of certain lands adjacent to Jefferson street. It alleges that the defendants have wrongfully and unlawfully excavated and removed clay, sand, and other materials from Eckerson's land, adjacent to Jefferson street, for use in brickyards, and have interfered with, endangered, and destroyed the lateral support of said street, encroaching upon it, and rendering it unsafe for passage, and creating, by reason thereof, a public nuisance. It alleges that they are still engaged in such acts, that they threaten and intend to continue the same, and that, by reason thereof, the street "is greatly endangered and rendered liable to slide and cave into such excavations," and that the properties of various persons on that side of the street are likewise in danger. Judgment is demanded enjoining and restraining the defendants "from excavating and removing clay, sand, and other materials from the land . . . adjacent to Jefferson street, so as to cause said street . . . to subside or slide down into the excavations upon said adjoining property," from "interfering with the lateral support of said street," and requiring them to "restore said street to its former and original condition, . . . and to restore the lateral support thereof where the same has been removed or otherwise interfered with." The defendants demurred to the complaint for want of legal capacity in the plaintiff to maintain the action, and for the insufficiency of the facts stated to constitute a cause of action.

Messrs. Henry Bacon and Ralph E. Prime, for appellants:

A village organized under the general laws has no authority to maintain an action in equity to restrain the excavation of land adjacent to the highway.

As to villages, the only remedy is by ordinance.

the Milburn Case, above referred to, the permanent injunction was here granted.

United States v. Peachy, 36 Fed. 160, was an action for damages to a sidewalk due to excavations by the defendant on the opposite side of a public street, which caused the street to cave in and injure the walk. The court recognized the duty of abutting owners to maintain the lateral support of the street, saying: "The right of every abutting owner, as well as the public, to the maintenance of a street intact, necessarily implies the right of the public and the abutting owner to whatever support is necessary, whether lateral or subjacent, for the street, from all the land that abuts upon it, and this whether the structures of the street be natural or artificial;" but held that it was an exaggeration of the principle just stated to suppose that, by reason of it, the defendant became the insurer of the opposite neighbor against all injury, and that he was only bound to proceed with due caution to do the work in a skilful and workmanlike manner. No negligence was 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

shown on the part of the defendant, and the verdict was therefore in his favor. It is submitted that the conclusion thus reached is but the application of principles already generally accepted, where the question of lateral support is one as to the rights between themselves, of adjoining landowners.

Land adjoining a public road is held to be burdened with the lateral support of the road, in Hudson County v. Woodcliff Land Improv. Co. 74 N. J. L. 355, 65 Atl. 844; but in that case the defendant had conveyed to the plaintiff the land upon which the road was built to be used for that specific purpose, and the case was decided upon the theory that an easement of lateral support for the road had been granted by implication.

As to the liability of a municipal corporation for the removal of the lateral support of abutting property in making street improvements, see note to Talcott Bros. v. Des Moines, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 696.

The village, as such is not given power to maintain the action; nor can it be given to the village by analogy because commissioners of highways are authorized to sue in the name of their respective "towns."

Co.* 4 Hun, 239.

Mr. William McCauley, with Mr. Alonzo Wheeler, for respondent:

A village incorporated under the general village law has capacity to maintain an action in equity to restrain threatened injury to a public street, including the right to lateral support.

Oxford v. Willoughby, 181 N. Y. 162, 73 N. E. 677; Elliott, Roads & Streets, 2d ed. p. 713; 2 Beach, Modern Eq. Jur. p. 816; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 2d ed. § 520; Watertown v. Cowen, 4 Paige, 510, 27 Am. Dec. 80; New York v. Knickerbocker Trust Co. 104 App. Div. 229, 93 N. Y. Supp. 937; Milburn v. Fowler, 27 Hun, 568; Finegan v. Eckerson, 26 Misc. 574, 57 N. Y. Supp. 605.

The public has the right to the lateral support of the adjacent land for the purpose of sustaining the public highway, and the land belonging to a private individual, adjacent to a public highway, is subject to the burden in favor of the public of affording lateral support to such public highway.

son, 26 Misc. 574, 57 N. Y. Supp. 605, 32 App. Div. 233, 52 N. Y. Supp. 993.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions presented by this appeal are simply whether the village of Haverstraw has the legal capacity to maintain an action for equitable relief, and, if it has, whether a cause of action is made out upon the allegations of its complaint. I think that the first of these questions was settled by our decision in the case of Oxford v. Willoughby, 181 N. Y. 155, 73 N. E. 677. Upon its authority, as in reason, we must hold that a municipal corporation may resort to a court of equity for the preservation of its streets and highways, and for the protection of the rights of the public therein, when their permanency and the public use thereof are menaced. In Oxford's Case the judgment, which we upheld, restrained the defendant from continuing a certain encroachment upon a street of the village, which consisted in an excavation within its lines for the foundations of a building. In that case the right of the municipality to maintain an action for equitable relief was contested and the question was carefully considered. It was held that the village possessed this right, not only under the general rule, which concedes to the municipal corporation the right to exercise, beyond the powers expressly granted, such incidental powers as are indispensable for the proper protection of the public rights, when menaced by an act which amounts to a public nuisance, but also under the general highway law of the state. The powers conferred by the provisions of the general village law which relate to the administration of village streets imply every incidental power essential to conserve the public rights therein. By the highway law, whose provisions, are generally applicable, unless modified by other and special provisions, the highway commissioners of towns are empowered to maintain such an action in the name of the town; but, inasmuch as the village law creates "a separate highway district" of the village, vesting an exclusive control in the village trustees over the streets, the special provision modifies the general highway law, and the authority of the highway commissioners is transferred to, and vests in, the village authorities. The question was discussed in Oxford's Case, and I think further discussion needless here.

As to the other question in this case, the proposition of the appellants is that "the doctrine of lateral support does not apply to the conditions which arise between an owner along a public street and the public interested in the highways." I do not think the proposition is quite correct. As between the proprietors of adjacent lands, neither proprietor may excavate his own soil so as to cause that of his neighbor to loosen and fall into the excavation. The right to lateral support is not so much an easement as it is a right incident to the ownership of the respective lands. It is true that the application of the doctrine in the case of a public street or highway will be somewhat broader. In the case of adjacent landowners the right is only to the support of the land in its natural state, while in the case of the street or highway the improvement of the land, to fit it for its intended use as a public highway, may tend to add to the lateral pressure. But that would be the permanent and natural condition of the land acquired for the public travel. It is further true that the municipality is not under a similar obligation to the abutting owner, and for the reason that, with respect to the construction and maintenance of the public highway, it exercises a governmental function and can come under no liability in its reasonable performance thereof. It constitutes an exception to the general rule of lateral support. See 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 991, and Moore v. Albany, 98 N. Y. 396, page 407. I think that the preservation of lateral support to a highway as constructed and prepared for the public use is an obligation to the community which rests upon the adjacent landowner. It is an absolute right of the public, in the maintenance of which the members of the community are concerned. It is of no materiality whether the fee of the street or highway is in the municipality, or whether it holds and controls it by a lesser title. The municipality is the incorporation of the inhabitants of the village district, and it is their representative, and the trustee of their equitable rights. In its board of trustees is vested, by the statute, the exclusive control and supervision of the streets and public grounds, and it is but a just result that, whatever the rights, legal or equitable, of the public therein, they should be enforceable at the suit of the municipality. It would be a vain grant of power by the statute if the interests of the public in a street or highway could not be prevented from destruction or impairment and protected by resort to the courts. In my opinion no legitimate consideration militates against the restriction of the adjacent owner's property rights to such acts upon his land as will not injuriously affect the public rights in the highway. Our attention is not called to any case in this court which presents this precise question, and I have not been able to find any; but in Milburn v. Fowler, 27 Hun, 568, we have an explicit 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) utterance upon the subject by the present chief judge of this court. In that case an injunction was granted at the suit of an owner of land abutting upon a highway which restrained the defendants from so digging on their own land as to endanger the safety of the highway. It was observed by Judge Cullen, speaking for the general term, that "it is claimed that there is no right of lateral support for the street, unless it is alleged and shown that the highway is in its natural state, and free from superincumbent earth, which may increase the lateral pressure. This doctrine which, in the absence of any statutory regulations, controls the relative rights between adjacent owners, has no application to the case of a highway."

My conclusion is that, whether the acts of persons menace the condition of a highway in a direct manner, or indirectly, by so digging or excavating upon the adjacent lands as to affect the lateral support, and to cause or to threaten the subsidence of the highway, the exercise of the equitable power of the court may properly be invoked by the municipality in restraint of their continuance.

For these reasons, I advise that the order appealed from should be affirmed, with costs, and that the questions certified should be answered in the affirmative.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

CHARLES G. BLAKE, Plff. in Err.,
v.
HAMILTON DIME SAVINGS BANK
COMPANY.

(79 Ohio, 189, 87 N. E. 73.)

Check — certification — effect.

1. The certificate by a bank that a check is good is equivalent to acceptance, and raises an implication that it is drawn upon sufficient funds in the hands of the drawee, that they have been set apart for its sat-

Headnotes by the Court.

Case Note. — Right of drawer to stop payment of certified check.

Where the drawer of a check causes it to be certified by a bank, and it is charged to his account and registered by it, it being the drawer's intention that the check shall circulate as currency, he cannot, after the check has been stolen, stop payment by the bank so as to defeat the right of a bona fide holder, who acquires it for isfaction, and that they shall be so applied whenever the check is presented for payment.

Same — liability of certifier.

2. The transfer of a certified check is an assignment of money to meet it; and the bank making the certification is liable therefor to the holder.

Certified check — deposit — stopping payment — effect.

3. The object of certifying a check is to enable a holder to use it as money. The drawer or indorser of a certified check cannot, after its delivery, revoke it or stop payment upon it by notice to the drawee not to pay; and a bank that has received a certified check for deposit, and has credited the depositor with the amount of it, is a bona fide holder, and may enforce payment of it, notwithstanding it may, before payment to the depositor, have received notice that the check was fraudulently obtained by the depositor.

(December 22, 1908.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hamilton County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas value three years after its certification, from recovering the amount thereof from the bank. Nolan v. Bank of New York, 67 Barb. 24.

And it was said in Poess v. Twelfth Ward Bank, 43 Misc. 45, 86 N. Y. Supp. 857, that the drawer of a check who has it certified, cannot, after its loss before delivery, stop payment thereon so as to operate to the prejudice of a bona fide holder who obtains it in the usual course of business, without notice of the fact that it has been lost or stolen.

And the following cases contain dicta to the effect that the right of a drawer of a check to revoke or countermand its payment is terminated when the drawee, either by certifying the check or obligating itself to pay it, has become liable for the amount thereof. National Commercial Bank v. Miller, 77 Ala. 176, 54 Am. Rep. 50; Kahn v. Walton, 46 Ohio St. 195, 20 N. E. 203; Pease & Dwyer v. State Nat. Bank, 114 Tenn. 693, 88 S. W. 172.

After an accommodation check has been certified by the drawee bank at the instance of a creditor of the payee to whom it was delivered without indorsement in payment of a pre-existing debt, the drawer of the check cannot stop payment thereof. Freund v. Importers & T. Nat. Bank, 76 N. Y. 352, affirming 12 Hun, 537.

So, where the payee of a check which was obtained by fraud and without consideration secured its certification, and the drawer subsequently stopped its payment, and, when presented by a transferee, the bank wrote upon it "payment stopped" and rein plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover upon a certain certified check. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Burch & Johnson, for plaintiff in error:

The bank was not entitled to protection as a bona fide purchaser.

Dan. Neg. Inst. 5th ed. § 1652, p. 680; Thompson v. Sioux Falls Nat. Bank, 150 U. S. 231, 37 L. ed. 1063, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 94; Mann v. Second Nat. Bank, 30 Kan. 412, 1 Pac. 579; Central Nat. Bank v. Valentine, 18 Hun, 417; Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Newell, 71 Wis. 309, 37 N. W. 420.

Receiving a certified check of another bank, and crediting it to the account of a depositor upon his indorsement thereof, do not make the receiving bank a purchaser for value.

Messrs. Pogue & Pogue, for defendant in error:

When a check is certified the fund is turned it to the holder, who erased these words and placed a revenue stamp over the place where they were written; and the check afterwards came into the possession of a holder for value in due course of business, without notice of any defects therein,—the latter may recover the amount of the check from the drawee bank. Nassau Bank v. Broadway Bank, 54 Barb. 236.

The drawer of a check given for the purchase price of stolen property, after the payee has secured its certification and the bank has charged the amount thereof against the drawer's account, and the payee has sold the check for value to a bona fide purchaser, cannot countermand its payment. Meridian Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 7 Ind. App. 322, 52 Am. St. Rep. 450, 33 N. E. 237, 34 N. E. 608.

And it is immaterial that the check was payable to and indorsed by the payee in a fictitious name. Ibid.

Where the payee of a check obtained by fraudulent representations, and, without consideration delivered it without indorsement to another, subsequently notifying the bank not to pay it, a subsequent certification by the bank, at the holder's request, will not constitute a defense when the bank is sued by the drawer for the amount of the check,—he also, after the check was certified, having notified the bank not to pay it,—as one taking an unindorsed check is not a bona fide holder, and the bank, before certifying the check, was placed upon inquiry by the conduct of the payee, who still held the legal title thereto. Public Grain & Stock Exchange v. Kune, 20 Ill. App. 137.

transferred immediately to the payee or his assigns, and no one has any claim upon the fund except the owner and holder, free from any claim or right of the drawer to stop payment.

Messrs. Murphy & Williams also for defendant in error.

Summers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action was brought by the defendant in error, the Hamilton Dime Savings Bank Company, of Hamilton, Ohio, against the Franklin Bank of Cincinnati, Ohio, upon a check drawn by C. G. Blake & Company upon the Franklin bank for $275, payable to the order of C. G. Blake, and certified by the Franklin bank to be good, and indorsed by C. G. Blake and Charles Werbel.

On Friday, October 16, 1903, Blake bought a horse from Werbel and indorsed the check to the order of Werbel and delivered it to him in payment for the horse. The indorsement of certification was as follows:

Good for $275.00 when properly indorsed.

The Franklin Bank,
H. Sachteleben, Teller.

Werbel indorsed the check, and on the following Monday, October the 20th, deposited it to his account with the Hamilton Dime Savings Bank Company, and was given credit therefor on the books of the bank. The Hamilton Dime Savings Bank Company sent the check to the Atlas National Bank, of Cincinnati, for collection, and it was protested for nonpayment for the reason "payment stopped." Thereupon, on November 19, 1903, the defendant in error sued the Franklin Bank on the check, and the Franklin Bank, under § 5016, Rev. Stat. 1908, filed a motion for an order of interpleader, which was granted, the amount of the check with interest was paid into court, and C. G. Blake was substituted as defendant. Blake filed an answer averring that he had been induced to purchase the horse and to deliver the check in payment therefor by the false and fraudulent representations of Werbel, that Werbel is the owner of the check, that the plaintiff, the Hamilton Dime

Savings Bank Company, received the check only as collecting agent for Werbel and with knowledge that Werbel had been notified that payment on the check would be stopped. A jury was waived, and the court stated its findings of fact separately from its conclusions of law. Judgment was given for the bank for the amount paid into court, less costs to the date of that payment. The court found that the Hamilton Dime Savings Bank Company was the purchaser of the check for value and before notice and without knowledge of Blake's claim. On error the circuit court affirmed the judgment, not, however, on the ground that the bank was entitled to the protection afforded to bona fide purchasers; the court stating in its opinion, as a matter of law, that the savings bank was not a purchaser for value, but that the transaction was the ordinary and usual one of a deposit by a depositor, and not a purchase of the check for value by the bank. At the time the bank received notice of the claim of Blake, it had on deposit to the credit of Werbel a sum in excess of the amount of the check. No question is made as to the authority of the teller of the bank to bind the bank by the certification of the check. The circuit court affirmed the judgment on the ground that "Werbel became the absolute owner of the check free from the claim of Blake to the same extent as if it had been money. 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1601; Morse, Banks & Banking, § 414."

The circuit court was right in its opinion that the Hamilton bank was not a purchaser of the check. In the absence of special agreement, the deposit in bank to his credit of an uncertified check by the holder, whether drawn on that bank or another, is deemed to be for collection, and not for payment; and, if there be no funds to meet it, or if it be returned dishonored, the deposit bank may return it to the depositor and cancel the credit. Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1623; Morse, Banks & Banking, 320, 321; National Gold Bank & T. Co. v. McDonald, 51 Cal. 64, 21 Am. Rep. 697. And in such case, if the bank receives notice of the invalidity of the check, it cannot become a bona fide holder by subsequent payment. "The mere discounting of paper and placing the amount thereof to the credit of a depositor, who already has a large balance to his credit, does not make the bank a purchaser for value so as to protect it against infirmities in the paper. Entering the amount of the discount to the credit of the depositor simply creates the relation between the bank and the depositor of debtor and creditor; and, so long as that relation remains, and the deposit is not drawn out, the bank has simply promised to pay the depositor, has parted with no value, and is not entitled to the protection of a bona fide holder of paper." Mann v. Second Nat. Bank, 30 Kan. 412, 1 Pac. 579. "The mere credit of a check upon the books of a bank, which may be canceled at any time, does not make the bank the bona fide purchaser for value. If after such credit, and before payment for value, upon the faith thereof, the holder receives notice of the invalidity of the check, he cannot become a bona fide holder by subsequent payment." Dan. Neg. Inst. 5th ed. § 1652; Central Nat. Bank v. Valentine, 18 Hun, 417; Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Newell, 71 Wis. 309, 37 N. W. 420. The Hamilton bank therefore, upon the evidence, was not a purchaser of the check, or entitled to the protection of a bona fide holder of the paper, unless it is so entitled by reason of the fact that the check was certified.

In this state a bank check for part of the sum due the drawer does not, before acceptance by the drawee, constitute an equitable assignment of the amount for which it is drawn (Covert v. Rhodes, 48 Ohio St. 66, 27 N. E. 94), and the holder cannot maintain an action against the bank for the amount of the check, although it has funds to the credit of the drawer sufficient to meet it (Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Metropolitan Nat. Bank, 54 Ohio St. 60, 31 L.R.A. 653, 56 Am. St. Rep. 700, 42 N. E. 700). This is now made the law by statute. Section 3177v, Rev. Stat. 1908, provides: "A check is a bill of exchange drawn on a bank payable on demand." And § 3177z is as follows: "A check of itself does not operate as an assignment of any part of the funds to the credit of the drawer with the bank, and the bank is not liable to the holder unless and until it accepts or certifies the check."

But this is a certified check. Mr. Daniel says (§ 1602) that the certification of checks is an expedient and outgrowth of modern commerce quite recent in its origin, but now of daily and extensive occurrence. And in Merchants' Nat. Bank v. State Nat. Bank, 10 Wall. 604, 19 L. ed. 1008, decided in 1871, Mr. Justice Swayne says in the opinion that "it is computed by a competent authority that the average daily amount of such checks in use in the city of New York, throughout the year, is not less than $100,000,000," and that "we could hardly inflict a severer blow upon the commerce and business of the country than by throwing a doubt upon their validity." And, speaking of their legal effect, he says: "By the law merchant of this country, the certificate of the bank that a check is good is equivalent to acceptance. It implies that the check is drawn upon sufficient funds in the hands of the drawee, that they have been set apart for its satisfaction, and that they shall be so applied whenever the check is presented for payment. It is an undertaking that the check is good then and shall continue good, and this agreement is as binding on the bank as its notes of circulation, a certificate of deposit payable to the order of the depositor, or any other obligation it can assume. The object of certifying a check, as regards both parties, is to enable the holder to use it as money. The transferee takes it with the same readiness and sense of security that he would take the notes of the bank. It is available, also, to him for all the purposes of money. Thus, it continues to perform its important functions until in the course of business it goes back to the bank for redemption and is extinguished by payment. It cannot be doubted that the certifying bank intended these consequences, and it is liable accordingly. To hold otherwise would render these important securities only a snare and delusion. A bank incurs no greater risk in certifying a check than in giving a certificate of deposit. In well-regulated banks the practice is at once to charge the check to the account of the drawer, to credit it in 'certified check account,' and, when the check is paid, to debit that account with the amount. Nothing can be simpler or safer than this process. The practice of certifying checks has grown out of the business needs of the country. They enable the holder to keep or convey the amount specified with safety. They enable persons not well acquainted to deal promptly with each other, and they avoid the delay and risks of receiving, counting, and passing from hand to hand large sums of money." Daniel (§ 1603) says that, when the check is certified, the bank becomes at once the principal debtor, and that, when the holder procures the bank to certify the check "in contemplation and by operation of law, it is the same as if the funds had been actually paid out by the bank to the holder, by him redeposited to his own credit, and a certificate of deposit issued to him therefor. In other words, a certified check is a shorthand certificate of deposit in favor of the holder, and payable to him, or to him or order, or to bearer, according to its terms." Again, he says: "It will be too late after the bank has certified the check for the drawer to revoke it, and the bank will be bound to pay it though notified by the drawer not to do so." And, again, he says, in § 1605, that "the check when certified circulates as the representative of so much cash in bank, payable, whenever demanded, to the holder. It is then like cash, but still it is not the same as cash, for nullus simile est idem."

The drawer, by delivery of a certified check in the absence of special agreement, is not discharged from liability, the only effect of the certification being to add the credit of the bank to that of the drawer (Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1626; Oyster & Fish Co. v. National Lafayette Bank, 51 Ohio St. 106, 46 Am. St. Rep. 560, 36 N. E. 833); and the same is true as to a holder who procures the check to be certified before delivery. He is a new drawer and will be held liable as well as the bank. If, after delivery, the holder procures a check to be certified, the drawers and indorsers are thereby discharged. Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1601a; Rev. Stat. 1908, § 3177y. In this case the payee, Blake, procured the certification of the check after delivery to him and before delivery by him to Werbel, thereby discharging Blake & Company, the drawers, and making himself as well as the bank liable on the check. Section 3177x, Rev. Stat. 1908, provides that, where a check is certified by the bank on which it is drawn, the certification is equivalent to an acceptance, and, under § 3177z, Rev. Stat. 1908, by necessary implication, the certification operates as an assignment of the funds to meet the check, and makes the bank liable to the holder.

What, then, are the rights of the parties? If Blake had given Werbel money, instead of the check, and Werbel had deposited the money to his credit in the Hamilton bank, the relation of debtor and creditor between the bank and Werbel would thereby have been created. In Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Metropolitan Nat. Bank, 54 Ohio St. 60, 71, 31 L.R.A. 653, 56 Am. St. Rep. 700, 42 N. E. 700, 702, it is said by Spear, J.: "The relation of bank and general depositor is simply the ordinary one of debtor and creditor, not of agent and principal, or trustee and cestui que trust." And again: "The deposits become the absolute property of the bank, impressed with no trust, and the bank's right to use the money for its own benefit is immediate and continuous." The money would belong to the bank, and Blake could not acquire any interest in it or impose any liability on the bank merely by notifying it that Werbel had obtained the money from him by defrauding him in a horse trade. If, instead of money, Blake had traded a piano to Werbel for the horse, it may be that Blake could repudiate the trade on the ground of fraud, and that after tender back of the horse the title to the piano would reinvest in him, and that he could then recover it from anyone excepting a bona fide purchaser; but money loses its identity, and, if the relation of debtor and creditor between the bank and Werbel would arise upon the deposit of the money, then the bank would necessarily be treated as a bona fide purchaser, and title to the money would not be restored to Blake even by a repudiation of the trade and a tender back of the horse. Now, while it is true, as has been pointed out, that the delivery of the check was not payment for the horse, and that Blake was liable on the check, still, if certified checks are to circulate as money and to perform the useful purpose in trade they have heretofore, the deposit of them in bank to the credit of the holder must be, so far as the rights of the indorser are concerned, treated as a deposit of money. The transaction under consideration may serve in some slight measure to illustrate their use. Blake may have supposed that Werbel would want cash for the horse and would not accept his check, and, not wishing to carry the money from Cincinnati to Hamilton, he procured the certification of the check, and Blake accepted it as readily as he would have accepted cash; but, if he could not accept it with the same security that he could cash, then, under such circumstances, a certified check could not be used at all, or the indorsee of such a check, if he wishes to avoid embarrassment and delays, such as have resulted in this case, must at once present the check for payment and then deposit the money, instead of the check, in bank. This being so, then the obligation of the Franklin bank to pay the check was not affected by the notice to it by Blake not to pay, and the right of the Hamilton bank to enforce payment was not affected by notice of Blake's claim.

Some question is made as to the right to an order of interpleader in such a case as this; but, in view of the conclusion reached, it is not necessary to consider it. And it may be added that, even if the certified check were not treated as money, but as property Blake had given Werbel for the horse, Blake could neither recover it nor defend against payment of it in a suit upon it, in the absence of a showing that he had repudiated the trade and had tendered the horse to Werbel, which was not done in this case, nor was Werbel made a party to the action. Morrison v. Eaton, Tappan (Ohio) 173; Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. Burke, 69 Ohio St. 294, 100 Am. St. Rep. 666, 70 N. E. 74; Archer v. Bamford, 3 Starkie, 175; Lewis v. Cosgrave, 2 Taunt. 2; Heaton v. Knowlton, 53 Ind. 357; Grubbs v. Barber, 102 Ind. 131, 1 N. E. 638.

The judgment is affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

ERIE RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
GEORGE F. REICHERD

(— C. C. A. —, 166 Fed. 247.)

Arrest — Imprisonment — Liability.

1. The arrest without warrant, by one clothed with the authority of a police officer, of a person found by him in a public place in a state of intoxication and acting in a disorderly manner, is not a false arrest; nor is his detention for the action of the proper police authorities a false imprisonment.

Same — falsity — waiver.

2. One who, upon being arrested for intoxication and disorderly conduct, to secure his release, enters a plea of guilty and waives the reading of the affidavit and the right to be present in court upon trial, waives any claim he may have against the officer who arrested him, for false arrest or imprisonment.

(January 8, 1909.)

Case Note. — Plea of guilty as affecting action for illegal arrest, false imprisonment, or malicious prosecution.

Only a few cases have been found on the question as to the effect a plea of guilty on an action for illegal arrest, false imprisonment, or malicious prosecution; and, although the question, to a great extent at least, seems to depend upon the facts of each particular case, there appears to be some conflict among the cases.

In Jones v. Foster, 43 App. Div. 33, 59 N. Y. Supp. 738, it was held that a plea of guilty to a charge of peddling without a license besides the payments of a fine, though possibly made in preference to staying in jail over night, will effectually bar an action for false imprisonment. The court said: "This action is similar to the cognate one of malicious prosecution; and, if the defendant has been adjudged guilty of the crime, he cannot maintain a civil remedy against those instrumental in securing his conviction as long as the judgment stands unreversed. The theory on which each of these actions is sustainable is that the proceeding out of which the action arose has terminated successfully to the defendant, exonerating him from the charge made. It would be inconsistent to have a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, proving guilt, and a verdict by a jury in a civil action, based upon the assumption of innocence. Had respondent been tried and convicted, the judgment would not be of greater verity than that entered upon a confession of guilt of the crime alleged in the warrant. He was not falsely imprisoned, but the judgment of conviction established that his arrest and detention were justifiable." 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for false arrest and imprisonment. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Lurton, Severens, and Richards, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Cushing & Siddall, for plaintiff in error:

The plea of guilty barred all right to recover damages for false arrest and imprisonment.

Wilkinson v. Howell, 1 Moody & M. 495; Mayer v. Walter, 64 Pa. 283; Welch v. Cheek, 125 N. C. 353, 34 S. E. 531; Langford v. Boston & A. R. Co. 144 Mass. 431, 11 N. E. 697; Sartwell v. Ginn, 24 Ill. App. 65; Leyenberger v. Paul, 40 Ill. App. 516; Bigelow, Torts, 7th ed. § 193;

In Duerr v. Kentucky & I. Bridge & R. Co. (Ky.) 116 S. W. 325, a plea of guilty to a charge of feloniously burning a barn was held to be conclusive evidence of probable cause, and therefore to preclude a recovery for malicious prosecution.

In Lawrence v. Cleary, 88 Wis. 473, 60 N. W. 793, it was held, in an action for malicious prosecution, that a petition which shows on the face that plaintiff pleaded guilty without sufficiently alleging that such plea was procured by defendant's fraud, is fatally defective.

However, a plea of guilty, procured by fraud and conspiracy, implies no consent to a conviction, and is therefore no defense to an action for damages for malicious prosecution. Johnson v. Girdwood, 7 Misc. 651, 28 N. Y. Supp. 151, affirmed without opinion in 143 N. Y. 660, 39 N. E. 21.

In McCullough v. Greenfield, 133 Mich. 463, 62 L.R.A. 906, 95 N. W. 532, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 924, where a person was arrested in one town without a warrant upon the directions of an officer of another town, it was held that the liability of the latter officer for illegal arrest was not waived by the accused pleading guilty of the offense for which the arrest was made. This case was approved in Gold v. Campbell (Tex. Civ. App.) 117 S. W. 463.

In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Parker, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 264, 68 S. W. 831, where two traveling musicians who were sleeping in a box car to escape the rain were, at the instigation of the station agent, unlawfully arrested as "hobos," and committed to jail on the charge of unlawfully riding on a freight train, it was held that a plea of guilty and the payment of a fine, entered on the advice of the county attorney to avoid remaining in jail, the justice being out of Cleveland, 54 Vt. 437.

Mr. E. J. Anderson for defendant in error.

Richards, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Action in tort. The petition averred that the defendant company was a common carrier of passengers; that the plaintiff, while a passenger upon one of its cars in a train standing in its station at Cleveland, Ohio, was assaulted and beaten by one of its employees, a certain special railway detective, and violently ejected from said car with great force, by which he sustained injuries, etc. A second cause of action was in these words: "Plaintiff, for his second cause of action, incorporates above first cause of action as fully as if same were herein rewritten, and further says that the defendant company did, on said 1st day of July, and at said Erie depot, by said employee, unlawfully, maliciously, and without any reasonable or probable cause, arrest plaintiff, and with force and violence, and against the will of plaintiff, unlawfully place plaintiff in a patrol wagon, and cause plaintiff to be carried to the city prison of said city of Cleveland, where plaintiff was unlawfully and against the will of plaintiff imprisoned and detained, from whence he was discharged."

town, would not bar an action against the railroad company for damages for false imprisonment. The court said: "This action is for damages for illegally confining plaintiff in a car, for illegally causing him to be arrested without a warrant, and confining him in jail without carrying him before a magistrate. There is no evidence tending to show that any complaint or information was ever filed against him for any offense, nor that any warrant was ever issued for his arrest. None had been issued at the time of the illegal arrest. No presumption arises that any was ever issued, and giving to the judgment all the effect to which it is entitled, it does not relieve the defendant from the consequences of the illegal acts prior to its rendition. Upon the plea of guilty being entered, plain-

20 T. R. A. (N.S.)

The amended answer was as follows:

"The defendant, Erie Railroad Company, for its amended answer to the plaintiff's petition, says that it admits that at the time stated in plaintiff's petition it was a common carrier operating a railroad between the cities of Cleveland, Cuyahoga county, Ohio, and Youngstown, Ohio, and was a carrier of passengers for hire.

"This defendant further admits that, on the 1st day of July, 1906, plaintiff was ejected from one of its trains at the passenger station of this defendant, in the city of Cleveland, but avers that he was so ejected because he was intoxicated and disorderly and was disturbing other passengers upon said train.

"Defendant also avers that plaintiff was thereupon arrested by a policeman duly appointed and commissioned to act as such for defendant and upon the premises of its railroad, and by him turned over to police officers of the city of Cleveland on the charge of intoxication, and by them taken to the station house of said city, where he was detained for a short time upon said charge; and then, plaintiff having become quieter and promising to make no further trouble, and having, in writing signed by him and duly filed, waived the reading of affidavit in the proceeding against him and the right to be personally present in the police court of said city in said proceeding, and entering a plea of guilty to said charge, and throwing himself upon the mercy of the court, he was suffered to and did go at large, a short time after his arrival at such station house, at his own desire, and with plaintiff's assent, and his said waiver and plea of guilty were duly entered upon the journal and docket of said court, and upon the calling of the proceeding against him in said court and entry discharging him was duly made by said court.

tiff was discharged and no damages accrued thereafter, nor was any awarded to plaintiff subsequent thereto. Plaintiff was entitled to recover the damages that accrued up to the time the plea of guilty was entered, and the judgment was no bar to such recovery."

For cases on effect on presumption of probable cause for prosecution, of fact that conviction was procured by fraud, or perjury, or other undue means, see case note to Carpenter v. Sibley, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1143.

Verdict of guilty set aside or reversed, and followed by acquittal or a nolle prosequi, as evidence of probable cause, see case note to Macdonald v. Schroeder, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 701.

"This defendant, further answering, denies each and every allegation in plaintiff's petition contained, not hereinbefore specifically admitted, and avers that the said ejection and arrest of said plaintiff were made without force other than was reasonably necessary to effect the same."

There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. The errors assigned relate only to the second cause of action.

Reicherd was originally arrested under the accusation of being found on one of the company's passenger cars in its station at Cleveland, Ohio, in a state of intoxication and disorderly, by a special police officer in the employment of the railway company. He was removed from the car in which he was so found, and detained in the company's station until a police officer of the city could be called, by whom he was taken to the central police station and there detained for examination. In the course of an hour the accused promised to behave, and, upon signing a stipulation, was discharged and allowed to resume his journey. This stipulation was according to the usual practice in petty misdemeanors, and was in these words:

State of Ohio, Cuyahoga County—ss.

In the Police Court of the City of Cleveland.
The City of Cleveland, v. George Reicherd.
Waiver.

Cleveland, O., July 1, 1906.

I hereby waive the reading of the affidavit in the above-entitled action, waive the right to be personally present in the police court of said city, upon my trial enter a plea of guilty to the charge of intoxication, and throw myself upon the mercy of the court.

George Reicherd.

Witness: A. Walker, Lieut.

At a session of the police court the following morning the case was disposed of by an entry covering this and other cases where like waivers had been signed, in these words:

"Monday, July 2, 1906. George Reicherd. Intoxication. Waiver filed. Plea of guilty entered in each case [referring to other persons in similar situations, whose names are also set out], and defendants are discharged."

Under these undisputed facts, we think the second cause of action was not made out, and that the court erred in not so instructing the jury. An arrest without a warrant, by one clothed with the authority of a police officer, of one found by him in a public place in a state of intoxication, or acting in a disorderly manner, and his detention for the action of the proper police authorities, is not 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) a false arrest, nor his detention a false imprisonment. Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. p. 307.

Being found in a state of intoxication is a statutory misdemeanor in Ohio. Rev. Stat. §§ 6,940, 6,795. The employee of the railway company who made the arrest, and who removed Reicherd from the car in which he was found, was a regularly qualified and commissioned police officer, clothed with all the authority and powers "of policemen of cities of the first class," when directly in the discharge of his duties for the railway company upon its premises. Ohio Rev. Stat. §§ 3427, 3428, 3429. The city of Cleveland is a city of the first class, and its police court has jurisdiction of misdemeanors committed within its limits and within 4 miles thereof. Ohio Rev. Stat. § 1785; Act January 22, 1904 (97 Ohio Laws, p. 7). The powers of its police court are those incident to courts of common pleas so far as necessary to exercise its jurisdiction. Ohio Rev. Stat. § 1791. And it may make rules of practice. Ohio Rev. Stat. §§ 1794, 1795. One arrested upon an accusation of misdemeanor within its jurisdiction may, in writing, admit his guilt and be tried by the court without a jury, and in his absence, upon such plea of guilty. Ohio Rev. Stat. § 7301. His arrest without a warrant was authorized, if he was in fact found either disorderly or in a state of intoxication by the special officer who made the arrest. Section 7129, Revised Statutes of Ohio, provides expressly that any sheriff, constable, watchman, or public officer "shall arrest and detain any person found violating any law of this state, or any legal ordinance of a city or village, until a legal warrant can be obtained."

But, if we assume that there was evidence upon which Reicherd might have gone to the jury upon the question as to whether he was arrested upon a view of the special officer, or whether in point of fact he was either intoxicated or disorderly, or that the arrest was made without probable cause to believe that he was at the time of arrest either intoxicated or disorderly, the plaintiff, by his voluntary waiver of a warrant, and his voluntary plea of guilty, thereby waived any right to deny the legality of his arrest or detention. So are the weight of the authorities and the clear preponderance of reason. 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 910; Billington v. Hoverman, 18 Ohio C. C. 637; Williamson v. Wilcox, 63 Miss. 335; Howe Mach. Co. v. Lincoln, 24 Kan. 123; Junction City v. Keffe, 40 Kan. 275, 19 Pac. 735; Williams v. Shillaber, 153 Mass. 541, 27 N. E. 767; Saunders v. Galaher, 2 Humph. 445; Ilsley v. Harris, 10 Wis. 96; Maxwell v. Deens, 46 Mich. 35, 8

N. W. 561. That Reicherd's plea of guilty would be a complete defense to an action for malicious prosecution is clear. Such a termination of the prosecution would establish conclusively that the prosecution was upon probable cause, and probable cause is an answer to a suit for malicious prosecution. Wheeler v. Nesbitt, 24 How. 544, 16 L. ed. 765; Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 187, 195, 25 L. ed. 116, 119; Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. v. Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. Co. 120 U. S. 141, 30 L. ed. 614, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 472. A termination of a prosecution by not. pros. by consent of the defendant, or by a compromise, is such a termination as to leave no foundation for denying that there was probable cause. Wilkinson v. Howell, 1 Moody & M. 495; Mayer v. Walter, 64 Pa. 283; Welch v. Cheek, 125 N. C. 353, 34 S. E. 531; Langford v. Boston & A. R. Co. 144 Mass. 431, 11 N. E. 697; Atwood v. Beirne, 73 Hun, 547, 26 N. Y. Supp. 149; Jones v. Foster, 43 App. Div. 33, 59 N. Y. Supp. 738; Williamson v. Wilcox, 63 Miss. 335; Billington v. Hoverman, 18 Ohio C. C. 637. While there are material differences between actions for illegal arrest and actions for false imprisonment or malicious prosecutions, yet in most important respects the actions are cognate.

Take the case at bar. Reicherd was arrested upon an accusation of being intoxicated. The arrest was made without a warrant, but by one having the power and authority of a police officer, and therefore the right to arrest and detain one found by him in a state of intoxication until a warrant could be obtained. Now, this arrest was plainly lawful, although without a warrant, if he was found by the special officer in a state of intoxication. Whatever the offense of Reicherd, if any, it was one in view of the officer who made the arrest. When, therefore, he waived the production of an affidavit which might have been made after the arrest, and pleaded guilty to the accusation upon which he was arrested, that waiver and plea destroyed the very foundation of any action for illegal arrest, whether the arrest was for a past offense without a warrant, or without probable cause to believe him in a present state of intoxication. In this respect the principles applicable to this case are those applicable to a case of malicious prosecution. Sound principles of public policy are opposed to sustaining a suit which is inconsistent with the voluntary action of the plaintiff in waiving an affidavit, as well as evidence of the truth of the accusation by a plea of guilty, thereby shutting out evidence which might have established the lawfulness of the arrest.

upon either one of the causes of action there was no liability, the judgment was erroneous. We say nothing as to the first cause of action, as no assignments of error have been made.

Judgment reversed, and new trial awarded.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

G. H. LOGAN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
HATTIE A. BROWN.

(— Okla. —, 95 Pac. 441.)

Statute of limitations — fraud — to whom applicable.

1. The statutory limitation of the time within which "an action for relief on the ground of fraud" must be commenced only applies when the party against whom the bar of the statute is interposed is required to allege fraud in pleading his cause of action, or to prove fraud to entitle him to relief.

Trust — parol promise — accounting.

2. A petition for an accounting for the proceeds of the sale of certain real estate, title to which was placed in defendant un-

Headnotes by DUNN, J.

Case Note. — Parol agreement to take title to real property, sell the same, and account for the proceeds, as affected by the statute of frauds.

Many of the cases considering this question are so elaborately commented on in LOGAN v. BROWN as to render it unnecessary to set them out in this note. It is not intended to include cases where, as a part of the consideration for real estate, the grantee agrees, in the event of the sale within a prescribed period of time, to give the vendor a portion of the proceeds. Such cases are gathered in a note appended to Allen v. Rees, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1137.

Courts of equity are loathe to assist a grantee to commit a fraud on his grantor by using either the statute of frauds or the statute of uses and trusts as a means to that end. While due effect is given to such statutes, many exceptions thereto have been created by equity to prevent fraud, either actual or constructive. These exceptions generally fall within two lines of cases. One, and the first to be considered herein, is where land was conveyed by a deed absolute in its terms, in reliance upon a promise to convey and account for the proceeds to the grantor. Upon a sale by the grantee, the proceeds will be impressed with a trust in favor of the grantor.

This doctrine is well stated in Bork v. Martin, 132 N. Y. 280, 28 Am. St. Rep. 570, 30 N. E. 584, where land was conveyed to a third person by the legal owner, at the request of the equitable owner, under a parol der a verbal promise for this purpose, is not vulnerable on demurrer on the ground that a parol trust in real estate is declared on.

Same.—sale of property.

3. One who takes title to real property under a parol agreement to sell the same as an agent, and sells it and receives the money therefor, is liable to the grantor for the proceeds.

Fraud — statutes — executed contract.

4. The provisions of the statute of frauds, or of uses and trusts, have no application where the agreement has been completely performed as to the part thereof which comes within the statute, and the part remaining to be performed is merely a payment of the money, the promise to do which is not required to be in writing.

Appeal — reference — harmless error.

5. Where, in a suit, defendant denies any liability to plaintiff and any foundation for the suit, but agrees for a reference of the same for trial before a referee, it is not error for the court, in its order, to state, "it appearing to the court that this is a case involving an accounting," etc., in the absence of any evidence that the referee was influenced in his findings thereby.

Same — oath of referee.

6. Where a record is silent upon the question of a referee having taken an oath as required by law, the presumption will be indulged that such oath was taken; and, even though omitted it will be held an irregularity only, and waived by a party who proceeds to trial without objection on this point.

(Williams, Ch. J., and Kane, J., dissent.)

agreement to sell it for the benefit of the equitable owner, which was void under the statute of frauds because creating an express trust by parol. It was said that it was lawful for the grantee to perform the trust, and, upon disposing of the land, he was no longer protected by the statute of frauds as to the proceeds of the sale; that as to the proceeds, he was a trustee of personal property realized for the equitable owner's benefit by virtue of an agency for such owner, which he had so far performed, pursuant to the owner's instructions and his own agreement, as to obtain the money his agency was constituted to produce. The court said that equity approved his performance so far as he had performed; and, as the statutes referred to no longer applied, there was no law which he could invoke to shield him from the full performance of his duty.

And parol evidence is competent to show that a deed absolute on its face was to secure an indebtedness to the grantee, and that there was also a parol arrangement that lands conveyed thereby should be sold, and the balance over and above such indebtedness should be returned to the grantor; it appearing that the lands had been sold and a surplus over and above the indebtedness received. Spencer v. Richmond, 46 App. Div. 481, 61 N. Y. Supp. 397.

So, where a transfer of land by a deed absolute in form is made better to enable the grantee to sell the same as the agent of the grantor, parol evidence to establish such purpose is not within the statute of frauds where there has been a part performance by a sale of the property by the grantee. Collins v. Tillou, 26 Conn. 368, 68 Am. Dec. 398.

While a trust based on a parol agreement by the grantee, a creditor of the grantor, in a deed absolute on its face, that he would manage and sell the property conveyed thereby and hold the proceeds over and above the amount due him, and certain other claims, is unenforceable against the land itself in the hands of the grantee, because of the statute of frauds, yet the proceeds from the 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sale of the land, in his hands, under this arrangement, are impressed with a trust in favor of the grantor, enforceable in equity, unaffected by any original illegality. Bechtel v. Ammon, 199 Pa. 81, 48 Atl. 873.

And, where lands are conveyed under a parol trust to sell and convert into money and divide the proceeds, and the trust has been so far executed by the trustee as to sell the land and receive the money, and has been recognized by him, an action for money had and received will lie for the money, by the person entitled thereto. Collar v. Collar, 86 Mich. 507, 13 L.R.A. 621, 49 N. W. 551.

To the same effect, also, is Collar v. Collar, 75 Mich. 414, 4 L.R.A. 491, 42 N. W. 847.

An agreement by a grantee, made long after the conveyance to him, that he would dispose of the land received thereunder and retain the proceeds for the use and benefit of the original grantor, upon sale of the property, creates a trust relating to personal estate, and is therefore valid, as such a trust may be created by parol. Thomas v. Merry, 113 Ind. 83, 15 N. E. 244.

So where, as a part of the transaction by which the land was deeded by a deed absolute in its terms, the grantee was to execute a written agreement to dispose of the land and account to the grantor for the proceeds over and above his claim against the land, equity, regarding that as done which ought to be done, will treat the written agreement as executed, and will enforce it out of the proceeds of the sale. Such agreement is, therefore, not within the statute of frauds. Hacker's Estate, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 586. In the foregoing case, Penrose, Judge, in concurring therein, gave as an additional reason for sustaining the promise of the grantee, that such agreement was an equitable assignment, and the proceeds were unquestionably personal property, and hence an agreement with relation to them was not affected by the statute of frauds; and added that an agreement as to a fund to come into existence will, when it does come, be enforced as an equitable assignment.

But in Cameron v. Nelson, 57 Neb. 381,

ERROR to the District Court for Kingfisher County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to compel defendant to render an accounting of moneys alleged to have been received by him as trustee in the management of plaintiff's property. Affirmed.

Statement by Dunn, J.:

On June 24, 1901, Hattie A. Brown, who will hereafter be denominated "plaintiff," filed her petition in the district court of Kingfisher county against G. H. Logan, who will hereafter be denominated "defendant," in which she alleged that she was a widow sixty-five years of age, and sister-in-law to defendant, and that, on the 9th day of December, 1896, and for many months prior and subsequent thereto, was sick and infirm in body and mind, and unable both mentally and bodily to attend to her ordinary business affairs. That, on said date, defendant persuaded her to turn over to him her property and the management of her business and financial affairs, assuring her "that if she would do so he would handle and manage the same, and render her a strict account, and to turn over to her all rents and moneys that he could realize from her property;" and that she, trusting and confiding in him, made him her confidential and trusted agent for the purposes mentioned, and that the relations aforesaid between the plaintiff and defendant, and on the terms and conditions aforesaid, began between them on the 9th day of December, 1896, and continued until 77 N. W. 771, it was held that an absolute deed of land could not be affected by proof of a parol contemporaneous agreement that only a beneficial interest in one half of the land conveyed would pass to the grantee, and that he would be a trustee for the grantor for the other half, and would sell it as his agent, whereupon he would promptly turn over the proceeds of the one half less the encumbrances on the property, although the land had actually been disposed of, and an amount been derived therefrom over and above the encumbrance, one half of which the grantor sought to reach. In reaching this conclusion the court distinguished between an attempt to enforce an oral promise without establishing any interest in the land, and one where the right to recover depended upon the establishment of an interest in land. In the former case it was said that the statute did not apply, while the latter was an attempt to raise an oral trust, and must fail. And it was said that, if it had appeared that the conveyance in question was absolute, and the grantee merely promised, as part of the consideration, that, in case of a sale, he would pay the grantor a portion of the proceeds, it could not be said that there was any attempt to create a trust in the land. The conclusion of the court was in part influenced by a difference in the language between the statute of frauds in Nebraska and the statute of Charles the Second. The Nebraska statute is said to have been intended to extend the application of the statute of frauds beyond that of the English statute, which was aimed against technical trusts in land, while the Nebraska statute applied not only to trusts in land, but to all trusts concerning land or in any manner relating thereto.

And a parol agreement by a grantee in a deed of land, absolute on its face, that he would hold the land and sell it for the benefit of the grantor, is within the statute of frauds, and void where neither fraud nor deceit is claimed, although the trust has been partly performed by a sale of the property by the grantor, and the action is to reach the proceeds in his hands. Marvel v. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Marvel, 70 Neb. 498, 113 Am. St. Rep. 792, 97 N. W. 640.

To the same effect is Benson v. Dempster, 183 Ill. 297, 55 N. E. 651, as to a deed absolute on its face, but intended to secure payment of a debt due the grantee, who orally agreed to dispose of the lands conveyed thereby, and account to the grantor for the proceeds over and above the amount owing him.

So, a parol agreement by the grantee in a deed without conditions, that he will convert the property into money, and, after reimbursing himself for money advanced, pay the balance of the proceeds to the grantor's daughter, is an attempt to establish an express trust in land by parol, and is therefore void under the statute of frauds, although the grantee has actually disposed of the land. McGinness v. Barton, 71 Iowa, 644, 33 N. W. 152.

It is important to note, however, that the preceding cases holding such a promise invalid and unenforceable, even though the property has been sold and the action is to reach the proceeds, do not consider the question from the point of view of Bork v. Martin, supra; but, without apparently considering that question, the same rule is applied as would be were the property still in the hands of the grantee and the action one to impress it with the trust, rather than to impress the proceeds with a trust.

Wolford v. Farnham, 44 Minn. 159, 46 N. W. 295, goes to the extreme of holding that, even though the grantee in such a deed in good faith attempts to carry out the trust by disposing of the property and investing the proceeds in property for the benefit of the original grantor as against the creditors of the grantee, the trust is invalid because resting in parol; and he cannot thus carry it out where it appears that, after receiving the proceeds from the property impressed with the original trust, he deposited the same in a bank to his credit until making the investment in question.

In another class of cases a constructive trust is raised from the actual or constructive fraud of the grantor in inducing or accepting the transfer in reliance upon his on or about the 1st day of January, 1900. That, on January 2, 1897, she executed a deed to the defendant for lots Nos. 21, 22, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, and 32, in block 39, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma territory; and that between the 9th day of December, 1896, and the 1st day of January, 1900, the defendant collected rents from the premises mentioned in the sum of about $1,200. That, in addition thereto, he collected a judgment in the sum of about $500 owned by plaintiff. That, on October 4, 1898, he received from Pearl E. Stafford the sum of $2,500 for lots Nos. 29, 30, 31, and 32, in block 39, Oklahoma City. That, on the 18th day of April, 1899, he received from A. J. Burnham the sum of $1,250 for lots Nos. 21 and 22 in block No. 39, Oklahoma City. That, on July 17, 1899, he received from Virginia R. Allen the sum of $1,200 for lots Nos. 27 and 28 in block No. 39, in said Oklahoma City. That, during the time the relation above mentioned existed, the defendant had received the moneys of plaintiff from rents, collection of judgment aforesaid, and sales of real estate mentioned, to about the sum of $7,650; averring that she was unable to give the exact amount by reason of the fact that he refused to give her any account thereof. "That, on and since the 1st day of January, 1900, the plaintiff has repeatedly asked and demanded of the defendant that he render to her a full and correct account of all her business handled by the defendant as aforesaid, and asked and demanded of him that he turn over to her all moneys held by him promise to sell for the benefit of the grantor that he does not fulfil. These cases recognize a distinction between contradicting a deed, or impairing its legal operation, and raising out of the transaction an equity dehors the deed, binding the grantee's conscience to hold the land for the real purpose of the conveyance, and not according to its legal operation, when the latter use of it would, under the circumstances, work a fraud. Such an equity is independent of the deed, and not excluded by it as a mere conveyance of the legal estate. It may be established by parol, not as contradicting the terms of the deed, but as explanatory of the transactions creating the trust or equity.

This is the doctrine of the English cases, although in Leman v. Whitley, 4 Russ. Ch. 423, it was held that an unconditional conveyance of real estate by a son to his father, nominally the purchaser, could not be shown by parol to have been made upon an oral agreement by the father, or his solicitor, to negotiate a loan thereon for the benefit of the son, as such evidence, in the absence of fraud or misapprehension as to the effect of the instrument, came within the statute of frauds against creating an express trust in realty by parol. In disposing of the case, the master of the rolls, Sir John Leach, treated it as one wherein was involved no pretense of fraud or misapprehension, apparently regarding the mere failure to carry out the oral promise as not amounting to a fraud. The soundness of this decision was questioned by Lord St. Leonards, in his treatise on Vendors and Purchasers (Sugden), 14th ed. § 702. It was expressly overruled in Re Marlborough [1894] 2 Ch. 133, on the authority of Haigh v. Kaye, L. R. 7 Ch. 469. In the Marlborough Case the doctrine was enunciated that the statute of frauds would not prevent the establishing of a trust in realty by parol, where it would amount to a fraud on the grantor in an absolute conveyance of realty not to do so. In this case the Duchess of Marlborough conveyed to the Duke, her husband, certain real estate to enable him to mortgage it to pay certain of his debts, he agreeing to reconvey to her, subject to the mortgage. The Duke died without having made the reconveyance, and, in holding him to be a trustee of such property for his wife, the Duchess, the foregoing doctrine was enunciated.

So, the violation by the grantee, the wife of the grantor, of her promise to mortgage property conveyed to her by absolute deed for the benefit of the grantor, and to reconvey it to their children, is constructively fraudulent, and gives rise to a constructive trust which may be established by parol, where, without consideration, the grantee obtained from the grantor the deed by means of such promises. Pollard v. McKenney, 69 Neb. 742, 96 N. W. 679, 101 N. W. 9.

A transaction of the character of the foregoing involves more than a mere breach of contract. There is also involved the element of confidence reposed by the grantor in one upon whom he had a right to rely, and a betrayal of such confidence. This is sufficient to raise a constructive trust which may be established by parol, as it does not fall within the provision of the statute of frauds. Ibid.

In Texas it is uniformly held that a parol express trust is raised, enforceable in equity, where a grantor is induced to execute a conveyance of land, absolute on its face, in reliance upon a parol agreement by the grantee to dispose of the land for the benefit of the grantor. No statute of frauds, however, is in effect which resembles the 7th section of original statute of frauds (Stat. 29 Car. II. chap. 3). Diffie v. Thompson (Tex. Civ. App.) 90 S. W. 193; Clark v. Haney, 62 Tex. 514, 50 Am. Rep. 536; Lott v. Kaiser, 61 Tex. 672.

The doctrine that, where a grantee receives land by deed absolute in its terms, under a parol agreement to sell and account for the proceeds to the grantor or a third person designated by the grantor, his refusal to perform his promise amounts to a constructive fraud, and he will be held to be a trustee for the grantor or such third person, and the trust will not be within the statute, is not generally recognized in this country, unless it also appear that the

as the proceeds of said collections of money had and received by the defendant in the capacity aforesaid, all of which the defendant refuses and neglects to do." That, since being vested with the authority and the property of plaintiff as aforesaid, the defendant has in no manner accounted to her for money received by him, except the sum of about $1,450, the exact amount being unknown to plaintiff, by reason of the fact that defendant refuses to inform her thereof, which sum was used in payment of mortgage indebtedness on her property, and except the further sum of $1,400 that the defendant has paid to her in money. "This plaintiff now avers to the court that the defendant caused her to turn over to him her business affairs as aforesaid, for no other reason than that of cheating and defrauding her out of her property, money, and effects; and that, in procuring this plaintiff to so trust him as herein stated, the plaintiff in her weak and sick condition was misled by the defendant, and led to believe that he was her friend, and would be her confidential adviser, and would aid her in all possible ways to conduct her business affairs in a careful and economic manner. That, as soon as the defendant obtained possession of her said property and business affairs aforesaid, the defendant at once began to treat the plaintiff in a harsh manner, and, when the plaintiff would seek to advise with the defendant about her business matters, the defendant would at once fly into a rage and abuse the plaintiff and inform her that it was none of her business what he was doing with her property or what he was doing with her business affairs, and for her to keep her mouth shut and let him alone,—that he would neither advise with her as to said business matters, nor allow her to ask him promise of the grantee was made by him to induce a conveyance, and with the intention on his part, at the time, not to perform it. The mere subsequent breach of this promise is of itself insufficient to raise the trust. This statement finds support in the following cases, in none of which, however, was it claimed that the agreement was made upon the part of the grantee for the purpose of inducing the conveyance, with an existing intention on his part not to perform the promise:

Thus Kinsey v. Bennett, 37 S. C. 319, 15 S. E. 965, held that a trust in relation to land could not be created or established, except by some writing; and hence a trust in land could not be established by a parol agreement by a grantee, in a deed absolute on its face, who also held a mortgage on the property conveyed by the deed, that he would dispose of the land, and, after deducting the amount of the mortgage, would account to the grantor for the balance. In so holding attention was directed to the fact that there was no allegation of any fraud in obtaining the deed, the only fraud being in the manner in which the alleged trust was discharged; and the court said that until the trust was established it would be irrelevant to inquire into the manner in which it had been discharged (bill to enforce trust in land).

So, an agreement by a grantee, in a deed absolute in its terms, that he would dispose of the land conveyed thereby, and pay the proceeds of the sale to certain legatees in a will executed by the grantor contemporaneously with the deed, is an attempt to create a parol express trust in the land, and is therefore within the statute of frauds and void, and cannot be enforced by compelling the grantee to sell the lands and apply the proceeds as agreed. Adams v. Adams, 79 Ill. 517. In this case, however, the court said that the conveyance was made to the grantee without solicitation on his part; and no undue influence, imposition, or fraud was used. No claim was made that the facts gave rise to a constructive trust (action to enforce the trust in the property which still remained in the possession of the grantee).

Neither can a conveyance of land by a debtor to a creditor, by a deed absolute on its face, be affected by proof of an oral agreement by the grantee therein that he would sell the land conveyed thereby, and, after paying himself, apportion the proceeds among certain other creditors, as such agreement is in the nature of an express trust, which cannot be established by parol. Byers v. McEniry, 117 Iowa, 499, 91 N. W. 797 (bill to enforce trust in land in possession of grantee).

A trust in lands for the benefit of a third person cannot be created by a parol agreement by a grantee in an unconditional deed to dispose of the land and pay a part of the proceeds to designated persons, including such third person. Pearson v. Pearson, 125 Ind. 341, 25 N. E. 342 (bill to compel sale of real estate still held by grantee).

To the same effect, where land had been sold by the grantee, is Irwin v. Ivers, 7 Ind. 308, 63 Am. Dec. 420. The foregoing case and the Pearson Case are based on the theory that there was no consideration paid by the third person to whom the conveyance was made; and the rule is applied that a party who has not parted with anything of value cannot be permitted to prove by parol that a purchase of land was made for his benefit or on his account.

An absolute and unconditional deed cannot be assailed by parol evidence that the purpose of the deed was to enable the grantee to mortgage the property for the benefit of the grantor, and which he agreed to do, where such agreement is denied by the grantee; since it is an attempt to create an express trust in land by parol. Walker v. Brungard, 13 Smedes & M. 723. In the foregoing case the land had been subsequently conveyed by the grantor, and it was sought to set aside the original deed or reach the proceeds of the subsequent sale.

about same." She then prayed the court to take an account of all the transactions had and done between herself and the defendant, and to compel him to render a full and complete account of all his doings in the matter set forth, and that she take judgment against him for such sums of money as the court finds are due her.

To this petition the defendant filed a demurrer, which was overruled by the court, and to which ruling an exception was saved. He thereafter filed an answer in two counts, the first being a general denial, and the second alleging that the transfer of the real property by plaintiff to defendant was a bona fide transaction between them, and that he paid her a reasonable and fair price for the lots; that the same was true in reference to the assignment of judgment which he purchased at the same time. He further denied that he was in any way indebted to the plaintiff, or that he ever held any of her property as alleged by her.

On March 2, 1903, the court made an order based upon a written stipulation signed by the attorneys of the parties, referring the case to A. H. Huston to try on both law and fact. The reply, which was a general denial under the terms of the stipulation, was filed with the referee.

Thereafter, and in July, 1903, both parties appeared personally and by counsel, at the office of said referee, in the city of Guthrie, Logan county, territory of Oklahoma, and submitted their evidence, consisting of the testimony of themselves and one witness delivered orally, certain documentary evidence, and deposition of witnesses taken on both sides. On this evidence the referee made his findings, the salient and controlling portions of which are as follows:

"That, in the year 1896 and prior thereto, plaintiff was the owner of several parcels of real estate in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma county, Oklahoma territory, included in which were lots one (1) and two (2) in block forty (40), and lots twenty-one (21), twenty-two (22), twenty-seven (27), twenty-eight (28), twenty-nine (29), thirty (30), thirty-one (31), and thirty-two (32), in block thirty-nine (39).

"That the defendant is now, and was at all times mentioned in the pleadings, a brother-in-law of the plaintiff.

"That in the year 1896 the plaintiff, who was then an old lady of about sixty years of age, had become embarrassed with debt and worried over financial matters.

"I find from the evidence, and also from the appearance and demeanor of the plaintiff at the time of the trial, that she was in ill health, exceedingly nervous, and not capable of fairly and intelligently attending to the details of business transactions, and that 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

such condition had existed during all the times mentioned and referred to in the pleadings and evidence in said case.

"That, on the 2d day of January, 1897, the plaintiff conveyed to the defendant said lots 21, 22, 23, 28, 29, 30, 31, and 32 in said block 39, Oklahoma City, and that the consideration expressed in the deed was $1,500, and that said premises were then of the value of $3,000, but that the real purpose of said conveyance was to give the defendant control and management of the said property of the plaintiff in trust for her.

"That, on the said 2d day of January, 1897, the plaintiff also assigned to the defendant a certain judgment which she had obtained in the district court of Oklahoma county against E. T. Wood and W. J. Wood. That this judgment was obtained upon a certain note, but that the lower court refused to decree the foreclosure of the mortgage securing the same; that plaintiff appealed to the supreme court of the territory, and that in the month of September, 1896, the supreme court handed down a decision reversing the lower court and ordered a decree of foreclosure; and it is found, that at the time of the assignment of said judgment the same was worth the sum of $500; and it is further found that said assignment was made by the plaintiff for the purpose of giving to the defendant the control and management of the same, and to collect the same and hold the proceeds in trust for her.

"That the plaintiff is entitled to an accounting with the defendant, and that in such accounting the defendant should be charged as follows:

To proceeds of sale of lots 29, 30, 31, and 32, block 39	$2,000 00
To proceeds of sale of lots 21 and 22, block 39	1,250 00
To proceeds of sale of lots 27 and 28, block 39	1,200 00
To sum collected from rents and Wood judgment	936 88
Total	$5,386 88

And the defendant is entitled to credits as follows:

By debts and expenses paid	$1,300 00
By cash paid to plaintiff	1,500 00
By compensation for services rendered	250 00
Total	$3,149 00
To balance	$2,237 88

"I find that the plaintiff first demanded of the defendant a settlement and a payment to her of all moneys in his hands belonging to her on or about the 1st day of January, 1900, and that the defendant refused to comply with such demand, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover interest of and from the defendant on the sum of money in his hands belonging to her from the 1st day of January, 1900."

From the findings of fact the referee concludes: "That the plaintiff is entitled to recover of and from the defendant the sum of $2,237.88, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from the 1st day of January, 1900, and costs of suit."

On returning the report, accompanied by the evidence, to the district court of Kingfisher county, the defendant filed a motion to set aside the report of the referee, setting out numerous grounds therefor; those which are argued and relied upon in the brief being considered in the opinion.

On the 18th day of May, 1904, the court overruled said motion, confirming said report, and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant in the sum of $2,924. Motion for new trial was filed and overruled, and the case is regularly before this court for consideration on appeal.

Messrs. H. H. Howard and P. S. Nagle for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. J. C. Roberts and Roberts & Bowman for defendant in error.

Dunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Under the demurrer filed by the defendant to plaintiff's petition, three propositions are argued: First, that the action herein was one for relief on the ground of fraud, and that the same was not commenced within two years of the discovery; second, that, "inasmuch as it concerns an interest in land, and is in parol, it is void by the statute of frauds, and, appearing as it does on the face of the bill, the defense of the statute of frauds may be taken advantage of on demurrer;" and, third, under the allegations of the petition, defendant was constituted trustee of an express trust, and "that no trust in relation to real property is valid unless in writing;" and that, under either or all of these contentions, the petition showed that it did not "state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendant and in favor of plaintiff."

We are unable to agree with defendant that this action is one for relief on the ground of fraud committed by the defendant against the plaintiff, and from which fraud she is seeking relief. The allegations of the petition in reference to the fraud are more in the nature of inducement and explanation than a statement of the grounds upon which she relied to recover. These are set forth to show the relationship existing between the parties, and the conditions under which she claims the contract was made, rather than a statement of the gist of her action. She alleges that the property which defendant secured from her produced a certain amount of money, that he received this money in the capacity of her agent, and that, having so received it, he was indebted to her in this sum, and then asked in her prayer for an accounting between them. She would be just as much entitled to recover without these allegations of the deceit as she is with them. They add nothing to her right to the money received by Logan on the sale of her property. It would be a sad commentary upon the law of our land if it were such that, leaving out all question of confidential relationship or deceit, a man dealing with another could receive from him on a verbal contract a deed to his real property for the purpose of sale and then sell it and appropriate the money, refuse it on demand, and the courts be unable to assist the owner in getting it. Such is not the case, however, for they may do so, and that, too, when there is absolutely no fraud committed. The grantor cannot compel grantee to sell because of the written letter of the statute, but when he does sell and receives the money, the courts will compel him to account for it.

The limitation fixed by the statute for actions of this character comes within the provisions of the 2d subdivision of § 18, art. 3, chap. 66, of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that such a cause of action can only be brought within three years after it shall have accrued, and not under the 3d subdivision, which provides "for relief on the ground of fraud," which can only be brought within two years. The limitation in the subdivision last mentioned is that "the cause of action in such case (fraud) shall not be deemed to have accrued until the discovery of fraud." In our judgment, the petition, even though it were strictly sounding in fraud, and sought damages by reason thereof, would not be barred under its allegations, as it alleges that, "on and since the 1st day of January, 1900, the plaintiff has repeatedly asked and demanded of the defendant that he give to her a full and correct accounting," etc. There does not appear to have been any demand and refusal of accounting prior to this time. The discovery of fraud, if fraud existed, would not be concluded against plaintiff until a demand on her part for an accounting, and the refusal of the defendant, had transpired,

The last sale of property was made July 17, 1899. This action having been begun on June 24, 1901, was within the two-year limitation, even though fraud was relied upon. But this is not an action sounding in fraud. Plaintiff was not required to allege fraud in her pleading, nor to prove fraud to entitle her to relief. In the case of Brown v. Cloud County Bank, 2 Kan. App. 352, 42 Pac. 593, the court held in the syllabus that "the statutory limitation of the time within which 'an action for relief on the ground of fraud' must be commenced only applies when the party against whom the bar of the statute is interposed is required to allege fraud in pleading his cause of action, or to prove fraud to entitle him to relief."

The defendant next contends that the petition fails to state a cause of action for the reason that it was based on a contract for the sale of real property or interest therein, and hence invalid unless in writing. An inspection and reading of the petition fails to disclose whether the agreement plaintiff contends for was in writing or was merely oral, and the rule seems to be that, "if the complaint fails to show whether the contract in suit was verbal or in writing, it will be presumed to have been in writing for all the purposes of the demurrer." Miles v. Thorne, 38 Cal. 335, 99 Am. Dec. 384; Broder v. Conklin, 77 Cal. 330, 19 Pac. 513; 20 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 308, and cases cited. Hence the demurrer cannot be sustained on this ground.

The third proposition raised by the defendant is one most insistently argued and contended for both under the allegations of the demurrer and under the proof offered in the case, and the statute invoked is § 64, art. 4, chap. 65, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. 1903, under the title of "Uses and Trusts," which provides as follows:

"No trust in relation to real property is valid, unless created or declared:

"First: By a written instrument, subscribed by the trustee (trustor) or by his agent thereto authorized by writing.

"Second: By the instrument under which the trustee claims the estate affected; or "Third: By operation of law."

If the petition was good against the demurrer under the statute of frauds, it was also good under the provisions of the statute of uses and trusts. The former statute provides that the contract shall be invalid, and the latter statute provides that no trust in relation to real property is valid unless in writing; but the statute last referred to provides, in addition thereto, "unless created or declared by operation of law." Under this last provision, the courts have exercised very broad discretion in excepting and taking out of the operation of the statute many cases where accident, fraud, or mistake have intervened, and where it would be inequitable to allow the grantee to retain real property, title to which had been procured under a verbal promise. So that the demurrer must of necessity be overruled for the reason that the petition is not vulnerable owing to any of the deficiencies mentioned appearing on its face, as well as appearing that it is not a suit to enforce an unwritten trust in relation to real property.

The provisions of the two statutes last mentioned are again invoked by the defendant under the findings of the referee and are insistently argued and relied upon for a reversal; hence it becomes necessary to discuss them and the authorities cited in connection therewith. He assumes that this case is within the restricting provisions of the statute of frauds and the statute of uses and trusts, and that appellee cannot recover herein because the contract as shown by evidence was not reduced to writing; that it involved a trust for an interest in real estate and was void; and that the deed and conveyance made by Mrs. Brown to defendant, by reason of these facts, was absolute and valid. In support of this proposition he cites the Kansas case of Gee v. Thraikill, 45 Kan. 173, 25 Pac. 588, and so strenuously insists in his brief and oral argument that the case at bar is controlled by the principles involved in that case that we recite the facts on which it was decided for the purposes of distinguishing it. Thraikill owned some real estate in the town of Harper, Kansas, and conveyed the same in fee to his sister, Mrs. Gee, by a general warranty deed, absolute on its face, with an expressed consideration of $1,500, but with no actual consideration except a parol understanding between them that she would sell or mortgage the property and thereby obtain funds for the grantor, and would convey back to him, whenever he might so desire, any part of the property remaining in her hands. Under this state of facts, the grantee, neither selling nor mortgaging the land, and Thraikill, demanding that she reconvey the same to him, on her refusal brought an action in the district court to obtain title to the property. The court held that the parol trust with respect to the real estate involved was void, and that the deed and conveyance was absolute and valid. The statutes of Kansas relating to frauds and perjuries § 5, Gen. Stat. 1901, p. 674), and to conveyances (§ 8, Gen. Stat. 1901, p. 274), and to trusts and powers (§ 1, Gen. Stat. 1901, p. 1596), all carry with them substantially the same language that is contained in our statute of uses and trusts, which makes invalid any trust relation to real property unless in writing, except it be by operation of law. These Kansas statutes referred to were all cited by Justice Valentine in support of his opinion, and the force given them in the conclusion reached was practically a holding that the trust sought to be created was one in real property which must of necessity be in writing to be valid; and the circumstances surrounding the case were not such as to create a trust by operation of law. Three cases, namely, Morrall v. Waterson, 7 Kan. 199; Knaggs v. Mastin, 9 Kan. 532, and Ingham v. Burnell, 31 Kan. 333, 2 Pac. 804, are cited to support the text of the opinion, but a critical reading of them will readily show that they fail to support it. In neither of them do the controlling facts approach the condition in the Gee v. Thraikill Case, and indeed we question very much whether it were possible to find any Kansas authority to support it. Under the facts of the case, the holding is practically an exception to the rule, as the courts have nearly always granted relief in similar instances. Indeed, this has so universally been done that the supreme court of Wisconsin, in the case of Fairchild v. Rasdall, 9 Wis. 387, says: "It is impossible to reconcile with principle very many of the adjudications upon the statute of frauds. Courts seem to have been so intent upon administering justice in the particular case that they have frequently lost sight of its provision, and their action has often amounted to little less than the exercise of the right to appeal, or suspend its operation whenever they deemed that the real justice of the case required it." Hence the hard and fast rule adopted by the Kansas court in this case makes it virtually an exception among the adjudications. The courts very generally, under the power given them by virtue of the force of the provision, or by operation of law, and other similar clauses, exercise the utmost liberality in extending a helping hand to those who, through fraud, accident, or mistake, or even misdirected confidence, have been deprived of their real estate by virtue of a contract not reduced to writing. Indeed, as was said in the Wisconsin case, "they have been so intent upon administering justice in the particular case" that they have virtually made of it a statute to be followed only when it would not bring about the result of defrauding someone, and to ignore it when such result would follow. "The court will not allow the statute of frauds to be used as an instrument of fraud if it can prevent it." Bork v. Martin, 132 N. Y. 280, 28 Am. St. Rep. 570, 30 N. E. 584. But the facts in the case of Gee v. Thraikill are not similar to the facts in the case at bar. In that case the deed was taken by the grantee under a parol agreement to sell or mortgage and to reconvey any overplus. Grantee refused to do either, and the court held that she could not be compelled to do so. An altogether different condition exists in the case at bar. Here the defendant took the deed to this property for the purpose of selling it, and he did sell it and has the money; and this suit is brought, not to recover any interest in real property, nor to compel a reconveyance, but for the money received by an agent from its sale. If Logan had kept the property, no court could compel him to sell it. Whether he could have been compelled to account for its value or not is not in this case, but practically all of the authorities so hold. "Where lands are conveyed to defendant on his parol agreement to pay a mortgage thereon, sell the land and account to the grantor for the proceeds; and, after getting possession, defendant refuses to perform such agreement,—plaintiff may recover the value of the property, even though the agreement is within the statute of frauds." O'Grady v. O'Grady, 162 Mass. 290, 38 N. E. 196. "If one conveys land to another under an oral agreement which the other refuses to perform and cannot be compelled to perform on account of his setting up the statute of frauds, he who conveyed the land can recover its value from the grantee on the ground that the consideration for the conveyance has failed and he is entitled to be reimbursed." Cromwell v. Norton, 193 Mass. 291, 118 Am. St. Rep. 499, 79 N. E. 433. Also, Peabody v. Fellows, 177 Mass. 290, 58 N. E. 1019.

But we are not to deal with the situation suggested by either proposition above mentioned, but a situation where the grantee, under a parol contract to sell, has actually fulfilled that portion of the contract within the statute of frauds, and nothing remains to be enforced by a court but that part of the contract that never was in the statute and against which it does not operate. 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 832, under the title of "Verbal Agreements," and the subtitle relating to lands, holds: "The statute of frauds has no application where, . . . the agreement has been completely performed as to the part thereof which comes within the provisions of the statute, and the part remaining to be performed is merely the payment of money or the performance of some act the promise to do which is not required to be put in writing." The authorities seem to support this statement. The case of Hays v. Reger, 102 Ind. 524, 1 N. E. 386, was one which involved a parol agreement to convey real property. The trust had been executed and the court said: "The trust having been executed, we need not determine whether it was one arising by implication of law, or whether it was an express trust." So that in the case at bar, the trust having been executed, it is of no consequence whether the agreement between the plaintiff and defendant in reference to the land was a parol agreement, or whether it had been reduced to writing.

The facts in a New York case, Bork v. Martin, supra, are very similar to those in this case. Martin took the naked title to certain lots, agreeing at the time to convey the same upon grantor's request to such purchasers as could be procured, and pay over the purchase money received. He sold the lots and refused to pay the money, just as did Logan in this case. When he was sued, as was Logan, he set up the statute of frauds and of uses and trusts, just as does Logan, and the court, in passing on that case, said: "Assuming that the land was conveyed to the defendant upon an oral trust, invalid under the statutes of frauds and of uses and trusts (2 Rev. Stat. 1st ed. p. 134, § 6; 1 Rev. Stat. 1st ed. p. 728, § 51), yet it was lawful for him to perform it, and he has fully performed it so far as it required him to dispose of the land. The land is all sold, and he has the price of the last five lots in his pocket. The language of the cases is to the effect that he cannot, in good conscience, retain it, and that it belongs to the plaintiff. Robbins v. Robbins, 89 N. Y. 258; Dunn v. Hornbeck, 72 N. Y. 80; Foote v. Bryant, 47 N. Y. 544. Though the statutes might have justified the defendant's refusal to dispose of the land as he had orally agreed, yet, having disposed of it, he has voluntarily emerged from the field of their protection, and exposed himself to the law, which deals with him as a trustee of personal property realized for plaintiff's benefit, by virtue of an agency for the plaintiff, which he has so far performed, pursuant to the plaintiff's instructions and his own agreement as to obtain the moneys his agency was constituted to produce. Equity approves his performance, so far as he has performed, and, as the statutes referred to no longer apply, there is no law which he can invoke to shield him from the full performance of his duty. The court will not allow the statute of frauds to be used as an instrument of fraud if it can prevent it. Cases supra; Ryan v. Dox, 34 N. Y. 307, 90 Am. Dec. 696; Levy v. Brush, 45 N. Y. 596; Simon v. Schurck, 29 N. Y. 598."

A Michigan case, Lasley v. Delano, 139 Mich. 602, 102 N. W. 1063, is one in some respects similar to the case at bar. When the grantor in that case attempted to compel the party taking the grant to account for the moneys realized from the sale of the real property based on a verbal agreement, defendant, as is done in this case, set up the statutes of frauds, and of uses and trusts, and the court, in considering same, speaks as follows: "Neither the statute of frauds, nor that of uses and trusts, applies to this case. The parol contract between complainant and Mr. Delano has been performed, and the parol trust imposed upon him fully executed. No contract for the sale of lands is involved. The relation of vendor and vendee did not exist between them. Complainant concedes his right to sell and receive the money, and that he did sell and receive the money. The relation, then, between them was not other or different than it would have been if she had sold the lands herself and intrusted the money to him, to be disposed of as directed and agreed by her. Petrie v. Torrent, 88 Mich. 43, 49 N. W. 1076; Carr v. Leavitt, 54 Mich. 540, 20 N. W. 576; Edinger v. Heiser, 62 Mich. 598, 29 N. W. 367. If, however, the trust rested in parol, and, while so resting, could not be enforced as an executory contract, yet, when the parol agreement has been executed, neither party can invoke the statute. The courts have repeatedly held that a party may perform a promise which he could not legally be compelled to perform, and that, when so performed, it is binding upon him and the other party to it. Moore v. Crawford, 130 U. S. 122, 32 L. ed. 878, 9 Sup. St. Rep. 447; Desmond v. Myers, 113 Mich. 437, 71 N. W. 877; Collar v. Collar, 86 Mich. 507, 13 L.R.A. 621, 49 N. W. 551; Bork v. Martin, 132 N. Y. 282, 28 Am. St. Rep. 570, 30 N. E. 584; Gwaltney v. Wheeler, 26 Ind. 415."

In a Connecticut case, Collins v. Tillou, 26 Conn. 368, 68 Am. Dec. 398, Collins, owning some property near Chicago, Illinois, made a warranty deed of the land to one John Tillou under a parol agreement that he should act as Collins's general agent in making a sale of the same. The deed recited the consideration as "a valuable sum in dollars, and other considerations received, to our full satisfaction," although there was no actual consideration. After selling the land, Tillou refused to make any accounting to Collins, and subsequently died, and this was a suit by Collins against his estate for the amount of money received for the land. The statute of frauds, and the rule that parol evidence was inadmissible to vary the terms of a valid written instrument, were both invoked, but the court held that there was no force in either objection, and gave judgment to Collins for the amount received, allowing Tillou's estate compensation for the services rendered, just as was done by the referee in the case at bar.

The case of Collar v. Collar, 75 Mich. 414, 4 L.R.A. 491, 42 N. W. 847, was one wherein Hamblin D. Collar, under a parol understanding, received title to certain lands for the purpose of sale and accounting to the grantors. He sold the same, and this action was to compel him to pay the money to those to whom it belonged, the suit being for money had and received, and the court, under the facts stated, directed a verdict for the defendant. The theory presented by the appellant in the case at bar was urged and the supreme court, by Long, J., says: "It was not an interest in the land which plaintiff was seeking to recover, but his proportionate share of the fund growing out of the sale of the land." And the court, in the syllabus, holds "that an action will lie for money had and received by a grantee on the sale of land conveyed to him under a parol trust to make such sale and distribute the proceeds among the grantors."

In the case of Edinger v. Heiser, 62 Mich. 598, 29 N. W. 367, a tract of land was conveyed to Andreas Heiser under a parol agreement that he would sell the same and use the avails as an investment for his support, and, on his death, that the same should go to the grantors. He sold his land for $3,700 to one Vincent Greiff, and refused to make any account to the grantors of the proceeds. The grantors were his children by his first wife. The question of whether or not the children could recover the money paid by Greiff to their father for this land was disposed of by the court in the following words: "It is the same, in my opinion, as if the children had themselves deeded direct to Greiff and received the money into their own hands, and then afterwards placed it in the keeping of their father on the same terms as he now holds it,—to use the interest, but to reserve the principal for them at his death. There is no question but such a trust is valid and enforceable. See Perry, Tr. § 86, and cases cited; Chadwick v. Chadwick, 59 Mich. 87, 26 N. W. 288; Leland v. Collver, 34 Mich. 418; Ellis v. Secor, 31 Mich. 186, 18 Am. St. Rep. 178."

See, also, to the same effect, Bitley v. Bitley, 85 Mich. 227, 48 N. W. 540; Wiseman v. Baylor, 69 Tex. 63, 6 S. W. 743; Desmond v. Myers, supra; Whipple v. Parker, 29 Mich. 369; Karr v. Washburn, 56 Wis. 303, 14 N. W. 189; Bourne v. Sherrill, 143 N. C. 381, 118 Am. St. Rep. 809, 55 S. E. 799.

It will thus be seen from the law as declared in the foregoing authorities that, where one takes title to real property under a parol agreement to hold the same and sell it as an agent for the grantor, after having sold it and received the proceeds, he is liable for the proceeds thereof to the grantor.

The other objections made are now considered. It was contended that it was error for the referee to overrule the objection to the introduction of evidence for the reason that the petition did not state a cause of action. Appellant calls attention to the authorities cited in support of his demurrer to 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the petition, and, as we have dealt with them and held that the petition stated a cause of action, no error was committed by the referee in hearing the evidence thereunder.

The point is then made that the referee erred in proceeding to take an accounting between the parties, and allowing plaintiff to introduce depositions and certified copies of deeds before any testimony was introduced to show a trust; stating: "No testimony could be properly received by the referee in this case until the trust was first established and the fraud of Logan proved as a substantive fact." As the referee was authorized to try the case as a court, the order of proof was a matter clearly within his right to control, and the objection made by the defendant cannot be sustained, as no prejudice was shown by this procedure. Whether the deeds and depositions were introduced prior to the evidence given by the plaintiff and defendant, or subsequent thereto, was practically of no consequence.

The next point made is to the refusal of the referee to allow the defendant to answer the question, "I will ask you if you were not called down there by Mrs. Brown for the reason that he (meaning Riley) was demanding payment?" In view of the fact that this is immediately followed in the record by the statement of the witness, "She wrote for me to come and help her, . . . she wanted me to help her out," this error, if error it was, was not prejudicial, because, if the question to which objection was sustained were answered in the affirmative, it would not have proved more than the affirmative evidence given by the witness on the same point.

It is next contended that the referee erred in sustaining objection to the question asked by the defendant, "Did she at that time call for any statement or account of these lots?" The next question asked by counsel was, "You may state if any conversation was had," and the answer was, "I cannot recall any;" so that here again the evidence asked for was secured under another question, and no error followed.

It is contended that the referee erred in not allowing Logan to introduce in evidence the $1,000 in notes. The plaintiff testified that she never received these notes, and the referee specifically finds "that no notes were delivered to the plaintiff at the time of the conveyance and assignment of judgment referred to, and that the notes offered in evidence were retained by the agent of the defendant, R. C. Brennon." The objection made in the case of their being offered in evidence was that they were incompetent and immaterial, and the referee's ruling was, "The objection is sustained for the present, excepted to by defendant." This ruling is followed in the record by a number of copied notes with the statement thereon, "The following are the notes offered in evidence." The testimony in reference to the notes by witness Brennon and the incorporation of them in the record, and a specific finding upon them by the referee, convinces us that they were afterward admitted in evidence and considered by the referee, and hence there was no error on this point. In view of the fact, however, that the referee finds that no notes were ever delivered to Mrs. Brown, we question whether error would have been committed even though they had been excluded altogether.

The next point made is that the referee erred in not allowing this question to be answered by the defendant: "Did you have any agreement with Mrs. Brown whereby you were to return this property to her?" Objection was urged and sustained. The most that appellant could expect from an answer to the question was a negative, and all that a negative would show in answer to that question was testified to, fully and completely, by defendant when he stated in his examination that he never had any of her property in his name, and that he did not owe Mrs. Brown anything then or at the time of the filing of her suit; and, furthermore, there is no allegation in the petition nor any evidence offered that defendant ever agreed that he was to return the property to her. The question was not within the issues of the case, and there was no error in not allowing it to be answered.

The point is also made that there was no formal or proper reference made in the case. Stipulation was filed by the parties as follows: "That said cause shall be referred, and that the referee shall make findings of fact and report his conclusions of law, and that the issue may be joined after such reference." On this stipulation the court made the following order: "It appearing to the court that this is a case involving an accounting and same should be referred, and both parties consenting thereto, it is ordered that said cause be and hereby is referred to A. H. Huston on law and facts as appeared by stipulation on file." Defendant argued that this reference was prejudicial, because, under the pleadings, it was necessary to find Logan guilty of a fraud before he could be compelled to account. While it is true before any accounting could be had it was necessary to find an indebtedness which was denied, it would not have been necessary to find fraud, and even though it were the entire matter, either of fraud or indebtedness, was before the referee, and we can hardly say, in the absence of any evidence whatever, that he was influenced by the language 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

mentioned to find for the plaintiff and against the defendant. .

The defendant next objects to the consideration of the report of the referee on the ground that he was not sworn, and cites in support thereof Province v. Lovi, 4 Okla. 672, 47 Pac. 476. In that case it appears that an oath was taken by the referee, and it was contended that it was not in the form prescribed by the statute. In the present case the record appears to be silent on the question of whether the referee was sworn, and it is our judgment that in cases of this character the presumption would be upon such a record that the referee took the oath as prescribed by law, as all officers are presumed to do their duty. The failure of a referee to take the oath required by law is a mere irregularity which is waived by the parties proceeding to trial without objection on that ground. Lamaster v. Scofield, 5 Neb. 148; Milwaukee County v. Ehlers, 45 Wis. 281; Newcomb v. Wood, 97 U. S. 581, 24 L. ed. 1085. The referee Huston was agreed upon by the parties, and defendant appeared personally before him in his office in Logan county, outside the judicial district in which the case was pending, and submitted, without objection, his evidence, thereby waiving any irregularity either in the trial of the case at that place or the consideration thereof by the referee at such place, although there is nothing in the record to show that the same was considered and the conclusion arrived at outside of Kingfisher county.

It is next objected that motion of plaintiff to affirm the report of the referee was sustained by the court without reading the testimony in said cause, and this action of the court is urged as error. We know of no authority, and none is cited us by counsel, holding that it is error for a court to sustain the findings of a referee without reading the testimony introduced. Furthermore, the judgment rendered by the court herein contains a specific statement, "Thereupon plaintiff's motion for judgment upon the report of the referee coming on, and all parties being present, after due consideration thereof, the court finds that the acts and conduct of said referee in the trial of said cause are regular and legal in all respects." And, while the recital in the case made contains the statement that the court sustained the report of the referee "without reading the testimony in said cause," this cannot overcome the specific finding of the court in the judgment of due consideration. See Day v. Territory, 2 Okla. 409, 37 Pac. 806; Abel v. Blair, 3 Okla. 399, 41 Pac. 342. In the case last cited the court says in the syllabus: "The records of the court incorporated into a case made cannot be contradicted by other statements contained in the case made."

We see no reason to depart from the holding of this court in the case Re Dossett, 2 Okla. 369, 37 Pac. 1066, hence the objection made by defendant to the jurisdiction of the trial court to render judgment herein on the 18th day of May, 1904, the same being at an adjourned day of the March, 1904, term of the district court of Kingfisher county, and this notwithstanding the fact that between the setting of the said March, 1904, term of said court and the reconvening of the said court in May of the same year, there had been held by the judge of said district one or more regular terms of court therein. Hence there was no merit in the objection urged.

The issues herein have been submitted to a referee, who heard the evidence and made his findings thereon. The district court to which he made report confirmed and approved such finding, and, there appearing no error raised by the appellant in this court, the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FOURTH CIRCUIT.

ATLANTIC COAST LINE RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

GERATY.

(— C. C. A. —, 166 Fed. 10.)

Railroad — refrigerator cars — nonpossession.

1. A railroad company which owns no refrigerator cars may be held liable for not furnishing them to shippers of garden truck, if it led them to expect that, if they raised the truck, the refrigerator cars necessary for its proper transportation would be furnished.

Same — unusual crop.

2. A railroad company which has obligated itself to furnish refrigerator cars to transport garden truck to market cannot escape liability for breach of that duty upon the ground that the crop was unusually large, if it was no larger than might reasonably have been expected from the acreage planted, knowledge of which the railroad company either had, or had the means of obtaining.

Damages — crop — failure to gather.

3. A railroad company which refuses to supply refrigerator cars for shipping garden truck to market according to its obligation to do so may be liable for the value of truck not gathered and tendered for shipment, where the failure to gather it was for the purpose of avoiding useless expense, and it was to be sold free on board at point of shipment.

(Waddill, District Judge, dissents.)

(November 5, 1908.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for losses alleged to have been caused by defendant's failure to furnish refrigerator cars for the proper transportation of garden truck in violation of its duty to do so. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Pritchard, Circuit Judge, and Morris and Waddill, District Judges.

Mr. W. H. Fitz Simons for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. A. Holman for defendant in error.

Morris, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law brought by the plaintiff, Geraty, against the railroad com-

Case Note. — Duty of carrier to furnish cars of a type not owned by it.

The question whether a carrier may be held liable for failure to furnish a type of car which it does not own is also considered in Mathis v. Southern R. Co. 65 S. C. 271, 61 L.R.A. 824, 43 S. E. 684, where a requested instruction that, if a railroad company simply held itself out to the public as prepared and willing to haul the refrigerator cars of refrigerator transportation companies, when shippers perfected their arrangements with such refrigerator companies, that would not bind the railroad company itself to furnish refrigerator cars, was held to embody an erroneous principle of law. The court said: "Such a rule would enable a railroad company to shift its responsibility as a common carrier on others, which cannot be done. It must transport when the demand is made, unless excused; and it cannot refuse on the ground that others had assumed any part of the duty resting on it as a common carrier."

As to the duty of a carrier to furnish cars, independently of contract, see case note to Di Giorgio Importing & S. S. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 108.

As to duty of carrier with respect to refrigerator cars, see case note to St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Renfro, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 317; also C. C. Taft Co. v. American Exp. Co. 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 614.

As to duty of carrier to furnish car adapted to the subject of the shipment see case note to Forester v. Southern R. Co. 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 508.

pany to recover damages for losses on early cabbages shipped, or intended to be shipped, from a station on the railroad called Meggets, in South Carolina, and destined for places in the West in the month of May, 1905. It is claimed that for proper transportation of the cabbages the only proper cars were refrigerator cars, and that the railroad failed to furnish refrigerator cars, although seasonably notified by the plaintiff; and that in consequence the cabbages which were shipped, being transported in unsuitable cars, became decayed and worthless and were a total loss, and those which were ready to be cut, crated, and shipped on refrigerator cars, the plaintiff being notified by the railroad company that the refrigerator cars would not be furnished, could not be saved, and perished in the fields. The jury returned a verdict of $7,466.96. Upon a motion for a new trial, the learned trial judge held that the verdict was excessive, in that a large part of the damages allowed was for loss on cabbages not actually cut or tendered for shipment, as to which the loss was to a large extent speculative, and directed that, unless all of the verdict in excess of $4,000 was remitted, there should be a new trial. Thereupon the plaintiff remitted the excess, and judgment was entered for $4,000 and costs. The railroad company sued out this writ of error.

The assignments of error all relate to the instructions of the trial court with respect to the duty of the railroad to furnish the refrigerator cars in compliance with the demands of the plaintiff, and as to whether the plaintiff could recover anything for cabbages not actually tendered for shipment. The testimony tended to show that it had been the custom of the railroad company for some years prior to 1905 to furnish refrigerator cars for the transportation of early cabbages. That the demand increased from year to year. That the railroad company did not own the refrigerator cars as part of its own equipment, but they were supplied by independent car companies by some arrangement between the railroad company and the car companies. There was testimony to show that the railroad, in order to reach the truck planters of the territory where the plaintiff had his farms, had built spurs of railroad running through the fields, and that agents of the railroad and of the car companies had gone through the territory early in the season to get information as to the acreage planted with each kind of vegetable, and asking the farmers what time their crows would probably be ready for shipment and in what quantities. There was testimony tending to show that, while the cabbage crop of 1905 was large, it was not larger than what might reasonably have been expected from the acreage planted, and that of this the railroad company and the car companies either actually had information or had the means of knowing.

The defendant asked the court to instruct the jury as follows:

"(1) The railroad company as a common carrier is not bound to furnish refrigerator cars for transportation of cabbage."

The court said: "The court refuses to give you that instruction. The law on the subject is this: It is the duty of the railroad company, holding itself out as a common carrier of vegetables, to provide suitable and necessary means and facilities for the proper transportation of such vegetables. Such proper means and facilities depend upon the nature of the article to be transported, and the necessities of the respective localities in which it is to be received. . . . It is the duty of the railroad company engaged as a common carrier to study the wants of each community, and to keep pace with a growing demand for such facilities of transportation as may be needed. It is for you to say in this case whether the railroad company has performed its duty in that respect, and, while the court has refused to charge you that it is not the duty of the railroad company to furnish refrigerator cars, it must also state that its duty in this particular case depends upon circumstances. Now, it appears that, prior to 1901, these refrigerator cars were little used, if used at all, for the transportation of cabbage, and consequently, if you believe that testimony,—and there is no reason why you should not,—the railroad company could not justly be required to keep on hand a large number of refrigerator cars which were only of use for certain purposes and only required at a certain season of the year; but it was the duty of the company to provide, as far as they reasonably could, for the growing demand for refrigerator cars. That business, although it was conducted by private companies, was a business so intimately connected with the business of the defendant as a common carrier that it granted to the agents of that company facilities for drumming up that kind of business, allowing these agents to go down and induce these truck farmers to make use of the refrigerator cars. It therefore remained the duty of the railroad company, as far as it reasonably could, to respond to the demands which they thus permitted to be created; and, if you find from the testimony that they held themselves out to furnish refrigerator cars, then it is for you to say whether in this particular case they have violated their duty in failing to furnish them.

"The testimony shows that, prior to 1905,—that is, prior to the time when this suit had its origin,—the railroad company and the owners of refrigerator cars had furnished the people at Meggets 51 cars, and, so far as the testimony shows, that number of cars seemed to be all that was required at that locality. Now it is for you to say whether there is any testimony to satisfy you that the increased demand in the neighborhood of Meggets would be so great as to require it to furnish more than it actually did furnish. The testimony is that in 1905 it furnished about 130 or 140 refrigerator cars. Now it is a question for you whether the railroad company had any notice or reasonable ground to believe that the demand for these refrigerator cars was greater than the number which it was prepared to furnish. If you believe from the testimony that they had no reasonable ground to believe that there would be an unusual demand for refrigerator cars as Meggets that season, then it cannot be imputed to the railroad company as a fault for which it is liable in damages that it failed to respond to this unusual demand, if you believe that it was an unusual demand. So that it seems to the court that the case turns upon that point. The railroad undoubtedly was advised through its agents, actually advised, and it was its duty to be advised whether it was or not, as to the amount of truck planted in that neighborhood, as it was advised as to the quantities of truck vegetables planted in other neighborhoods.

"Now, whether there was such an increase in the amount of cabbage planted down there over previous years the testimony, so far as the court recalls it, does not disclose. There is probably sufficient evidence to show that there was a gradual increase in the trucking business in that section, but whether there was reasonable ground for the railroad company to prepare such a number of refrigerator cars as seems to have been demanded is a question for you to decide from the testimony. While the company as a common carrier should be held to a very high degree of care and duty responding to the demands of its patrons, it should not be held to respond to an unreasonable demand; and you will take the testimony and from that determine whether the railroad company had such notice beforehand that this unusual number of refrigerator cars would be required.

"It appears that the first demand proved in this case was on May 4th, and the cars were required the next day. If you believe from the testimony that it was possible for the railroad to respond to that demand, send the cars the next day, and that it failed to do it, then it would be responsible; but, if you believe from the testimony that it had no notice beforehand that such an unusual number of refrigerator cars was to be required, it could not justly be held responsible for failing within a day or two days to respond to that demand, for these cars, it appears from the testimony, were not owned by the railroad company itself. They were provided by other companies, and the railroad company had to make its arrangements, and, in the nature of the case, some time ought reasonably to be expected to be given before it could be held responsible for failure to send the cars.

"But the whole question, to the mind of the court, depends upon this: As to whether the company had reasonable ground to believe that at that season at Meggets these cars would be demanded in time to have made provision for them. If it had, then it was its duty to provide those cars in some way or other."

Having given these instructions to the jury, the learned trial judge proceeded to pass upon the special propositions of law submitted on behalf of the defendant railroad company, as follows: "(2) Unless the jury believe that the railroad company held itself out as conducting a refrigerator-car business for the furnishing to shippers refrigerator cars for the shipment of cabbage, then the railroad company cannot be held liable for any injury to the plaintiff arising by his inability to procure refrigerator cars."

The court said: "That instruction is given. That is, if the railroad company, by its course of business, held itself out to the community at Meggets as ready to furnish refrigerator cars, it should have furnished them; and the testimony you have heard on that point is that they not only did hold themselves out, but that it actually furnished cars, for the court holds that cars furnished by these car lines and by the railroad are practically the same thing. If it knew of the demand for refrigerator cars in that neighborhood and undertook to supply that demand, whether through itself or through the agency of other car lines, it is all the same."

The third instruction asked by the defendant was: "(3) If the jury believe that the demands for refrigerator cars for shipment of strawberries and cabbage was of unusual volume, and that the requests for refrigerator cars were made at the time when the railroad company could not obtain the refrigerator cars from the refrigerator companies, then the railroad company is not responsible for any injury the plaintiff suffered by reason of the failure to obtain refrigerator cars."

The court said: "The court has already practically given you that instruction, and it gives it to you."

The sixth instruction asked for by the defendant was as follows: "(6) If the jury believe that the railroad company only obtained refrigerator cars from the refrigerator company, and that at the time he made his requests it was impossible for the railroad company to procure such cars from the refrigerator company, then the railroad company would not be responsible to the shipper for failure to obtain refrigerator cars."

The court said: "The court gives you that instruction, to be taken in connection with what it has already said. The question is whether they knew or had reasonable cause to believe that there was going to be this great demand for refrigerator cars at Meggets at that time, a demand two or three times greater than that of the preceding year. That seems to the court the turning point in the case, for the demand was actually made on May 4th for cars for the next day; if the railroad company was not in possession of the cars and had to obtain them from other sources, and although the court has charged you, and charges you again, that it was its duty to have foreseen the demand so far as it reasonably could, and to have provided suitable means of transportation, yet, if it had no reasonable cause to believe that there was going to be a great demand for refrigerator cars, and it was impossible at the late date at which the formal demand was made to comply with it, that would relieve it from its liability."

The eighth instruction asked for by the defendant was as follows: "(8) If the jury believe that the number of refrigerator cars provided by the refrigerator company to the plaintiff was equal to all reasonable expectation said company had of the demands for such cars in that season, then the railroad company would not be responsible for a sudden and unexpected demand for that kind of equipment."

The court said: "The court gives you that instruction. It has so expressly charged you, and that really seems the turning point in the case."

The fourth instruction asked for by the defendant had reference to the plaintiff's claim for cabbage which rotted in the fields, the plaintiff not having cut and crated them because the railroad company had notified the plaintiff that it could not furnish the cars. The fourth instruction asked for by the defendant was as follows: "(4) The jury are charged that, unless a shipper tenders his freight to the carrier in proper condition for shipment and at a reasonable time, the railroad company is not responsible for loss occasioned thereby; and in this case the jury is charged that no recovery can be had against the railroad company for that portion of Mr. Geraty's crop which perished in the field, was never crated, or tendered to the railroad company for shipment."

The court said: "The court cannot give you that instruction. If you find from the testimony that in the circumstances of the case the railroad was bound to furnish refrigerator cars to Mr. Geraty upon his demand made at the time stated, and that it notified him that it could not furnish the cars, there was no reason why Mr. Geraty should go to the additional expense of cutting and crating his cabbages in order to ship them. If you believe the cabbages were there and ready to be crated and to be shipped in the event he could get the cars, then the company is just as liable as if the cabbages had been actually cut and crated and put up for shipment. The railroad company, of course, is not responsible as an insurer of truck farmers; it does not insure them against weather, or against the conditions of the market, and it cannot be held responsible for any loss that may have been sustained from any other cause than its own negligence, failure to do its duty, as the court has instructed you its duty was."

At the instance of the plaintiff, the court instructed the jury as follows: "(1) The jury is instructed that it is the duty of a common carrier to use every reasonable effort to provide suitable means of transportation for the carrying of all truck vegetables and other products raised for the markets; and that a railroad company, for its failure to furnish cars or other means of transportation, cannot shield or relieve itself by showing that it does not own such cars or such equipment."

And, at the instance of the plaintiff, the court instructed the jury as follows: "(3) The jury is instructed that a common carrier of freight cannot relieve itself of liability for the failure to furnish suitable and proper cars for the transportation of vegetables and other perishable truck on the ground that it owns no such equipment, and that the same has to be secured from another company; but that such common carrier is primarily liable to the shipper for the failure to furnish such cars."

The defendant excepted to the granting of the first and third instructions asked for by the plaintiff, and to the refusal to grant the first and fourth instructions asked for by the defendant.

The trial judge's instructions to the jury should be considered as a whole. The jury were told that the granted instructions were to be taken in connection with what the court had already said to them. In no other way could the law of the case be presented. The jury were plainly told that, in the first place, whether or not the railroad company was liable at all for not furnishing refrigerator cars, depended upon whether or not it had held itself out to shippers of early cabbages as engaging in that special character of transportation. In the next place, the jury was told, if the quantity tendered for shipment was unusually large, and the railroad company had no reason to expect the increased demand for refrigerator cars, then the railroad company was not liable for not meeting an unusual and unexpected demand. These conditions of liability were clearly and fully explained in the court's instructions. There was testimony to support the contentions of both sides, and the finding of the facts was properly left to the jury. There was testimony to show that the railroad company, through the car companies, led truck growers in that region to expect that, if they raised the vegetables, the refrigerator cars necessary for their proper transportation would be obtainable. That the finding of this fact was necessary to the plaintiff's right of action was very plainly and clearly explained to the jury by the learned judge's instructions. This statement of the law we think correct. Covington Stock Yards Co. v. Keith, 139 U. S. 128-133, 35 L. ed. 73-76, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 461, 462. It was said by Mr. Justice Harlan in that case: "The railroad company, holding itself out as a carrier of live stock, was under a legal obligation, arising out of the nature of its employment, to provide suitable and necessary means and facilities for receiving live stock offered to it for shipment over its road and connections, as well as for discharging such stock after it reaches the place to which it is consigned. The vital question in respect to such matters is whether the means and facilities so furnished by the carrier, or by someone in its behalf, are sufficient for the reasonable accommodation of the public. . . . The carrier must at all times be in proper condition both to receive from the shipper and to deliver to the consignee, according to the nature of the property to be transported as well as to the necessities of the respective localities in which it is received and delivered."

This is not the case of a railroad carrying ordinary freight being called upon to provide unusual facilities. The testimony tends to show that Meggets was the station of a great truck-growing region, and that the railroad had constructed spurs of tracks running into it for the purpose of transporting the products grown there, and had been furnishing refrigerator cars in previous years, and had permitted the car companies furnishing the refrigerator cars, under some arrangement with the railroad company, to solicit the business. When, encouraged by these facilities, the farmers gradually increased the acreage under cultivation with the knowledge of the railroad company, it could not be successfully contended that the railroad company fulfilled its duty to provide proper instrumentalities of transportation, if, when a perishable crop was ready for the market, the grower was obliged to let it perish for want of proper cars. All the findings of fact necessary to impose the duty on the defendant railroad were left to the jury. There was evidence from which the jury was justified in finding them, and we think they were sufficient to support the verdict.

As to the cabbages which, because of notice from the railroad company that the cars would not be furnished, the plaintiff, although he had them at hand, did not incur the useless expense of tendering them, we think the ruling of the trial court was correct. The cabbages were of no value unless they could be shipped to markets where they were in demand. They were grown for that purpose. They would not have been grown but for the expectation and previous experience that the railroad would transport them so as to arrive in a salable condition. The failure to furnish the refrigerator cars directly destroyed their value. Undoubtedly, the amount of a claim of this kind should be closely scrutinized. In this case the computation was rendered less uncertain by the fact that the plaintiff was not obliged to ship his cabbages to a distant market for sale, but sold them deliverable on the cars at his shipping station, the purchasers agreeing to accept them f. o. b. the cars, provided they were shipped in refrigerator cars. That the learned trial judge did exercise careful scrutiny of the damages arising from the loss of sales is shown by his requiring as a condition of refusing a new trial a remission of nearly 50 per cent of the jury's assessment of the loss.

Finding no reversible error, the judgment is affirmed.

Waddill, District Judge, dissenting:

I am unable to concur with the majority of the court in this case. While it is true the question presented is one of difficulty, and the lower court, in the instructions given, has shown much ability in reaching what would appear to be a fair solution of the same, yet I cannot see how, under the circumstances of this case, the carrier could have met the requirements imposed upon it, or have escaped liability, although it had substantially done so.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SEVENTH CIRCUIT.IRON MOLDERS' UNION NO. 125, OF MILWAUKEE, WISCONSIN, et al., Apts.,

v.

ALLIS-CHALMERS COMPANY.

(— C. C. A. —, 166 Fed. 45.)

Appeal — parties — voluntary association.

1. The objection that defendant, an unincorporated voluntary association, was sued in its common name, cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

Injunction — strike — violence.

2. An employer is entitled to an injunction to restrain his striking workmen from keeping other workmen away from his plant by the use of vile and abusive language, threats of violence and assaults.

Strike — violence — legality.

3. The employment of assault and duress by members of labor unions in furthering a strike undertaken against the representatives of a certain line of business in a certain city to enforce demands with respect to wages, time, work, apprentices, etc., will not be regarded as within the terms of a statute making it illegal to combine for the purpose of "doing harm maliciously for the sake of the harm as an end in itself," so as to make illegal the whole strike.

Injunction — strike — interference with contracts.

4. Striking employees may be enjoined from using persuasion to force apprentices to break their contracts to serve for definite times.

Same — persuasion.

5. Striking employees cannot be enjoined from using persuasion to prevent other workmen from taking their places, or to induce those who have done so without making a definite contract from quitting work.

Same — picketing.

6. Striking employees cannot be enjoined from picketing if the efforts of the pickets are limited to getting into communication with candidates for employment for the purpose of presenting arguments and appeals to their free judgments to persuade them not to supply the places of the strikers.

Same — boycott.

7. Striking employees cannot be enjoined from inducing employees in factories by which their former employer is attempting to get the work done to fill his contracts, to refuse to work on it, although it results in the owners of such factories breaking their contracts.

(October 9, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin in plaintiff's favor in a suit to enjoin unlawful interference with plaintiff's business. Modified.

Statement by Baker, Circuit Judge:

The appeal is from a final decree in a strike-injunction suit.

On the bill, supplemental bill, and showing in connection therewith, a temporary injunction was issued. Later, certain of the individual defendants were found to have violated the temporary injunction, and were accordingly punished. The pleadings, the temporary injunction, and the petition and evidence in the contempt proceedings are all stated in Allis-Chalmers Co. v. Iron Molders' Union No. 125 (C. C.) 150 Fed. 155.

By agreement of parties the cause was submitted for final hearing upon the "proofs taken on the motion to commit for contempt, as well as upon the other proofs in the case."

The final decree enjoins the defendants, four Wisconsin local unions of the national organization of iron molders and some sixty individuals who were officers and members, from doing the following:

"(1) From in any manner directly interfering with, hindering, obstructing, or stopping the business of the said complainant, or its agents, servants, or employees, in the maintenance, conduct, management, or operation of its business.

"(2) From compelling or inducing, or attempting to compel or induce by threats, intimidation, force, or violence, any of the said company's employees to fail or refuse to work for it, or to leave its service.

"(3) From preventing, or attempting to prevent, any person or persons, by threats, intimidation, force, or violence, from freely entering into or continuing in the said company's service.

"(4) And from congregating upon or about the company's premises, or the streets, approaches, and places adjacent or leading to said premises, for the purpose of intimidating its employees or preventing or hindering them from fulfilling their duties as such employees, or for the purpose of in such manner as to induce or coerce by threats, violence, intimidation, or persuasion, any of the said company's employees to leave its service or any person to refuse to enter its service.

"(5) From congregating upon or about the company's premises or the sidewalk,

Note. — The law as to picketing is discussed in Jensen v. Cooks' & Waiters' Union, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 302, with especial reference to the question whether picketing per se may be enjoined.

streets, alleys, or approaches adjoining or adjacent to or leading to said premises, and from picketing the said complainant's places of business or the homes or boarding houses or residences of the said complainant's employees.

"(6) From interfering with the said company's employees in going to and from their work.

"(7) From going singly or collectively to the homes of the said company's employees for the purpose of intimidating or threatening them, or collectively persuading them to leave its service.

"(8) From enforcing, maintaining, or aiding any illegal boycott against the said company, its agents or employees.

"(9) From endeavoring to illegally induce people not to deal with said company, its agents and employees.

"(10) From preventing or attempting to prevent by threats, intimidation, persuasion, or in any other manner any person or corporation from performing work for said complainant, and from doing business with it.

"(11) From intimidating or threatening in any manner the wives and families of said employees at their homes or elsewhere.

"(12) From doing any of the aforesaid or any other acts for the purpose of compelling and inducing, or attempting to compel or induce, the complainant, by threats, intimidation, force, or violence, against its will or the will of its officers, to employ or to discharge any person or persons whomsoever, and especially to employ members of said unions or discharge persons who are not members of said unions.

"(13) From combining, associating, agreeing, mutually undertaking, concerting together or with other persons for the purpose of doing or causing to be done any of the aforesaid prohibited acts.

"(14) From combining, associating, agreeing, mutually undertaking, concerting together or with other persons for the purpose of preventing [or hindering the complainant from doing or performing] any lawful act in the conduct of its aforesaid business or for the purpose of injuring the complainant in its aforesaid business, or of compelling the complainant, against its will, from doing or performing any lawful act or from injuring the said complainant in its trade and business.

"(15) From directing and abetting or counseling any acts whatsoever or in any manner whatsoever the conspiracy and combination found by the court to exist, to prevent the complainant and its officers and employees in the free and uninterrupted control and direction of its business and affairs and to prevent the complainant from 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

doing or performing any and all lawful acts in the conduct of its business, and to compel the complainant against its will from doing and performing its lawful business, and to prevent the complainant from doing or performing all lawful acts in the conduct or management of its business.

"(16) From, by threats, intimidation, persuasion, force, or violence, compelling, or attempting to compel or induce, any of the apprentices in the employ of the said complainant to break their contracts and leave the employ of the said complainant."

Under various assignments of error appellants contend that the unions were improperly included in the final decree because they were voluntary unincorporated associations; that the decree as a whole should be reversed for the reason that it is not supported by the evidence; that the parts of the decree are wrong which deny appellants the use of persuasion and the use of pickets; and that the finding of a boycott is contrary to the evidence.

The further facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Grosscup, Baker, and Seaman, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. W. B. Rubin and Frederick N. Judson, for appellants:

The decree of injunction must be considered in view of the conceded right of employees to combine in leaving their employment for any cause or no cause, for the betterment of their conditions; and that any injury incidentally ensuing to the employer from the peaceable exercise of this right cannot be made the basis of any right of action, or of any charge of unlawful conspiracy.

A combination without any just cause or excuse, and without the purpose to advance or further the interests of the members thereof, but maliciously to induce third persons not to trade with a certain person, is actionable conspiracy.

Baker, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

No Wisconsin statute authorized an unincorporated voluntary association to be sued in its common name. So, the objection might have prevailed if it had been seasonably made. Karges Furniture Co. v. Amalgamated Wood-workers Local Union No. 131, 165 Ind. 421, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 788, 75 N. E. 877, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 829; Pickett v. Walsh, 192 Mass. 572, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 78 N. E. 753, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 638. But the members could have been reached, of course, either by naming and serving them all, or, if that were impracticable on account of their numbers, by suing some as representatives of all. The bill treated the unions as representative of their membership; an individual member filed a verified answer in the names of the unions, alleging that he had been authorized by them so to do; and the case was carried through three hearings (temporary injunction, contempt, final decree) without a suggestion that there was a defect of parties, or rather a defect in the form under which appellee asked to have the membership of the unions brought into court. An objection of this kind will not be entertained on appeal unless it has been first duly presented in the trial court. Barnes v. Chicago Typographical Union No. 16, 232 Ill. 424, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1018, 83 N. E. 940.

The evidence showed that appellee was entitled to injunctive relief. To keep other workmen out of appellee's foundries, some of the union men went to the extent of using vile and abusive language, threats of violence, and actual assaults. This was effective enough to damage appellee's business quite seriously, and was carried on under circumstances that might be held to indicate the unions' tacit approval. None of the appellants ever challenged by appeal the justice of the temporary injunction or of the punishments for its violation; and on this appeal from the final decree not a shadow of justification is found for these acts of violence and intimidation. The only substantial question is whether or not the trial court has stepped beyond the line of safeguarding the legal rights of appellee, and has thereby deprived appellants of some of their legal rights.

To organize for the purpose of securing improvement in the terms and conditions of labor, and to quit work and to threaten to quit work as means of compelling or attempting to compel employers to accede to their demands for better terms and conditions, are rights of workmen so well and so thoroughly established in the law (Thomas v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. [C. C.] 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 788, 62 Fed. 803; Arthur v. Oakes, 25 L.R.A. 414, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 744, 11 C. C. A. 209, 24 U. S. App. 239, 63 Fed. 320; Wabash R. Co. v. Hannah [C. C.] 121 Fed. 563), that nothing remains except to determine in successive cases as they arise whether the means used in the endeavor to make the strike effective are lawful or unlawful.

By § 4466a, Wis. Stat. 1898, and, appellee asserts, by the common law as well, it is illegal for two or more persons to combine for the purpose of "doing a harm malevolently for the sake of the harm as an end in itself, and not merely as a means to some further end legitimately desired." Aikens v. Wisconsin, 195 U. S. 194, 49 L. ed. 154, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 3. As the combination among appellants was entered into and carried on in Wisconsin, a threshold inquiry is whether the present is a malicious-mischief case under this paragraph, wherein otherwise innocent means are condemned because the end is wicked, or a true strike case under the preceding paragraph, wherein, because the end is lawful, all means may be called into play except those that are unlawful in themselves.

The record shows that the local unions had a conference in regard to conditions in all the foundries in the city and county of Milwaukee; that they formulated demands respecting wages, overtime, double time on holidays, piecework, weekly pay day, limitation of the number of apprentices, and a joint arbitration board; that these demands were made alike upon all the foundry owners within that territory; and that, when the demands were rejected, the union men in all the foundries struck. Nothing in the record indicates that there was any want of good faith in making these demands, or that the strike was undertaken with any other purpose than to enforce them, or that appellee received or was singled out to receive different treatment from that dealt out to other foundry owners. So the employment of assault and duress in the progress of the strike should be attributed to a combination to accomplish a lawful end by unlawful means, rather than the employment of unlawful means should be taken as proof that the end sought to be accomplished by such means was itself unlawful. And consequently the parts of the decree which prohibit the use of persuasion and picketing can be justified only on the basis that such means are not lawfully to be applied in a genuine struggle of labor to obtain better terms and conditions; for surely men are not to be denied the right to pursue a legitimate end in a legitimate way, simply because they may have overstepped the mark and trespassed upon the rights of their adversary. A barrier at the line, with punishment and damages for having crossed, is all that the adversary is entitled to ask.

So far as persuasion was used to induce apprentices or others (§ 16 of the decree) to break their contracts to serve for definite times, the prohibition was right. And the reason, we believe, is quite plain. Each party to such a contract has a property interest in it. If either breaks it, he does a wrong, for which the other is entitled to a remedy. And whoever knowingly makes himself a party to a wrongful and injurious act becomes equally liable. But in the present case the generality of the men who took or sought the places left by the strikers were employed or were offered employment at will, as the strikers had been. If either party, with or without cause, ends an employment at will, the other has no legal ground of complaint. So, if the course of the new men who quit or who declined employment was the result of the free play of their intellects and wills, then against them appellee had no cause of action, and much less against men who merely furnished information and arguments to aid them in forming their judgments. Now it must not be forgotten that the suit was to protect appellee's property rights. Regarding employments at will, those rights reached their limit at this line: For the maintenance of the incorporeal value of a going business appellee had the right to a free access to the labor market, and the further right to the continuing services of those who accepted employment at will until such services were terminated by the free act of one or the other party to the employment. On the other side of this limiting line, appellants, we think, had the right, for the purpose of maintaining or increasing the incorporeal value of their capacity to labor, to an equally free access to the labor market. The right of the one to persuade (but not coerce) the unemployed to accept certain terms, is limited and conditioned by the right of the other to dissuade (but not restrain) them from accepting. For another thing that must not be forgotten is that a strike is one manifestation of the competition, the struggle for survival or place, that is inevitable in individualistic society. Dividends and wages must both come from the joint product of capital and labor. And in the struggle wherein each is seeking to hold or enlarge his ground, we believe it is fundamental that one and the same set of rules should govern the action of both contestants. For instance, employers may lock out (or threaten to lock out) employees at will, with the idea that idleness will force them to accept lower wages or more onerous conditions; and employees at will may strike (or threaten to strike), with the idea that idleness of the capital involved will force employers to grant better terms. These rights (or legitimate means of contest) are mutual and are fairly balanced against each other. Again, an employer of molders, having locked out his men, in order to effectuate the purpose of his lockout, may persuade (but not coerce) other foundrymen not to employ molders for higher wages or on better terms than those for which he made his stand, and not to take in his late employees at all, so that they may be forced back to his foundry at his own terms; and molders, having struck, in order to make their strike effective may persuade (but not coerce) other molders not to work for less wages or under worse conditions than those for which they struck, and not to work for their late employer at all, so that he may be forced to take them back into his foundry at their own terms. Here, also, the rights are mutual and fairly balanced. On the other hand, an employer, having locked out his men, will not be permitted, though it would reduce their fighting strength, to coerce their landlords and grocers into cutting off shelter and food; and employees, having struck, will not be permitted, though it might subdue their late employer, to coerce dealers and users into starving his business. The restraints, likewise, apply to both combatants and are fairly balanced. These illustrations, we believe, mark out the line that must be observed by both. In contests between capital and labor the only means of injuring each other that are lawful are those that operate directly and immediately upon the control and supply of work to be done and of labor to do it, and thus directly affect the apportionment of the common fund, for only at this point exists the competition, the evils of which organized society will endure rather than suppress the freedom and initiative of the individual. But attempts to injure each other by coercing members of society who are not directly concerned in the pending controversy to make raids in the rear cannot be tolerated by organized society, for the direct, the primary, attack is upon society itself. And for the enforcement of these mutual rights and restraints organized society offers to both parties, equally, all the instrumentalities of law and of equity.

With respect to picketing as well as persuasion, we think the decree went beyond the line. The right to persuade new men to quit or decline employment is of little worth unless the strikers may ascertain who are the men that their late employer has persuaded or is attempting to persuade to accept employment. Under the name of persuasion, duress may be used; but it is duress, not persuasion, that should be restrained and punished. In the guise of picketing, strikers may obstruct and annoy the new men, and by insult and menacing attitude intimidate them as effectually as by physical assault. But from the evidence it can always be determined whether the efforts of the pickets are limited to getting into communication with the new men for the purpose of presenting arguments and appeals to their free judgments. Prohibitions of persuasion and picketing, as such, should not be included in the decree. Karges Furniture Co. v. Amalgamated Woodworkers Local Union No. 131, 165 Ind. 421, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 788, 75 N. E. 877, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 829; Everett Waddey Co. v. Richmond Typographical Union No. 90, 105 Va. 188, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 792, 53 S. E. 273, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 798.

We have not found anything in the evidence that justified the decree as to an "illegal boycott." No attempt was made to touch appellee's dealings or relations with customers and users of its goods. Oxley Stave Co. v. Coopers' International Union (C. C.) 72 Fed. 695; Loewe v. California State Federation of Labor (C. C.) 139 Fed. 71; Loewe v. Lawlor, 208 U. S. 274, 52 L. ed. 488, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 301. After the strike was on, appellee sent patterns, on which the strikers had been working, to foundries in other cities. The strikers procured the molders in those foundries, who also were members of the Iron Molders' Union of North America, to refuse to make appellee's castings. Those molders notified their employers that they would have to cancel their contracts to make castings for appellee, or they would quit work. Some employers discharged the notifiers, others refused to cancel and the union men struck, and others complied and the union men stayed. In those instances where the foundry men fulfilled their contracts, appellee was not damaged; in those where foundry men broke their contracts, there is no proof that appellee has not collected or cannot collect adequate damages. That might be taken as a reason why appellee, on this branch of the case, is not entitled to the aid of equity. But there is a more important reason. Appellants were aiming to prevent, and appellee to secure, the doing of certain work in which the skill of appellants' trade was necessary. Here was the ground of controversy, and here the test of endurance. If appellee had the right (and we think the right was perfect) to seek the aid of fellow foundry men to the end that the necessary element of labor should enter into appellee's product, appellants had the reciprocal right of seeking the aid of fellow molders to prevent that end. To whatever extent employers may lawfully combine and co-operate to control the supply and the conditions of work to be done, to the same extent should be recognized the right of workmen to combine and co-operate to control the supply and the conditions of the labor that is necessary to the doing of the work. In the fullest recognition of the equality and mutuality of their rights and their restrictions lies the peace of capital and labor for so they, like nations with equally well drilled and equipped armies and navies, will make and keep treaties of peace, in the fear of the cost and consequences of war.

The decree is modified by striking out "persuasion" and "persuading" from the 4th and 7th paragraphs; further modified by adding after "picketing" in the 5th paragraph "in a threatening or intimidating manner;" vacated as to the 1st, 8th, 9th, 10th, 14th, and 15th paragraphs; affirmed as to the 2d, 3d, 6th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 16th, and the modified 4th, 5th, and 7th paragraphs. Costs of this court to be divided equally.

Grosscup, Circuit Judge, concurring:

The foregoing opinion so compactly and clearly sets forth the correlative rights and the correlative obligations of employer and employees when engaged in a strike or lock-out that it is with hesitation that I add this word; and I only add it that nothing that is contained in the opinion may be construed to relate to the correlative rights and the correlative obligations of employer and employees in any relationship other than their somewhat anomalous relationship pending a strike or lockout.

A strike is cessation of work by employees in an effort to get for the employees more desirable terms. A lockout is a cessation of the furnishing of work to employees in an effort to get for the employer more desirable terms. Neither strike nor lockout completely terminates, when this is its purpose, the relationship between the parties. The employees who remain to take part in the strike or whether the lockout do so that they may be ready to go to work again on terms to which they shall agree,—the employer remaining ready to take them back on terms to which he shall agree. Manifestly, then, pending a strike or a lockout, and as to those who have not finally and in good faith abandoned it, a relationship exists between employer and employee that is neither that of the general relation of employer and employee, nor again that of employer looking among strangers for employees, or employees seeking from strangers employment. And it is with respect to this somewhat anomalous relationship that, as I understand it, this opinion speaks; a statement that it seems to me ought to be made to confine the opinion to the actual situation to which it is intended to relate,—to differentiate what we say from what might arise in cases where, neither strike nor lockout pending, persuasion is resorted to, to induce other employers not to employ given applicants for employment, or to persuade employees not to take employment with given employees, upon which questions we do not, as I understand it, express any opinion.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

FRANK PARTRIDGE, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF ARKANSAS.

(— Ark. —, 114 S. W. 215.)

Intoxicating liquors — sale — agent — mistake.

The proprietor of a stand where soft drinks are sold is not guilty of selling or being interested in the sale of intoxicating liquors without a license, contrary to the provisions of the statute, because an adult employee, in his absence, sells a bottle of beer which he had provided for his own use and which he gave no authority to anyone to sell.

(November 30, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Clark County convicting him of being interested in the sale of intoxicating liquor without a license, Note.—The subject of the criminal responsibility for the sale of intoxicating liquor by a partner, servant, or agent is discussed in a note to Williams v. Hendricks, 41 L.R.A. 660, and in a case note to State v. Gilmore, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 786. A few cases on the subject have been reported since the latter note.

Under a statute providing that "no person . . . shall knowingly sell [ardent spirits] to any intoxicated person," and declaring that any person violating any provisions of the act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and fined not less than $50 nor more than $100, it was held in O'Donnell v. Com. 108 Va. 882, 62 S. E. 373, that a licensed bartender may be convicted upon a sale made at his bar to an intoxicated person by his son, who was employed in the barroom, and intrusted with the conduct of the same in the absence of the defendant, although the defendant was in fact at the time of the sale absent from the place of business.

Loeb v. State (Ga. App.) 64 S. E. 338, holds that there is no fatal variance between an indictment alleging a sale of liquor by defendant and proof that the liquor was sold by his agent or employee.

In Pulver v. State (Neb.) 119 N. W. 780, the court said that, while the proceeding was in the form of a criminal prosecution for keeping a place for the sale of liquor open after hours, it was in fact a civil action to recover a penalty, and it was not, therefore, necessary to show any guilty intent on the part of the owner, the act charged having been committed by his agent in charge of the place.

In passing upon a remonstrance against the granting of a license on the ground that the applicant had, during the previous year, violated the liquor law by illegal sales, the court, in Re Berger (Neb.) 120 N. W. 960, held that, where a barkeeper sells intoxicating liquors to a minor or to an habitual drunkard, the proprietor of the place will be held responsible for such sales in the absence of evidence that they were made in violation of his orders; but that illegal sales made to minors by the barkeeper against the express instructions of the proprietor cannot operate against the latter.

contrary to the provisions of the statute. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John E. Bradley for appellant.

Messrs. William F. Kirby, Attorney General, and Daniel Taylor for the State.

McCulloch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was tried upon an indictment charging him with unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor without license; and the court gave to the jury a peremptory instruction to find him guilty as charged.

The following is the state of the testimony: Appellant was conducting a stand at a picnic in Clark county for the sale of lemonade, soda pop, candy, etc., and employed a salesman named Worley. A witness named Palmer went to the stand in appellant's absence, and called for a drink of hop ale, whereupon Worley handed him out a bottle of beer, or which he paid Worley the sum of 25 cents. Worley testified that he did not know the bottle sold to Palmer contained beer, and that appellant had employed him to sell for him, but did not give him particular instructions what to sell. Appellant testified that he kept no intoxicating liquor for sale; that he put four bottles of beer in a box at the stand to keep for his own private use, and did not authorize anyone to sell it; that the bottles of beer were not put in the ice box where other cold drinks were kept for sale; and that he intended when he got ready to drink it, to shave ice in it to cool it. He also testified that Worley and the other salesman in the stand were grown men, and that he supposed they knew better than to sell the beer. If appellant's statement of the facts was true, he was not guilty of any offense, and he had the right to have the jury pass upon the question. It was error to take the case from the jury.

If appellant kept the beer at his place of business solely for his own consumption, and gave no authority, either express or implied, for its sale, the fact that his clerk sold it by mistake would not render him guilty of the unlawful sale. The statute under which appellant stands accused provides that it shall be an offense for any person to "sell, either for himself or another, or be interested in the sale" of, the prohibited liquors without license. This court held that, under a statute making it a criminal offense for anyone to sell or be interested in the sale of intoxicating liquor to a minor, a sale by one partner in the absence and without the knowledge, consent, or connivance of his co-partner rendered both liable criminally for the unlawful act. Robinson v. State, 38 Ark. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

641. The court, speaking through Chief Justice English, in giving a reason for a departure from the well-established rule that a person who is not a party to the commission of a criminal offense cannot be adjudged guilty of the offense, said: "The law says to persons wishing to engage in selling spirituous liquors, or to be interested in sales thereof: 'You must be careful in the selection of your partners or servants, and watchful of their conduct in your business; for, if they make forbidden sales, you are responsible. You must see that sales in which you are interested are not made without license, nor made to minors, without proper permission from their parents or guardians. If you are not willing to engage or be interested in the business on these terms, there is no compulsion upon you to do so.'" There cannot be, we think, any application of this rule to a person not engaged nor interested at all in the liquor traffic, whose employee inadvertently, or without authority from him, makes a sale of liquor at his place of business. In that case he is not interested in an unauthorized sale, and does not come within the statute. The case should have been submitted to the jury upon the question whether the sale was made by mistake and without authority from appellant, or whether it was a mere subterfuge to cover an unlawful sale of liquor. The attorney general confesses error, and we think his views of the case are correct.

Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT. (In banc.)

PURA JANE STILL et al., Respts.,
v.
SAN FRANCISCO & NORTHWESTERN
RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(— Cal. —, 98 Pac. 672.)

Evidence — competence of conductor — sufficiency.

1. The incompetence of a railroad conductor may be found from evidence that, although he had worked in several capacities on the railroad for some time, he had only recently been placed in charge of a Case Note.—May breach of duty to employ or retain none but competent servants be inferred from the fact of their incompetence.

It should be observed that this question presupposes that the incompetence has been established by competent evidence, and that the master was ignorant of such incompetence, or that there was no evidence, aside from the mere fact of incompetence, or repuscheduled train, with nothing to show that he was instructed, or knew, that, when directed to pass an inferior train at a particular point by special order, he was bound to await its arrival; and that, upon arriving at the meeting place under such order, and not finding the other train there, he directed the engineer to go forward, under the general rule that trains moving in the direction that his train was going had the right of way, and inferior trains from the opposite direction must keep out of the way.

Trial — jury — care of master.

2. The question whether or not a railroad company made sufficient investigation as to the qualification of one placed in charge of a scheduled train as conductor, who is tation of incompetence, tending to show that the master had knowledge thereof. Therefore, cases in which it appears that the master had actual knowledge of the servant's incompetence, and cases which merely pass upon the question of the sufficiency of evidence to establish incompetence, are not here included.

It is the duty of the master to employ and retain competent servants only, and it is presumed that he performs this duty; therefore, one injured through the incompetence of a servant has the burden of proving such incompetence, and he must also show that the master knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known, of the incompetence at the time he employed the servant, or that he retained him after being charged with notice of his incompetence. Labatt, Mast. & S. § 193a.

This preliminary statement would seem to answer in the negative the question formulated by the title to this note. And this is found to be the position generally taken by the authorities, except where the incompetence was so notorious that the master would have known of it had he exercised ordinary care, in which case he is charged with constructive notice and consequently a breach of duty.

Incompetence at time of employment.

It has been held that, since the law presumes that an imposed duty was properly performed, the mere fact that a fellow servant was incompetent did not tend even prima facie to establish negligence on the part of the master in employing him; but the burden was upon the plaintiff to establish the fact that the injury resulted to him because the master did not exercise reasonable and proper care in the selection of the servant, and that the negligence of the master in this respect could not be inferred from the circumstance that the servant was in fact incompetent. Roblin v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 119 Mo. 476, 24 S. W. 1011; Van Dusen v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 12 N. Y. S. R. 351.

But in East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Gurley, 12 Lea, 46, it was held that an 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

shown not to have had the requisite knowledge of the meaning of orders to make him competent, to relieve itself from the charge of negligence in that regard, is for the jury, where the only evidence of investigation is that the train master made some inquiry as to his competency, and had some discussion with him relative to the duties to be performed, about the time he was promoted to that service from inferior service which required no such knowledge, the information received not necessarily indicating that he possessed the requisite knowledge.

Railroad — incompetent servant — liability.

3. A railroad company which, without proper investigation as to his qualification, places in charge of a scheduled train instruction substantially in the words of the preceding paragraph was properly refused, since it ignored a degree of incompetence which, of itself, might, in the opinion of the jury, import notice, and because the language was equivocal in the clause "tend even prima facie to establish negligence."

In Thomas v. Herrall, 18 Or. 546, 23 Pac. 497, it was held that the mere fact of the incompetence of a servant was not enough to warrant the jury in finding the master guilty of negligence in employing him.

And so it was held in Murphy v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 71 Mo. 202, although the court added that the testimony by which the incompetence of a servant is established may be such as to warrant the inference that the master had notice of his incompetence, or that he omitted to make such inquiries as common prudence would have dictated.

In Taylor v. Western P. R. Co. 45 Cal. 323, it was held that, although inability to read showed incompetence where the servant was placed in a position which required him to read, it was error to charge the jury that placing him in that position was of itself an act of negligence, since the master may have taken all reasonable precautions to ascertain his competence for the place, and have been deceived by the servant's fraudulent practices.

In Lee v. Michigan C. R. Co. 87 Mich. 574, 49 N. W. 909, it was held that the presumption that the master did his duty in the selection of a competent servant was overcome by proof that the servant was incompetent when employed; that in such case proof of notice to the master was not necessary.

In Crandall v. McIlrath, 24 Minn. 127, it was held that, when incompetence is shown to have existed at the time of employment, a prima facie case of negligence is made out against the master; and the burden is upon him to disprove negligence.

In Pleasant v. Raleigh & A. Air Line R. Co. 121 N. C. 492, 61 Am. St. Rep. 674, 28 S. E. 267, it was held that the question of the master's negligence in such a case should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions.

a conductor who has not the requisite knowledge of the meaning of orders for meeting and passing trains, is liable for the death of a fireman on another train with which the train in charge of such conductor collides because of his failure to obey, through ignorance of its meaning, an order requiring him to pass the other train at a certain point.

Trial — instruction — refusal — emphasizing evidence.

4. Refusal of an instruction which emphasizes a particular portion of the evidence is not error in the absence of anything to show why it should be so singled out and emphasized.

(December 4, 1908.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Humboldt

And in Kundar v. Shenango Furnace Co. 102 Minn. 162, 112 N. W. 1012, it was held that in such case the jury would be justified in finding that the master did not exercise reasonable care in employing such servant.

In Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Hoover, 79 Md. 253, 25 L.R.A. 710, 47 Am. St. Rep. 392, 20 Atl. 994, it was held that the servant's general reputation for intemperance may be sufficient to overcome the presumption that the master exercised due care in his selection.

In Monahan v. Worcester, 150 Mass. 439, 15 Am. St. Rep. 226, 23 N. E. 228, it was held that the fact that a servant was generally reputed to be infirm in the senses of sight and hearing, and physically weak, had a tendency to show that the master, in employing the servant, did not take proper means to ascertain his qualifications.

But specific acts of negligence are not admissible to establish this fact. Olsen v. Andrews, 168 Mass. 261, 47 N. E. 90.

Subsequently developed incompetence.

The legal presumption is that servants once competent continue so. Southern P. Co. v. Hetzer, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 288, 68 C. C. A. 26, 135 Fed. 272; Chapman v. Erie R. Co. 55 N. Y. 579.

The mere fact of incompetence, where it is shown that the servant was competent at the time of his employment, does not sufficiently show a breach of duty on the part of the master, unless the incompetence had become so notorious as to charge the master with notice. Lee v. Michigan C. R. Co. 87 Mich. 574, 49 N. W. 909.

Specific acts of carelessness or unskillfulness are insufficient to warrant the jury in inferring negligence on the part of the master in retaining the servant. Huffman v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 78 Mo. 50; Baulec v. New York & H. R. Co. 59 N. Y. 356, 17 Am. Rep. 325.

An act of casual neglect by an employee is not alone sufficient to establish negligence of the principal in his employment. Rush 20 L.R.A.(N.S.)

County in plaintiffs' favor in an action to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiffs' husband and father. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gillett & Cutler and F. A. Cutler for appellant.

Messrs. George T. Rolley and Coonan & Kehoe, for respondents:

It was sufficiently shown that defendant failed to exercise ordinary care in the selection of the conductor.

v. Thomas D. Murphy Co. 135 Iowa, 376, 112 N. W. 814.

The simple fact that a fellow servant was guilty of negligence on the occasion when plaintiff was injured was not sufficient to authorize the jury to find that the master was negligent in employing him. Conrad v. Gray, 109 Ala. 130, 19 So. 398.

But, if a servant, competent at the time of employment, afterwards becomes habitually incompetent or unfit to perform his duties, the master is chargeable with notice of the incompetence, although he has no personal knowledge of its existence. Whittaker v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 126 N. Y. 544, 27 N. E. 1042; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Patton (Tex.) 9 S. W. 175; Meyers Sons v. Falk, 99 Va. 385, 38 S. E. 178.

But in Cameron v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 145 N. Y. 400, 40 N. E. 1, it was held that the jury should not be permitted to find the master guilty of negligence in failing to ascertain that a competent servant had become incompetent, where it further appeared that the master had adopted suitable rules for the regulation of his conduct which the master had no reason to suppose were disregarded, and in which rules all servants were requested to make prompt report of any neglect or disobedience to the rules, and no complaint had been made.

Negligence in the retention of an incompetent servant may be established by evidence of the fact that he was generally reputed to be unfit, reckless, or unskilful, so that the master, in the exercise of due care, must have known of his incompetence. Western Stone Co. v. Whalen, 151 Ill. 472, 42 Am. St. Rep. 244, 38 N. E. 241; Calumet Electric Street R. Co. v. Peters, 88 Ill. App. 112; Cooney v. Commonwealth Ave. Street R. Co. 196 Mass. 15, 81 N. Angellotti, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment for plaintiffs, in an action brought by the surviving wife and two minor children of Charles Still, deceased, for damages resulting to them from the death of said Still, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant. The principal claim of defendant is that the evidence given on the trial is insufficient to support the verdict.

Charles Still was killed on October 5, 1903, in a collision which occurred between two of defendant's trains, one known as "extra No. 4," a special train, in conductor Rolley's charge, which was running southerly from El Paso & S. W. R. Co. v. Smith (Tex. Civ. App.) 108 S. W. 988.

The servant's general reputation for intemperance, acquired after being employed, is admissible to charge the master with notice of his incompetence, and thus to show a breach of duty in not discharging him. Gilman v. Eastern R. Co. 13 Allen. 433, 90 Am. Dec. 210; McPhee v. Scully, 163 Mass. 219, 39 N. E. 1007; Cox v. Central Vermont R. Co. 170 Mass. 129, 49 N. E. 97.

In Hilts v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 55 Mich. 437, 21 N. W. 878, it was held that, where it was shown that an accident occurred through the negligent act of an engineer who was intoxicated; and it was further shown that he was in the habit of drinking intoxicating liquors to excess, and such habit had extended over a period of nine months while in the defendant's employ, though no actual knowledge or notice had ever reached any superior officer of the engineer, the jury was justified in concluding that the defendant was negligent in failing to learn of such habit, and in retaining the engineer in its employment.

And so it was held where the habit of getting intoxicated two or three times a week had extended over a period of two years. Tonnesen v. Ross, 58 Hun, 415, 12 N. Y. Supp. 150.

In Curtis v. Laconia Car Co. Works, 73 N. H. 516, 63 Atl. 400, it was held that evidence that a striker in a blacksmith shop had used liquor to excess for twenty-five years was relevant, since it had a tendency to prove that the masters ought to have anticipated an injury to the blacksmith whom he assisted, if they retained him in their employ.

The master's knowledge of the incompetence of a servant may be shown by evidence tending to establish that such incompetence was generally known in the community. Park v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 155 N. Y. 215, 63 Am. St. Rep. 663, 49 N. E. 674; Lambrecht v. Pfizer, 49 App. Div. 82, 63 N. Y. Supp. 591.

In McCarty v. Ritch, 59 App. Div. 145, 69 N. Y. Supp. 129, it was held that evidence of reputation for incompetence, unconnected with any specific acts, was not admissible for the purpose of showing constructive notice to the master.

Negligence in the retention of an incompetent servant may be shown by specific acts of incompetence of such a nature, character, and frequency that the master, in the exercise of due care, must have had them brought to his notice. First Nat. Bank v. Chandler, 144 Ala. 286, 113 Am. St. Rep. 39, 39 So. 822; Michigan C. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 46 Mich. 176, 9 N. W. 243.

Evidence of the commission of several previous acts of negligence similar to that which caused the injury warrants the submission to the jury of the question whether the master was negligent in keeping the delinquent servant in his employment. Sutton v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 50 N. Y. S. R. 514, 21 N. Y. Supp. 312; Wall v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 54 Hun, 454, 7 N. Y. Supp. 709, affirmed without opinion in 125 N. Y. 727, 26 N. E. 757; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Branch (Tex. Civ. App.) 56 S. W. 542.

In Smith v. Chicago, P. & St. L. R. Co. 236 Ill. 369, 86 N. E. 150, it was said that the conduct of a servant on a single occasion may be entirely sufficient to demonstrate his unfitness, and, after such an occurrence, to charge the master with a failure of duty in keeping him in the service.

Testimony going to show a servant's incompetence at a date previous to the accident is held proper as tending to show the master's negligence in retaining him. Terrill v. Russell, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 573, 42 S. W. 129; Stoll v. Daly Min. Co. 19 Utah, 271, 57 Pac. 295.

For cases upon the question whether the incompetence of a minor to perform the duties of a particular employment may be inferred upon his minority alone, see case note to Wilkinson v. Kanawha & H. Coal & Coke Co. post, 331.

South Bay, near Eureka, and the other known as "freight train No. 5," a regular schedule train, under Peter Clark as conductor, which was running northerly from Carlotta, the southerly terminus of the road, to South Bay. He was the fireman on "extra No. 4," and at the time of the collision was in the cab of the locomotive engaged in the discharge of his duties. His train was proceeding under an order addressed to its conductor and engineer, which was as follows: "Leave South Bay 6:45 October 5th. Take E. R. V. L. Co.'s empties to their switch. Return light to Gravel Pit. Meet P. L. Co.'s train at Singley's. Meet No. 5 at Cousins' switch. Exchange engines at Cousins' switch with No. 5." A special meet order had been given to the conductor and engineer of freight train 5, reading as follows: "October 5, '03. Train No. 5, Conductor Clark, Engineer Thayer. Meet Extra 4 at Cousins' switch. Exchange engines with her. Take E. R. V. Lbr. Co.'s train to S. Bay. It is conceded that such an order supersedes all schedules, and means exactly what it says, viz., that the trains to which it is addressed must meet at the place named, and that the one arriving first at the designated place must stay at that place until the other train arrives, or until the order is withdrawn or changed. Train 5 started from Carlotta at its schedule time, and proceeded according to its schedule to Cousins's switch, which was almost midway between South Bay and Carlotta. Extra 4 had been delayed by an accident farther north, and had not yet arrived at Cousins's switch. Conductor Clark, of train 5, having taken on the E. R. V. Lumber Company's train as directed by his special order, proceeded north with his train, without waiting for extra 4, with the result that in the neighborhood of Fortuna, the next station north of Cousins's switch, his train came into collision with extra 4, which was proceeding south in strict accord with its orders. Concededly the failure of Clark to comply with the requirements of the meet order was the sole cause of the deplorable accident.

Under the law of this state as it was at the time of the collision, deceased and Clark were fellow servants, and no recovery could be had against defendant by the heirs of deceased for damages resulting solely from the negligence of Clark. The claim of plaintiffs, sustained by the jury that tried the case, was that Clark was incompetent to act as conductor of train 5, that defendant had failed to use ordinary care in selecting him to serve in that capacity, and that his incompetence was the cause of the accident, thus bringing the case within the rule of law that renders the employer liable to an employee for damages resulting from his failure to use ordinary care in the selection of other employees, and to select only those who are competent to properly perform the duties of the position for which they are selected,—the rule declared by § 1970, Civ. Code, as it was at the time of the accident, as follows: "An employer is not bound to indemnify his employee for losses suffered by the latter . . . in consequence of the negligence of another person employed by the same employer in the same general business, unless the negligence causing the injury was committed in the performance of a duty the employer owes by law to the employee or unless the employer has neglected to use ordinary care in the selection of the culpable employee." In accord with this claim, the jury specifically found, in response to questions submitted to them: First, that Peter Clark was incompetent to act as conductor of train No. 5 at the time of the collision; second, that the collision was caused by such incompetence of Peter Clark to act as conductor; third, that the defendant failed to use ordinary care in the selection of Peter Clark for the position of conductor for such train; and, fourth, that the defendant, prior to the accident, knew that Clark was incompetent for the position of conductor on such train, or could have known it by the exercise of ordinary care on its part. A general verdict in favor of plaintiffs was also rendered.

It must be borne in mind that the question before us in considering the attack on the verdict of the jury is not how we would find the facts to be, but whether there was enough in the evidence from which the jury might find the existence of facts which would justify the verdict they rendered. It, of course, devolved on plaintiffs to show that Clark was in fact incompetent for the position to which he was assigned, that defendant, at the time of his selection therefor, either knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care would have known, of such incompetence, and that such incompetence was the cause of the accident. The verdict of the jury constituted findings in the affirmative upon all these propositions. Was there substantial evidence in support thereof? If so, the verdict must stand, however strongly such evidence may be opposed to other evidence given on the trial. In cases of mere conflict of evidence the conclusions of the trial jury and judge are conclusive on the question as to which side produced the "preponderance of evidence." See Fowden v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co. 149 Cal. 151, 159, 86 Pac. 178.

As we have said, it is necessarily conceded that the failure of Clark to hold his regular schedule train at Cousins's switch until the arrival of extra 4, in accord with the requirements of the meet order, was the cause of the accident. Was this failure due to his incompetence or unfitness from any cause to act in the position to which he had been assigned, or was it due to his mere negligence in the discharge of duties which he was entirely competent to perform? The incompetence claimed is that he was not possessed of adequate knowledge of the meaning and effect of a "meet order," under such circumstances as confronted him at Cousins's switch on the day of the accident, the kind of incompetence referred to in Nofsinger v. Goldman, 122 Cal. 609, 617, 55 Pac. 425, 429, where it was said: "An engineer might not be careless. He might exercise extreme care within the limitations of his knowledge, and yet, for lack of adequate knowledge, might be unfit and incompetent for the position,"—and in Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Guyton, 115 Ind. 450, 7 Am. St. Rep. 458, 17 N. E. 101, a case similar in many respects to this. Incompetence connotes the converse or reliability in "all that is essential to make up a reasonably safe person, considering the nature of the work and the general safety of those who are required to associate with such person in the general employment." 1 Labatt, Mast. & S. § 181. It goes without saying that one who does not know the meaning of the rules or orders used on a railroad relative to the movement of trains is absolutely incompetent to act as a conductor of a train thereon, where he would be called upon to follow such rules and orders in moving his train. We are satisfied that the evidence amply warranted the jury in finding that Clark was without this knowledge, and that his ignorance in this respect was the sole cause of the accident.

Clark had been acting as conductor of this train for less than a month, having commenced on September 10, 1903. His employment on this train was practically his first experience as conductor on a schedule train, there being some testimony that between July 17, 1903, when he came to this road, and September 10, 1903, he had acted for a few days as conductor. During the same time he had acted for a few weeks as conductor of a gravel train, an inferior unscheduled train, running under special orders. During the same interval of less than two months he had also acted for a very short time as brakeman on a passenger train on this road. For nearly two years prior to July 17, 1903, he had been a brakeman on a passenger train on the railroad running from Eureka to Arcata, a short road which had only one train and one train crew, and where, consequently, there were no rules or orders as to the meeting and passing of trains. Prior to that time he had worked for some years on the road where the accident occurred in the several capacities of sectionman, tunnel watchman, and fireman, positions in which he had not been required to know or charge his mind as to the effect of orders relative to the meeting of trains. Prior to assuming the work of conductor he had shown himself to be a reliable and competent man in the various positions in which he had been placed, which would rather tend to indicate that within the limits of his knowledge he would not be likely to make a mistake in such a vital matter as the one causing the accident. The evidence was not such as to compel the conclusion that he had ever before been confronted with the situation that confronted him at Cousins's switch on the day of the accident, or that he had ever been informed, or had ever learned, that a regular schedule train, arriving at a place where it had been directed by special order to meet an inferior train before the arrival of the latter, was bound to await such arrival, unless the special order was withdrawn or modified. Upon being made a conductor he was given a printed schedule or time-table of the various regular trains, on the back of which were printed what was styled "Time-Table Rules." A new time-table, to take effect October 5, 1903, at 12:01 A. M., was issued before the accident, and a copy placed in his hands. On this appears the schedule for his train "No 5 freight." At the bottom of the page, in large type, appeared the following: "North-bound trains are superior to and have the right of track over south-bound trains of same or inferior class." At the time of the accident his train was north bound, while extra 4 was south bound, and inferior to his train, under the express provisions of the rule printed on the back of the time-table. Among the other rules so printed on the back of such time-table was rule 8, providing that "inferior trains must keep out of the way of all superior trains," and rule 16, providing, "When the expected train is not found at the schedule meeting or passing point, the superior train will proceed on schedule; the inferior train will take siding and wait for the superior train." When Clark arrived at Cousins's switch," he had his special order in mind, as is fully shown by his compliance with that portion thereof requiring him to take on the "E. R. V. Lbr. Co.'s train," so that his action in proceeding with his train cannot be accounted for on the theory that he had forgotten the existence of any special order. In addition to this, Joseph Still, the fireman on train 5, testified that, before directing the engineer to move out from Cousins's switch, Clark told him (the engineer), "Our instructions were to meet No. 4, but we are the superior train, and we will run on schedule, run on rule 16, and extra 4 will have to take siding and keep out of the way." It appears that this statement of Still was denied by Clark when he was recalled as a witness by defendant, and that Still was a brother of deceased, and also had a damage suit pending against defendant, arising out of the same accident, but we must assume that the jury believed the testimony of Still in this regard, and they were the sole judges as to his credibility. It also appeared that Still had given the same testimony in the presence of Clark on two previous trials of another action growing out of this accident, and that no denial thereof had then been made. Clark himself was not called by either party to testify at this trial as to the circumstances of the accident, or to explain why he had disregarded the "meet order." Of course, it is possible that Clark did know the full meaning and effect of such orders as applied to regular schedule trains, and that his proceeding on the day of the accident in violation of the order he had received was due simply to forgetfulness, and constituted merely an act of negligence on his part. But we have no doubt whatever that the evidence above set forth was sufficient to warrant a jury in concluding that he did not possess the knowledge that such an order superseded all schedules and printed rules in so far as such schedules and printed rules conflicted therewith, and that he believed that it was his duty to proceed from Cousins's switch with his regular schedule train under such printed rules, without waiting for the inferior train he had been directed to meet at that point. If they so concluded, they were necessarily compelled to find him to be incompetent to discharge the duties of the place to which he had been assigned.

This brings us to the question whether defendant used ordinary care in the selection of Clark as conductor of the freight train, or rather whether the evidence was such as to sustain the finding of the jury that it did not use ordinary care. Under all the authorities, the term "ordinary care," as used in this connection, means that degree of care that a man of ordinary prudence would use in view of the nature of the employment, and the consequences of the employment of an incompetent person,—a degree of care commensurate with the nature and danger of the business and the grade of service for which the servant is intended, and the hazards to which other servants are to be exposed from the employment of a careless or incompetent person. Wood, Mast. & S. §§ 417, 418. In accord with this rule, it is generally declared that, where the service in which the servant is employed is such as to endanger the lives and persons of coemployees if the servant is not competent, an employer is bound, in the exercise of ordinary care, upon the plainest principles of justice and good faith, to make a reasonable investigation into his character, skill, qualifications, and habits of life. See 1 Labatt, Mast. & S. § 194; Bailey, Personal Injuries relating to Master & Servant, § 1407; Western Stone Co. v. Whalen, 151 Ill. 472, 42 Am. St. Rep. 244, 38 N. E. 241; Mann v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 91 N. Y. 495. The question whether he has made such investigation as is reasonable under all the circumstances is peculiarly one for the jury. As has been said before, even where there is no conflict in the evidence on the question of negligence, if the conceded facts are such that reasonable minds might differ as to the conclusion to be drawn, the question is one of fact for the jury. Seller v. Market-Street R. Co. 139 Cal. 271, 72 Pac. 1006. The presumption is that the employer has done his duty in this regard (Beasley v. San Jose Fruit-Packing Co. 92 Cal. 388, 28 Pac. 485); and, as a general rule, the employer's knowledge of incompetence, or the fact that he would have obtained such knowledge had he made reasonable inquiry, must be shown by evidence independent of that showing the incompetence, and cannot be inferred therefrom. Mr. Labatt, in his Master and Servant, says that the latter rule is subject to certain qualifications, one of which is that the testimony by which the incompetence is established may be such as to warrant a conclusion that the employer either had notice of the incompetence, or omitted to make such inquiries as common prudence would have dictated (§ 196); and that it seems impossible to deny that the delinquency which caused the injury may be of such a flagrant character that a jury might fairly infer that the master could not have failed to discover the servant's unfitness if proper inquiries had been instituted when he was hired. § 199. See, also Bailey, Personal Injuries relating to Master & Servant, § 1419. In Murphy v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 71 Mo. 202, this is declared to be the law; and the statement is made that the inference is one of fact for the jury. In Lee v. Michigan C. R. Co. 87 Mich. 574, 49 N. W. 909, the evidence showing incompetence was of such a nature that the court said that proof that he was so incompetent when employed need not be supplemented by proof of the employer's knowledge thereof; the presumption that the employer had done his duty being overcome by the proof of incompetence. It further said that, where one competent at the time of employment becomes incompetent, or indulges in a habit which renders him incompetent during its indulgence, notice of the incompetence must be brought home; but that, where the incompetence existed at the time of the employment, proof of notice is not necessary. This was said in reference to one who had been employed only a few weeks. In Pleasants v. Raleigh & A. Air Line R. Co. 121 N. C. 492, 61 Am. St. Rep. 674, 28 S. E. 267, the court said that there was no evidence that the defendant knew of the incompetence of Dunn when he was employed, except his action on the occasion of this fearful wreck, and the fact that he had been employed in this capacity only a few weeks; but that these facts raised such a presumption against the defendant as to make this an issue fit to be submitted to the jury under proper instructions. These are examples of decisions that support the statement of Mr. Labatt. If it be conceded that any of them states the rule in broader terms than is warranted, we think nevertheless that there can be no doubt under the authorities that the incompetence of an employee at the time of his employment may be of such a character that the evidence showing it will be legally sufficient to rebut the presumption that the employer used the requisite care in his selection, and make the question one for the jury. This is on the theory that the incompetence was of such a nature that a reasonable investigation would have disclosed it, and that, therefore, the employer either knew of it, or omitted to make such investigation,—the same theory upon which evidence of general reputation of the employee for incompetence is admissible to show want of care on the part of the employer. See Gier v. Los Angeles Consol. Electric R. Co. 108 Cal. 129, 41 Pac. 22; Gilman v. Eastern R. Co. 13 Allen, 433, 441, 90 Am. Dec. 210. When we speak of the time of his employment, we mean the time when he was assigned to the particular employment. An employer is bound to institute affirmative inquiries in order to ascertain the qualifications of an employee whom he transfers to a more responsible position, for which special qualifications are demanded, unless the employee has given proof of his capacity in some similar position. Labatt, Mast. & S. § 194. See also Mann v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 91 N. Y. 495.

The rule we have just discussed appears to us to be peculiarly applicable to incompetence of the character found by the jury, on sufficient evidence, to exist in the present case, viz., want of knowledge by a conductor of a schedule train as to the meaning and effect of telegraphic orders referring to the movement of his train in relation to other trains on the road. The safety of all those associated with him is dependent on his having such knowledge, and the most orinary care requires reasonable affirmative investigation, on the part of the employer, to ascertain that the employee has it, before assigning him to the employment. Where such incompetence is shown, it is a fair inference that a reasonable investigation would have disclosed it, when it could have been remedied by proper instruction. The uncontested showing by an employer, in response to the prima facie case thus made, may doubtless be such, in some cases, as to require the conclusion, as a matter of law, that the requisite investigation was made, and that the result thereof fully warranted the employer in selecting the culpable employee. But the record here presents no such case. There was evidence showing some inquiry by the train master, and some discussion by him with Clark himself relative to the duties to be performed, about the time he was first assigned as a conductor; but the evidence in this behalf relied on by defendant was such that, assuming it to be without conflict, reasonable men might well differ as to whether it showed such investigation as was requisite under the circumstances. The proposed conductor was being taken from the position of brakeman, on a road where, by reason of the fact that there was only one engine and one train crew, it was not essential for even a conductor to know anything about the rules and orders for the meeting and passing of trains. His service in that capacity on that road had continued for nearly two years next preceding his employment on the road where the accident occurred. His former employment on the road where the accident occurred had been several years before, and in capacities wherein he was not required to charge his mind with rules and orders relative to the meeting and passing of trains. His reputation as a careful and competent man, and the recommendation of Mr. Rose, the former train master, amounted to no more than a showing that he was a competent railroad man within the lines of his knowledge and experience, and that he was the kind of man who might safely be made conductor of an extra train on defendant's road. Mr. Rose's statement to the train master was substantially that he was a valuable man, and that he had promised him a conductorship of a gravel train on this road when the same was put on. There was nothing in all this to warrant the conclusion on the part of the train master that, either by experience or actual instruction, Clark had acquired the adequate knowledge as to rules and orders relative to the meeting and passing of trains. The testimony as to the conversations between Clark and the train master at and about the time of his employment is not of such a nature as to require a conclusion that the train master was warranted in assuming that he had such knowledge, and the same must be said of the experience of Clark as conductor of the extra gravel train immediately prior to his employment as conductor of a regular freight train. A very clear knowledge, on the part of the conductor, of a regular schedule train as to the unprinted rule making a special "meet order" superior to all the printed "time-table rules" was especially essential, in view of the printed rules, which expressly declared extra trains "inferior to all regular trains," required "inferior trains" to keep out of the way of all "superior trains," and provided that, when the expected train is not found at the schedule meeting or passing point, the superior train will proceed on schedule time, and the inferior train will take siding and wait for the superior train.

The case of Gier v. Los Angeles Consol. Electric R. Co. supra, is much relied on by learned counsel for defendant, but we see nothing therein that is in conflict with what we have said. As the court there said, the act producing injury in that case "was not one evincing incompetence, employing the word strictly to denote a lack of skill or ability to use appliances or perform a duty in a workmanlike way, but was a single and signal exhibition of carelessness or recklessness," being the voluntary starting and sending ahead his electric car by a motorman under such circumstances that the car must strike the conductor who was standing at a switch. The motorman had been originally employed by the defendant as a driver of a horse car, and was subsequently trained as a motorman. At the time of his original employment, inquiry was made by the defendant of his former employers for whom he had acted in the capacity of driver of a horse car, and they had declared him "to be the best and most careful of men." It was in regard to such a case that the court said that defendant was not at fault in originally employing as a motorman a horse-car driver without questioning him personally, inasmuch as it took pains to avail itself of evidence upon the matter, "disinterested and superior,"—that of his former employers. But we do not desire to be understood as intimating that a personal examination of one about to be employed, even in such a responsible position as that of conductor of a railroad train, is always essential to the exercise of reasonable care. Such investigation as will warrant the assumption, under all the existing circumstances, that the employee has adequate knowledge and qualifications, is essential. Such an assumption may be warranted by the knowledge of the employer of the experience and reputation of the employee as to work calling for the knowledge and qualifications adequate to the discharge of the duties of the place or by the recommendation of other persons on whom he is justified in relying. Each case must be determined on its own facts, and generally, as here, the question whether due care was exercised by the employer in this regard is one exclusively for the jury and trial judge. The verdict was not in conflict with any of the instructions.

The only other points made for reversal are as to the refusal of the trial court to give certain requested instructions to the jury. The first of these was one to the effect that, in determining the question of incompetence, the jury might take into consideration, "with other evidence" given on the trial, certain specified evidence. As to this instruction, it is sufficient to say that no reason appears why the court should have singled out a portion of the evidence given on the issue of incompetence, and specially directed that it might be considered. Under their general instructions, the jury must have known that this evidence, with all other evidence on the subject, was to be considered by them in determining the question. Instructions which are drawn solely for the purpose of, and which simply have the effect of, emphasizing some particular portion of the evidence, are not to be commended. The second, defendant's proposed instruction 9, was properly refused. While taken from the opinion in Gier v. Los Angeles Consol. Electric R. Co. 108 Cal. 129, 41 Pac. 22, it was misleading as applied to the facts in this case, and assumed facts as to which there was a conflict in the evidence, if, indeed, one of such assumed facts was not wholly at variance therewith. If the third, defendant's proposed instruction 12, had been limited to the proposition suggested by learned counsel, that, if defendant had made reasonable inquiry as to the fitness and competence of Clark at the time of his employment, with the result that Clark appeared to be competent, it had fulfilled its duty in the matter of selection, notwithstanding it was afterwards disclosed that Clark was in fact incompetent, it would doubtless have stated the law correctly. Such was the effect of other instructions given, as we read them. But by this proposed instruction it was attempted to have the court state what specific acts, inquiries, and information would constitute a reasonable investigation warranting the assumption of competence, and requiring a conclusion that defendant had used proper care. We think this proposed statement would have been very misleading as applied to the evidence given on the trial, and that the court properly refused to give it.

The instructions given by the learned judge of the trial court were very complete and fair, and clearly and correctly stated the law applicable to the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

WILLIAM B. WILKINSON, Admr., etc., of Edward P. Wilkinson, Deceased.

v.

KANAWHA & HOCKING COAL & COKE
COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(— W. Va. —, 61 S. E. 875.)

Pleading — variance.

1. The declaration charged it was defendant's duty to have a careful and competent person to "operate the knuckle where the cars were let down from the mine entry to the tippie below," but that, not regarding such duty, it employed "a totally incompetent and irresponsible boy of the tender age of fifteen years to operate said knuckle and levers necessary to operate

Headnotes by MILLER, J.

Case Note. — May incompetence of a minor to perform the duties of a particular employment be inferred from his minority alone.

In Rickert v. Stephens, 133 Pa. 538, 19 Atl. 410, it was held that, where there was nothing in the duty to be performed by the servant, a boy thirteen years old, which a boy of that age might not do as well as a full-grown man; and there was no evidence that he was incompetent,—the jury could not be asked to infer incompetence from the nature of his employment in connection with his age, since in civil cases there is no presumption that children under the age of fourteen are without judgment or discretion.

In Rush v. Thomas D. Murphy Co. 135 Iowa, 376, 112 N. W. 814, it was held that, in the absence of evidence as to the degree of skill required to operate an elevator, it could not be assumed that a boy fourteen years of age was so lacking in discretion as to be unable to perform such duties.

In Smillie v. St. Bernard Dollar Store, 47 Mo. App. 402, it was held that the hiring of a boy twelve years old to run an elevator in a store in which other children who were his fellow servants were required to ride was not in itself inferential evidence of the want of ordinary care in the hiring, on the part of the master, where there was no evidence that it could not be operated with perfect safety by a child of that age.

said knuckle in letting down said cars off the hill." The evidence showed the word "knuckle" was sometimes used as an inclusive term, to embrace the drum house and all appurtenances at the head of the incline, but that the boy was employed simply to operate the chock blocks immediately at the knuckle, and that he was fifteen years and four months old. The word "knuckle" was employed in the declaration in its restricted sense. There was no material variance.

Negligence — infant over fourteen — discretion.

2. An infant, after reaching the age of fourteen years, is presumed to have sufficient discretion and understanding to be responsible for his wrongs, to be sensible of danger, and to have power to avoid it.

Master — employment of infant — incompetence — burden.

3. As a general rule, after a boy has reached the age of fourteen years, courts do not permit juries to presume him incompetent for the duties of a particular employment, because of minority alone; and, when over that age, the burden of proof is upon the one alleging incompetence.

Servant — Incompetence — appearance.

4. A jury cannot decide a person unfit for his employment on account of what they see, or suppose they see, or can read, in his face and manner while testifying before them.

Mines, 115 Mich. 629, 41 L.R.A. 33, 73 N. W. 895, it was held that there was no presumption of law that one seventeen or eighteen years of age could not operate a cage in a mine as safely and as well as one older.

In Sutherland v. Troy & B. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 737, 26 N. E. 609, where it appeared that the only suggestion of the servant's incompetence as a telegraph operator was founded upon the fact that he was but a little over seventeen years of age; and it also appeared that he had more than a year's experience, and had discharged his duties intelligently, and that young men were generally better operators than older men,—it was held that the jury could not be permitted to infer that he was incompetent in fact from his age only.

In Kansas & T. Coal Co. v. Brownlie, 60 Ark. 582, 31 S. W. 453, a judgment for plaintiff was set aside upon the ground that the master was not guilty of negligence, where it appeared that the fellow servant who caused the injury was fourteen and one half years old; that his work required no great or special qualification; that it was a universal custom among others engaged in the same line of work to employ boys from twelve to fourteen years of age; that experience had shown that they were as efficient in that sphere as older persons; and that the trial court charged the jury that there was no evidence showing that the fel-

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kanawha County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the killing of plaintiff's intestate, alleged to have been due to the defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Brown, Jackson, & Knight, for plaintiff in error:

There was a clear variance between the declaration and the evidence.

Snyder v. Wheeling Electrical Co. 43 W. Va. 661, 39 L.R.A. 499, 64 Am. St. Rep. 922, 28 S. E. 733; Richmond R. & Electric Co. v. West, 100 Va. 184, 40 S. E. 643; Richmond R. & Electric Co. v. Bowles, 92 Va. 738, 24 S. E. 388; Eckles v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 96 Va. 69, 25 S. E. 545.

The rule making the age of fourteen the low servant was incompetent, unless such deduction might be drawn from his age.

In Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Adams, 105 Ind. 151, 5 N. E. 187, where the injured employee contended that he was not engaged in the work for which he was hired, and that he, being a minor twenty years of age, was not qualified to do the hazardous work ordered, the court said: "When a person of apparently sufficient age, physical ability, and mental caliber to perform the service seeks an employment at the hands of a railway company, or other master, he ought to be held to an implied representation that he is competent to perform the duties of the position he seeks, and competent to apprehend and avoid all dangers that may be discovered by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence. In such a case we know of no good reason or rule of law that will compel the master to pass him through a critical examination to discover his competence for the place or that will convict the master of negligence for not so doing."

In Molaske v. Ohio Coal Co. 86 Wis. 220, 56 N. W. 475, it was held that the law presumes that a boy twelve years old is not competent to perform duties involving the personal safety of others, and requiring the exercise of a good degree of judgment and discretion, and constant care and watchfulness. The court placed its holding upon the presumption of the common law which fixes 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

dividing line, on the one side, of which incapacity to appreciate and guard against danger will be presumed, and, on the other side, capacity will be presumed, is logical and reasonable.

Mere inexperience in duties involving no great amount of intelligence or skill is not necessarily evidence of incompetence.

National Fertilizer Co. v. Travis, 102 Tenn. 16, 49 S. W. 832.

Messrs. E. B. Dyer and J. W. Kennedy, for defendant in error:

It was negligence in the company to employ this boy, who was fifteen years old, and the age when the presumption of capacity arises to commit crime at fourteen years.

In Carlson v. Wilkeson Coal & Coke Co. 19 Wash. 473, 53 Pac. 725, the court said that ordinary experience and observation would imply that a boy fourteen and one half years old was not ordinarily equal in strength or intelligence to a full-grown man, and that testimony showing that boys of the same age were frequently employed for the same character of work would not be determinative of competence.

In Bare v. Crane Creek Coal & Coke Co. 61 W. Va. 28, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 284, 123 Am. St. Rep. 966, 55 S. E. 907, the employee was under thirteen years of age, and the court said: "The employer of a minor, without other notice, is charged with notice of such lack of capacity as is usual among minors of the same age, so far as his age is or should be known to his employer."

As to whether a breach of duty to employ or retain none but competent servants may be inferred from the fact of their incompetence, see case note to Still v. San Francisco & N. W. R. Co. ante, 322.

As to the necessity of instructing a minor who is of insufficient age or capacity to comprehend the dangers of his employment, see case note to Bare v. Crane Creek Coal & Coke Co. 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 284.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The coal from defendant's mine No. 117 at Glen Ferris in Fayette county is brought out on cars of 2 tons' capacity, drawn by mules, over tracks distributed through the mine and extending out over a horizontal plane, whence the cars are let down in pairs over parallel tracks built upon an incline to a tippie at the railroad below, a distance of 1,200 feet. The point at which the incline begins is called the "knuckle," from its resemblance to a bent finger. The mechanism employed to lower the loaded cars and elevate the empty ones consists of a large drum, around which is wound a wire rope in opposite directions, the weight of the loaded cars on one track pulling the empty ones up on the other, their movement being regulated by a brake, controlled by one designated as "drum runner." At the knuckle is a mechanism designed to prevent the loaded cars brought out of the mine from going over the knuckle until the drum rope is attached. This consists of iron "chock blocks" 3 feet long, 3 inches wide, and 5 inches high, one for each rail of the double track, operated on pivots and so connected that they can simultaneously be thrown over the rails by means of one lever. The device is simple, and requires no special skill to operate it. The operator is designated as "chock-block tender." The lever for this device is located on one side of the double track, and that of the drum runner on the opposite side, and both located within what is called a "drum house." The drum itself is located some distance behind the drum house, and in front of it a hitching post so-called. When the loaded cars are brought out of the mine into the drum house and run down against the chock blocks, the rear car, coupled to the front one, is tied to the hitching post by use of a grass rope, and the end of the wire rope is attached to it also. When the cars are ready to descend, the chock-block tender, upon signal from the drum runner, opens the blocks by use of the lever, and the cars are eased off by means of the grass rope in charge of one man, until the slack of the wire rope is taken up; and it is the duty of the chock-block tender, immediately after the empty cars come up over the knuckle, to close the blocks behind them. There are thus four persons employed in this operation,—drum runner, chock-block tender, hitching-post man, and the man who attaches the ropes to the cars. They each have other duties to perform about the work besides the special ones referred to, in taking the empty cars back to the mine, and bringing the loaded ones forward to the knuckle. The tippie at the foot of the incline is in charge of a weighmaster whose duty it is to weigh all coal dumped there. Others are employed at the tippie also, not necessary to mention.

On November 9, 1903, the defendant had employed as chock-block tender, Leonard Lloyd, a boy fifteen years and four months of age. He had been then employed about three days, but had performed faithfully and successfully the duties of his position, without complaint or cause of complaint so far as the record shows, up until 4 o'clock of that day, when two empty cars on the incline jumped the track just as they were coming up over the knuckle, and, before the chock-block lever could be operated, had to be gotten on the track and removed off the knuckle. This required the assistance of all employees at that point, including Lloyd, for some four or five minutes. After they passed the knuckle, all assisted in pushing them on towards the opening of the mine. Lloyd in the exigency forgot to throw the chock blocks back over the track, and about the same time two loaded cars from the mine, brought into the drumhouse by the drum runner, who failed to observe that the chock blocks had not been thrown over the track, escaped over the knuckle and down the incline to the tippie, where they struck the plaintiff's intestate, Edward P. Wilkinson, the weighmaster, and two other employees, resulting in the almost instant killing of each. It was to recover damages for the death of Wilkinson that this action was brought by his administrator.

The declaration, in one count, by way of charging the defendant's duty and breach thereof, avers that it was the duty of said defendant to have a careful and competent person "to operate the knuckle where the cars were let down from the mine entry to the tippie below," but that, not regarding such duty, it employed "a totally incompetent and irresponsible boy of the tender age of fifteen years to operate said knuckle and levers necessary to operate said knuckle in letting down said cars off the hill," knowing that said boy was incompetent to perform said work; it further avers that certain loaded coal cars were permitted, through the incompetency of said boy in operating said knuckle, to run down the incline and kill the plaintiff's intestate. On the trial, there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for $5,500. For alleged errors committed by the trial court, the defendant has brought the case here for review.

First, it is claimed there is a fatal variance between the declaration and the proof. The argument on this point is that, as the evidence disclosed, the term "knuckle" is frequently used as an inclusive term, embracing the drum house and all appurtenances at the head of the incline, and was sometimes so employed by the witnesses in their testimony; and that it was in this sense the pleader intended to use it in the declaration. But we do not think the point meritorious. The declaration clearly distinguishes between the operation of the drum and that of the knuckle, and the negligence charged clearly relates to the employment of the boy to operate the knuckle. At the knuckle, according to the testimony, the boy was in fact employed; and we perceive no substantial variance between the allegata and probata in this respect. Another point of alleged variance is that the declaration charges the boy to have been fifteen years old, whereas the proof showed he was fifteen years and four months old. We see no merit in this point. It is customary to speak of one's age as of his last birthday. This is the common meaning of the word. In life-insurance contracts, the rule is to refer the age to the nearest birthday; and it would be most unusual in a declaration of this character to charge the age with literal accuracy as to months and days.

The motion of the defendant to exclude the plaintiff's evidence, the questions presented by its instructions 1, 5, 7, and 8, all refused, and the errors relied upon, all depend on this sole question, in its various phases, whether the defendant was guilty of negligence in employment of Lloyd as chock-block tender. Instruction No. 1 told the jury that the evidence would not support a verdict for the plaintiff; No. 5, that, if they found Lloyd "was smart and bright, of strength adequate to the performance of the duties of his employment, was instructed in the performance of those duties, and knew what would be the natural consequences of a failure to perform those duties," his employment was not negligence; No. 7 was practically of the same import, except that it took into account the previous experience of Lloyd in working about mines; No. 8 took into consideration the facts supposed in 5 and 7, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) and told the jury that, if they believed from the evidence Lloyd was placed under the direct supervision and subject to the orders of the drum runner, who was experienced, skilled, and competent, and whose duty it was to see that Lloyd and the other helpers performed their respective duties, and that the conditions of the work were such that the drum runner could see that his respective helpers, including Lloyd, performed their duties, then the defendant was not negligent in employing Lloyd, although he was without previous experience.

It is conceded that, in an action of this kind, the burden is upon the plaintiff, as a condition of recovery, to prove not only incompetence of Lloyd, but also negligence in his employment and retention; and, if he has failed in this, defendant's instructions 1, 5, 7, and 8 clearly should have been given. The evidence of the defendant stands uncontradicted, and Lloyd as a witness for plaintiff admits that, at the time of his employment, he was instructed in the duties of his position; and that these duties, which were simple, consisting simply of opening and closing the blocks by the operation of a lever, had been performed successfully up to the hour of the accident. That he had physical strength, intelligence, and discretion necessary to properly operate these blocks was practically demonstrated. That he was negligent, as it seems were all the other employees, in not seeing that the blocks were closed before the loaded cars ran down over the knuckle, is admitted; but such negligent act does not establish incompetence on his part. The plaintiff claims to have discharged the burden of proof by evidence of Lloyd's age, his previous inexperience in operating chock blocks, his appearance on the witness stand, his height of 5 feet and weight of only 110 pounds, together with the character of his testimony on cross-examination. There were no other facts proven from which it is even claimed the jury were justified in their finding of negligence.

As tending to show Lloyd's competence, the undisputed evidence was that he had been employed about the mines from the time he was ten years old, under his father, an experienced mine foreman; had helped mine coal, grease and couple cars; had been employed as "trapper" in tending the doors in the mines controlling ventilation; had "spragged" cars, involving the running alongside moving cars in the darkness of the mine and sticking in the revolving wheels pegs to chock or "sprag" them; had thrown the switches on the parting in the mine, the place where loaded cars are assembled to be taken to the outside and to which empty cars are brought back for distribution. Some evidence tends to show that the mine foreman, at the time he employed Lloyd, though living for some time theretofore in the same house with him, did not know of this previous experience. But certainly, if Lloyd was competent, the fact that the foreman neither knew of this previous experience nor made inquiry on the subject could not render the company liable; if incompetent, failure to make investigation would, of course, be actionable negligence. Let us see now whether, under the authorities, the alleged evidence of incompetence was such as to justify the submission of that question to the jury. If so, we would not be justified in disturbing their verdict.

First, with respect to the age of the boy. It is conceded that, by common law, an infant after reaching the age of fourteen years is presumed to have sufficient discretion and understanding to be responsible for his wrongs, to be sensible of danger, and to have power to avoid it. Nagle v. Allegheny Valley R. Co. 88 Pa. 35, 32 Am. Rep. 413; Molaske v. Ohio Coal Co. 86 Wis. 226, 56 N. W. 475; Rickert v. Stephens, 133 Pa. 538, 19 Atl. 410. Our statute recognizes this common-law capacity, in providing by § 4, chap. 82, Code 1906, that if above that age he may nominate his own guardian, and, by § 3, chap. 83, that, when his land is to be sold by the proceedings there prescribed, he shall, if over fourteen, answer the bill on oath in proper person. Moreover, by § 13, chap. 15, Code 1906, coal companies are permitted to employ as workmen in the mines boys 12 years of age. It has been held, however, that statutes of this character do not raise a presumption of capacity in an infant. Carlson v. Wilkeson Coal & Coke Co. 19 Wash. 475, 53 Pac. 725. After the age of fourteen, therefore, as a general rule, the courts do not permit juries to presume a boy incompetent because of minority alone. Sutherland v. Troy & B. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 737, 26 N. E. 609; Sullivan v. Lally, 166 Mass. 265, 44 N. E. 221; Kansas & T. Coal Co. v. Brownlie, 60 Ark. 582, 31 S. W. 453; Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines, 115 Mich. 629, 41 L.R.A. 33, 73 N. W. 895; Smillie v. St. Bernard Dollar Store, 47 Mo. App. 402; Rickert v. Stephens, supra. The above authorities hold that, where a boy is over the age of fourteen, the burden is upon the plaintiff to show incapacity; if under that age, the burden of showing capacity is upon the defendant. See also Molaske v. Ohio Coal Co. and Carlson v. Wilkeson Coal & Coke Co. supra.

It is true, however, that, "upon the clearest grounds of necessity and good faith, ordinary care in the selection and retention of servants and agents implies that degree of diligence and precaution which the exigencies of the particular service reasonably require. It is such care as, in view of the consequences that may result from negligence on the part of employees, is fairly commensurate with the perils or dangers likely to be encountered." Wabash R. Co. v. McDaniels, 107 U. S. 454, 27 L. ed. 605, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 932. It is admitted in this case that the position of a chock-block tender was an important one, in view of the danger to life from neglect of his duties; but it is not pretended that these duties required, for proper performance, any special skill or experience. Any person of adequate strength to work the lever, and of sufficient age and discretion to understand the results of failure to properly and faithfully perform the duties required, would be reasonably suitable for the position. Accordingly, it was held in Sullivan v. Lally, supra, that a boy fifteen years and four months old, of average intelligence, who had run a freight elevator a few times, would not be presumed incompetent to understand the dangers; in Kansas & T. Coal Co. v. Brownlie, supra, that a boy fourteen years old would not be presumed incompetent, by reason of youth, to trap in a mine; in Burke v. Syracuse, B. & N. R. Co. 69 Hun, 21, 23 N. Y. Supp. 458, that a boy seventeen years old would not be presumed incompetent as a switchman by reason of youth; in Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines, supra, that negligence is not shown by the mere fact of employing a boy of seventeen to manage a brake controlling passenger cages in a mine; in National Fertilizer Co. v. Travis, 102 Tenn. 16, 48 S. W. 832, that mere inexperience in duties involving no great amount of intelligence or skill is not necessarily evidence of incompetency.

In Sullivan v. Lally, supra, the court said: "It does not appear that the plaintiff did not possess the average intelligence of boys of his age. There was nothing unapparent or complicated about the elevator or its operation. The plaintiff testified that he knew all there was to do with the elevator, and no reason is disclosed why he should not have known it, though he was only fifteen years and four months old at the time of the accident."

In Smillie v. St. Bernard Dollar Store, supra, where the boy employed to run an elevator in a store was only twelve years of age, the court said: "Nor [was there] any evidence whatever that the elevator, owing to its size, construction, or propelling power, could not be run with safety to all within by a boy of that age. There was no evidence whatever that boys of that age are not usually employed for similar work. As far as that branch of the case is concerned, it rests on the simple proposition that the boy was twelve years of age, and that his employer might have known the fact, as the boy presumptively indicated it by his appearance, in the absence of evidence to the contrary." In that case the verdict for the plaintiff was set aside, on the ground that the proof was insufficient to establish negligence in employment of the boy.

In Holland v. Tennessee Coal I. & R. Co. 91 Ala. 444, 12 L.R.A. 233, 8 So. 524, on the authority of a number of other Alabama cases, the court said: "The selection of a servant must, of course, be made with a view to the nature of the employment. If it involves special knowledge or experience, only men of special knowledge and experience should be employed. If the work may be well done by the unskilled and inexperienced, it cannot be said that the master is lacking in the measure of care he owes to other employees should he employ unskilled and inexperienced men upon it."

It is said in 1 Labatt on Master & Servant, 407, that "the fact that the delinquent servant was a minor is an important, though not decisive, element in determining his competency. Its evidential weight depends upon the character of the work to be done, the servant's previous experience, and his actual age." In view of what is said in the decisions there cited and others, it is not to be inferred, however, that the writer means to say that the fact of age alone, when above fourteen, may be submitted to the jury on the question of capacity, but that where, as in those cases, there is other evidence of incapacity, the fact of infancy may be considered as an important one along with the other evidence; for, as well said in Nagle v. Allegheny Valley R. Co. supra: "That would furnish us with no rule whatever. It would give us a mere shifting standard, affected by the sympathies or prejudices of the jury in each particular case. One jury would fix the period of responsibility at fourteen, another at twenty or twenty-one. This is not a question of fact for the jury. It is a question of law for the court." Nor will a single act of negligence suffice to prove incompetency. 1 Labatt, Mast. & S. 409. This writer says, at page 411, that, "in regard to the question whether the plaintiff is entitled to introduce evidence that the delinquent servant had been guilty of several acts of negligence prior to the time of the accident in suit, the courts are not unanimous;" although he gives it as his opinion that, by the weight of authority, such evidence is competent on the question of unfitness.

18 S. E. 596, it is said that "the failure of the fireman to respond to the signals at Raven's Rock, the testimony of the conductor . . . that 'the fireman was not known and recognized to be a skilled engineer,' and the accident itself," were wholly insufficient to prove negligence in employing the fireman. But it is argued here that Bare v. Crane Creek Coal & Coke Co. 61 W. Va. 28, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 284, 123 Am. St. Rep. 966, 55 S. E. 907, supports the proposition that, as matter of law, a boy of the age of Lloyd is presumptively incompetent, on account of youth, to fill a position of the importance of chock-block tender. That was a case of injury to the boy himself, and is not opposed to the authorities already cited applicable to injuries to a fellow servant. Even in cases of injury to the boy himself the rule, as stated in that case, is that the case should be taken from the jury "where the clear weight of the evidence shows that the child had a capacity for self-protection which he culpably omitted to use, in face of a danger which it knew and sufficiently apprehended."

What may be said of Lloyd's appearance and testimony before the jury, as evidential facts of incapacity? The courts, so far as we have been able to find decisions on the subject, hold that a jury is not authorized to decide a person unfit for his employment on account of what they see, or suppose they see, or can read, in his face and manner while testifying before them. Corson v. Maine C. R. Co. 76 Me. 244; Peaslee v. Fitchburg R. Co. 152 Mass. 155, 25 N. E. 71; Keith v. New Haven & N. Co. 140 Mass. 175, 3 N. E. 28; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Christman, 65 Tex. 369; Core v. Ohio River R. Co. supra. This court, in the latter case, quotes approvingly Corson v. Maine C. R. Co. supra: "If the jury undertook to decide that Arnold was an unfit person to be employed as a brakeman on account of what they saw, or supposed they saw, or could read, in his face and manner while testifying before them as a witness, they did fall into a grave error. As well might a jury find a man guilty of murder because in their opinion they could see guilt in his face. The law does not recognize physiognomy as an art or science sufficiently reliable to found a verdict upon, not even against a railroad corporation. In a case like this the law imposes upon the plaintiff the burden of proving that the defendant corporation has been guilty of negligence in employing a man known to be unfit for the place which he is to fill; and we feel no hesitation in saying that this burden cannot be sustained by the man's looks and manner while testifying as a witness."

The following testimony of Lloyd on cross-examination is relied on:

Q. You had been around the mouth of the mines, although you had not been there?

A. Yes, sir; I had been around, not very much.

Q. You knew what the blocks were for?

A. Yes, sir; I knew what for, to keep cars from going over the hill.

Q. You knew if the blocks were not closed the cars would go over the hill and into the tipple?

A. Go over the hill somewhere, I knew that.

Much stress is laid on the last answer, as evincing lack of capacity to appreciate the dangers resulting from negligence. We are unable to concur in this view. We do not see anything in the nature of the testimony to evince lack of competence, or want of appreciation of the dangers incident to neglect. The last answer was guarded; it evinces rather a sense of discrimination than otherwise. When the witness said the cars would "go over the hill somewhere," he meant that if they kept the track they would go to the tipple of course, but if they jumped the track, as the empty cars had done before the accident, they might go elsewhere and never reach the tipple. Clearly this evidence did not show incompetence on the part of the witness to perform his duties.

We think, therefore, that instructions 1, 5, 7, and 8 should have been given. The first, that the evidence was insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff and that the jury should find for the defendant, if given, however, would have rendered the others unnecessary.

As to the other group of instructions refused, Nos. 10 and 11, we do not think they are pertinent, and they were properly rejected. They are based on the theory that the drum runner was foreman and Lloyd and the other men employed at the drum house were under him. No. 10 tells the jury, on this theory, that, although they might find Lloyd incompetent and unfit for his position, and that he negligently left the blocks open on the occasion of the accident, yet, if they find that the drum runner was skilled, experienced, and competent; and it was his duty to see that Lloyd performed his duties, and could have seen that Lloyd had left the blocks open before starting to run the loaded cars, and, if he had so seen, could have prevented the loaded cars from going over the knuckle but failed therein,—then they must find for the defendant; No. 11 tells the jury, on the same theory, that, if they believe that the accident would not have happened except for the negligence, subsequent to the negligence of Lloyd, of another employee or employees skilled, experienced, and incompetent, they must find for the defendant. These 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

instructions were not justified by the facts proven. It is clearly shown that, although Lloyd was employed at the same place with the drum runner and the other persons referred to, yet he was employed for the distinct purpose of operating the chock blocks, and charged with responsibility thereof; and it cannot be said the other employees had any duty to perform in reference to the blocks, except of a negative character,—that is, not to heedlessly run cars over the knuckle when the blocks were open. Nor do we think the defendant could have been excused for incompetence in Lloyd because of any superior authority over him of the drum runner.

For the reasons assigned, the judgment is reversed, the verdict set aside, and the defendant awarded a new trial.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

RE FRANK KELLY.

(— Cal. —, 99 Pac. 368.)

Pardon — condition — breach — termination of sentence.

The expiration of the term for which a convict was sentenced does not make inoperative a provision in a conditional pardon that, if he is subsequently convicted of crime, he shall serve the unexpired time in addition to that imposed by the new sentence; but he may be compelled to serve out such unexpired term, although his subsequent conviction does not occur until after the expiration of the term of the original sentence.

(December 30, 1908.)

Note.—The few authorities upon the question decided in the foregoing case are collated in Ex parte Prout, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1064, and the case note appended thereto. Since that decision was rendered but one other case involving this question has been reported. That case is State v. Horne, 52 Fla. 125, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 719, 42 So. 388, in which it was held that a provision in a conditional pardon, that, upon a breach of the condition upon which the pardon was granted, it should be the duty of any sheriff immediately to arrest the person pardoned and return him to the penitentiary, to serve out the remainder of his term, referred to the length of imprisonment fixed by the sentence, and not to the particular period of time mentioned in the sentence during which it was to be executed; the latter not being a material or effective part of the sentence.

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to secure the release of petitioner from the custody of the warden of Folsom prison, by whom he was held in confinement for the alleged violation of a conditional pardon. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Beatty, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In April, 1897, the petitioner was sentenced to a term of fifteen years' imprisonment in the Folsom state prison for the crime of burglary. Under the law allowing credits for good conduct,—all of which he earned during the period of his confinement,—his term would have expired on the 14th day of September, 1906. He was, however, discharged from the prison on May 15, 1905, in obedience to a conditional pardon or commutation of his sentence by Governor Pardee. The condition of his release was stated in the proviso: "That if, after said day of discharge, said Frank Kelly shall be convicted of any felony, this commutation of sentence shall become void, and, in addition to the penalty which may be imposed for said felony, he shall be compelled to serve so much of the sentence upon his aforesaid original conviction as he had not served at the time of his discharge under these presents." In January, 1907, the petitioner was again convicted of a felony upon which he was sentenced to a new term of two years' imprisonment at Folsom. This term, less the credits earned and allowed under the statute, had fully expired, but the petitioner was still detained by the warden of the prison, when he commenced this proceeding. The return to the writ shows that there is no warrant for his further detention except the enforcement of the condition stated in the above-quoted proviso of the governor's commutation.

The prisoner was not represented by counsel at the hearing, but contended in his own behalf that the condition annexed to the commutation of his first sentence became inoperative from and after the 14th day of September, 1906, the date when that sentence expired by law, and when, in fact, its expiration was regularly entered in the records of the prison. He does not, as I understand his argument, question the power of the governor, in granting a commutation of a sentence of imprisonment, to annex a condition subsequent, violation of which within the unsatisfied portion of his term will work a forfeiture; but he insists that, after the full term has expired, such a condition is also at an end.

This question, so far as I am advised, is entirely new. No authorities are cited, and I know of none. Regarded as an original proposition, it seems reasonable to say that, since the power of the governor to grant pardons and commutations is absolute under the Constitution, except in cases of prior conviction, the power to annex to a pardon or commutation any reasonable condition, prior or subsequent, is implied upon the principle that the greater includes the less. No consideration of public policy stands in the way of this conclusion, for such action by the governor is in perfect harmony with the policy of the parole system in force in this state, and is a useful and beneficial application of that policy to the class of cases in which the governor would be willing to exercise clemency if he could exact some security for the future good behavior of the prisoner.

I think the present detention of petitioner is not unlawful, and he is therefore remanded to the custody of the warden at Folsom.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

(Department No. 2.)

GOTFRED HANSON, Resp.,

v.

E. R. FOX, Appt.

(— Cal. —, 99 Pac. 489.)

Land contract — tender — default — rescission.

1. One entitled to a deed of land upon payment of instalments covering several months cannot put the vendor in default so as to effect a rescission of the contract by making a present tender of the full amount due.

Same — imperfect title.

2. That the title of one who has contracted to convey real estate at a future time is not perfect is no ground for the rescission of the contract until the time for performance arrives.

(January 5, 1909.)

Case Note. — Effect of tender by vendee of purchase price before due, to put other party in default.

This note is limited strictly to those cases passing on the question whether a vendee has the right to tender the purchase price before it is due, and whether such a tender is sufficient to put the vendor in default. It should therefore be noted that, although there may be many other cases dealing with the question of premature tender as connected with bonds, redeeming of mortgages, etc., they have been expressly excluded from this note.

In accordance with HANSON v. Fox, it seems to have been almost uniformly held APP^{EAL} by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to rescind certain land contracts and to recover moneys paid thereon. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Lucius M. Fall, for appellant:

The tax deed conveyed to defendant an absolute title in fee; and, until that deed had been declared void by a final decree of the court, his title was good and his contract unbreached.

Joyce v. Shafer, 97 Cal. 335, 32 Pac. 320; Shively v. Semi-Tropic Land & Water Co. 99 Cal. 259, 33 Pac. 348; Garberino v. Roberts, 109 Cal. 126, 41 Pac. 857.

Messrs. Conkling & Bretherton, for respondent:

The law implies as one of the conditions and considerations of a contract for the sale of land that the vendor owns the property in question, and that his title thereto be marketable.

that a vendee, whether of realty or personalty, has no more right to tender the payment of the purchase price before due than has the vendor the right to demand it before due. And, if he does so, the vendor loses no rights, nor does the vendee gain any.

In Parbour v. Hickey, 2 App. D. C. 207, 24 L.R.A. 763, it was held, in an action for specific performance of a contract to convey real estate, that the tender of the whole amount of the purchase money before it was due, when the contract provided that part was to be paid in interest-bearing notes, is not a proper tender of the performance of the contract. The court said: "The tender of the whole amount of the purchase money within the twenty days was not what was contemplated by the contract. By the terms of the contract, the defendant Hickey was entitled to receive in cash $2,500 of the purchase money, and the balance in three notes, at one, two, and three years, to bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. This investment of a portion of the purchase money may have been a very material consideration with the defendant Hickey, inducing him to enter into the contract of sale. Clearly, the plaintiff had no right to require the defendant to forego his right to receive the notes, according to the terms of the agreement."

To the same effect is Burns v. True, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 74, 24 S. W. 338, where a person made a premature tender of the whole amount due, represented by several notes for the purchase price of horses.

In Reed v. Rudman, 5 Ind. 409, it was held that a premature tender of land warrants which, on a day certain, were to be exchanged for a tract of land, was unavailing, and therefore did not put the other party in default.

Wilcox v. Lattin, 93 Cal. 588, 29 Pac. 226; Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 307, 25 Am. St. Rep. 123, 27 Pac. 280.

The right to title does not depend on contract, but is given by law.

Ludlow v. O'Neil, 29 Ohio St. 182; Richmond v. Gray, 3 Allen, 27.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant entered into separate contracts for the sale of two lots of land. The contracts were similar in terms. One was made with plaintiff, the other with plaintiff's assignor. In each case a part of the purchase price was paid at the execution of the contract, and the remainder of the purchase price was to be paid at the rate of $10 per month. The unpaid part of the purchase price was evidenced by 35 promissory notes, each for $10, bearing interest at 7 per cent after the dates when respectively they became due. Plaintiff made a tender of the total sum due under these contracts,

558, 25 N. E. 867, it was held that a tender of money in satisfaction of the amount of his bid, by one who, acting as clerk at a public sale, bid off property sold thereat, will not vest the title to the property in him, so as to enable him to recover it from the possession of the seller, where the terms of sale provided for payment in interest-bearing notes, with surety. The court said: "A seller may prefer interest-bearing promissory notes to money, for he may regard it as beneficial to him to secure such notes as an investment, and it is not for the buyer to make an election for the seller. But it is immaterial whether the provision for an interest-bearing note was beneficial or was not, for a party who sells property may stand upon his contract whether it is beneficial to him or not; and it is the duty of the buyer to perform his part of the contract as it is written. A tender required by a contract is insufficient unless it is such as corresponds with the provisions of the contract."

In Abshire v. Corey, 113 Ind. 484, 15 N. E. 685, it was held that tender of payment of a note before due was of no effect.

A case closely related to the above is Schultz v. O'Rourke, 18 Mont. 418, 48 Pac. 634, where it was held that a tender of stock representing an interest in property purchased under a contract reserving to the purchaser the right to rescind at the expiration of one year is premature if made before the expiration of the year.

However, in Eaton v. Emerson, 14 Me. 335, a tender of a note given as the purchase price for land, two days before due, but with the full amount of interest, was held good; and especially so where the vendor admitted the tender and made no objection on account of the time.

and, upon defendant's refusal to accept the tender, he brought this action, treating the refusal as a breach and asking for a rescission. In addition to the matters above set forth, he charged that defendant does not and never has owned the lots which he contracted to sell, and has no title to them other than that evidenced by a tax title, which he charges to be void. The findings of the trial court adopted plaintiff's view, and gave judgment accordingly, from which judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

It is shown by the contracts that plaintiff was not entitled to demand his deed until final payment. In other words, defendant had contracted to convey title to plaintiff thirty-five months after the execution of the contract. The plaintiff's offer of a lump sum, under conditions at variance with the terms of the contract, was not a legal tender under the contract, and could not operate to place defendant in default. In strictness plaintiff had no more right to offer the total sum, and claim rescission because of defendant's refusal to accept it, than defendant would have had to have demanded the lump sum and claim a rescission because of plaintiff's refusal to pay it. The rights of each are prescribed by the contract, and neither party can be put in default by insisting upon a compliance with the terms of the contract, or by refusing to accede to a demand not contemplated by those terms.

Nor does the fact which the court found, namely, that defendant had no title to the lots, afford any reason for the interposition of equity. In a case such as this it is perfectly legal for one to contract to convey title to land which he does not own, and he is in default under such contract only when the vendee has performed his part of the contract and made demand for a title which the vendor is unable to furnish. Such is, and always has been, the settled rule in this state. Thus, in Joyce v. Shafer, 97 Cal. 335, 32 Pac. 320, the vendors, under contract of sale, had actually conveyed the land to a third person, and rescission was sought. This court said: "The conveyance by the vendors was not a breach of the contract. One may sell land which he does not own, and yet be able when the time of performance arrives to furnish a good title. In the meantime the purchaser would not be at liberty to disaffirm the contract on the ground that then the vendor was unable to make a good title. It would be incumbent upon him to offer to perform, or to show that at the time of performance the vendor could not furnish the title."

declaring that a transfer of land to third parties during the existence of an executory contract of sale does not constitute abandonment or rescission of the executory contract, said: "Defendant as yet has not defaulted, and might not suffer default when the balance of the purchase price was tendered and a deed demanded; and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the money paid until he shows the default of the defendant." The same principle is announced and rule laid down in Garberino v. Roberts, 109 Cal. 126, 41 Pac. 857; and it is further said: "In order to put defendant [vendor] in the wrong, it was incumbent upon him [the vendee] to await the time of performance provided in his contract, and thereupon make his tender of performance and demand his deed." So here, whatever may have been the condition of defendant's title, under the contract, he had thirty-five months in which to perfect it, and could not be placed in default until at the expiration of thirty-five months, payments having been duly made by the vendee and demand by the vendee made for the deed, defendant was unable to comply with such demand. The effort to place defendant in default by a tender made in advance of the time, and under circumstances not contemplated by the contract, and to claim the right of rescission because then the vendor could not convey merchantable title, was unavailing and nugatory.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed and the cause remanded.

We concur: Lorigan, J.; Melvin, J.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

JOHN T. DUNCAN

v.

NATIONAL MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

(— Colo. —, 98 Pac. 634.)

Insurance — warranty — dimensions.

1. A statement regarding the dimensions of a building, in an application for insurance, is not warranted correct by a warranty that the description and statement of Case Note. — Insurance; misrepresentation as to dimensions of insured building.

Garrison v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 56 N. J. L. 235, 28 Atl. 8, is the only other case which has been found presenting a question as to the effect of a misdescription of the dimensions of a building insured against fire. In that case one of the conditions of the policy was that, if the insured should the condition, situation, value, occupancy, and title of the property are true.

Same — representation — materiality.

2. A statement of the dimensions of the building in an application for insurance is not within a provision of the policy that it shall be void for misrepresentation of any material fact, if it does not appear that the insured was influenced in issuing the policy because of the statement regarding the dimensions of the building.

Same — value — substantial accuracy.

3. A substantially true statement of the value of a building, in an application of insurance, is a compliance with the warranty of the statement of value.

Same — gross inaccuracy.

4. The valuation at $1,500, in an application for insurance of a building which is worth only $200, cannot be regarded as so approximately correct as to comply with a warranty of the statement of value.

Same — estimation of value.

5. Statements in an application for insurance that the value of the property is estimated by applicant does not prevent a gross overvaluation from avoiding the policy, where the statement of value is warranted.

Pleading — defense — sufficiency — insurance policy — representation.

6. A statement in a paragraph of defense to an action on an insurance policy that applicant represented the value of the property to be a certain amount, is not insufficient to raise the question of breach of warranty if, from the defense as a whole, it appears that the statement of value was warranted to be true.

Insurance — fraud — return of premium.

7. To entitle an insurance company to defeat liability on a policy because of fraud, it is not required to tender back the premium received.

Same — additional insurance — absence of risk.

8. An application for additional insurance will not avoid a policy under a provision therein that it shall be void if assured shall procure any other contract of insurance, whether valid or not, on the property, if both the owner and the company to which the application for additional insurance is made understand that no risk is assumed under it.

Same — vacancy — report.

9. A provision in an insurance policy cause the subject insured to be described "otherwise than it really is, so that the same will be charged at lower premium than otherwise proposed, or such description be false or fraudulent, such insurance will be void and of no effect." By some inadvertence the building was described in the application as 29 by 48 feet, when its dimensions were really 43 by 48 feet. It was said by the court that the question would have to be answered by an appeal to 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

which is to become void if the building becomes and remains vacant for five days, unless continued by consent of the insurer, that it shall be the duty of the owner to report a vacancy within five days of such occurrence and as often as every ten days thereafter, applies only when no permit for vacancy has been issued.

Appeal — insurance — vacancy — permit.

10. The question of the effect of vacancy of a building without knowledge of the insurer, prior to the issuance of a vacancy permit, upon the validity of the policy, cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

Insurance — vacancy — waiver.

11. Issuance by an insurer of a vacancy permit with knowledge that the building has been vacant, waives a forfeiture because of such vacancy.

Trial — absence of instruction — request.

12. Mere failure to instruct the jury on a particular issue is not reversible error, unless a specific instruction, good in point of law, covering the omission, is requested.

Insurance — misstatement of title — waiver.

13. Breach of warranty of a statement of title in an application for insurance is waived if the facts are presented to the agent, and he concludes that the facts establish the title stated, upon which conclusion the statement is inserted in the application.

Same — leasehold — requirement of fee.

14. A policy issued upon an application stating the title to the land on which the building is situated to be a lease is not avoided by a provision in the policy that it shall be void if the land is not owned by the insured in fee simple.

(November 11, 1908.)

CROSS APPEALS from a judgment of the District Court for Boulder County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance; plaintiff assigning cross errors on the sustaining of certain defenses presented by the insurer. Reversed on defendant's appeal.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Guy D. Duncan, for plaintiff:

The inaccuracy in stating the dimensions was not a breach of warranty.

the terms of the condition set out, and the holding was that, if the misdescription caused the insurance to be charged at a lower premium than would have been charged if the building had been properly described, it avoided the policy; otherwise not. Cases involving misdescription as to the number of stories, or other details that affect the character of the structure, present a somewhat different question.

Wilkins v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 57 Iowa, 529, 10 N. W. 916; Martin v. State, 44 N. J. L. 485, 43 Am. Rep. 397; May, Ins. §§ 198, 199; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Lampkin, 5 Colo. App. 177, 38 Pac. 335.

The error was not shown to have been prejudicial to the parties seeking to take advantage of it.

Dillon v. Russell, 5 Neb. 484; De Lappe v. Sullivan, 7 Colo. 182, 2 Pac. 926; Schoolfield v. Houle, 13 Colo. 394, 22 Pac. 781; Andrews v. Carlile, 20 Colo. 370, 38 Pac. 465; May, Ins. § 158.

The risk was not in any way increased or made more hazardous by the change of title.

Wich v. Equitable F. & M. Ins. Co. 2 Colo. App. 484, 31 Pac. 389.

Messrs. Clay B. Whitford and Henry E. May for defendant.

Gabbert, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, the National Mutual Fire Insurance Company, issued a policy of insurance to Duncan, the appellee, whereby it insured a building of the latter, located at Camp Francis, against loss by fire, in the sum of $1,000. Subsequent to the issuance of the policy the building was burned. The company refused to pay the loss, and Duncan brought suit to recover on his policy. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, from which the insurance company prosecutes this appeal.

As a defense to the action, the defendant interposed seven separate defenses. Each of these defenses was challenged by a general demurrer, which was sustained as to the fifth and sixth. The company elected to stand on these defenses. The fifth is as follows: "(5) For a further and fifth defense, this defendant says: That the policy of insurance so issued to the plaintiff by the defendant, as in the plaintiff's complaint set forth, contained the following provision: 'This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations, conditions, and by-laws of the National Mutual Fire Insurance company.' That article 32 of the by-laws of the defendant company is as follows: 'The application, by-laws and policy constitute the entire contract between this company and the insured, and no officer, agent, or representative of the company is authorized, empowered, or permitted to make any other verbal or written agreement in reference to any matter pertaining thereto.' That article 15 of the by-laws of the defendant company is as follows: 'All applications for insurance must be in writing according to the printed forms prepared by the company. The description of the property and its location must be minute and particular, and the applicant must be responsible for the correctness of the application; and any misrepresentation in reference to said property shall void such policy, and no agreement or representation other than expressed in said application shall be binding upon the company.' That an application to the defendant by the plaintiff was made in writing for the issuance of the policy mentioned in the complaint, which said application was duly signed by the plaintiff. That said application contained the following provisions: 'The above statements, notes and by-laws, as printed, shall be the sole basis of this contract for insurance between said company and the insured, and are hereby made a part of this policy, if issued. Having read or heard read the foregoing application, and fully understanding its contents, I warrant it to contain a full and true description and statement of the condition, situation as per diagram, value, occupation, and title of the property to be insured in said company; and I warrant the answers to each of the foregoing to be true.' That said policy of insurance contained the following provision, to wit: 'This entire policy shall be void if the insured has concealed or misrepresented, in writing or otherwise, any material fact or circumstance concerning this insurance or the subject thereof.' And the defendant further says that, in the plaintiff's application for said policy of insurance, the plaintiff falsely stated and represented that the building to be insured was 20 by 30 feet in dimensions; whereas, in truth and in fact, said building was only 16 by 24 feet in dimensions." The sixth defense contains the same averments as the fifth, (so it is claimed by counsel for defendant, and not denied by counsel for appellee), except that, in place of the last paragraph relating to the dimensions of the insured building, it is charged: "And the defendant further says that in the plaintiff's application for said policy of insurance the plaintiff falsely stated and represented that the cash value of the insured building was $1,500; whereas, in truth and in fact, the cash value of said building at the time of said application, and at all times thereafter, did not exceed the sum of $200."

In support of error assigned on the ruling of the court sustaining the demurrer to the fifth defense, it is urged: (1) That the averments relating to the dimensions of the building state a violation of the warranty by the defendant, that his representation regarding the insured property was true; and (2) state in effect that his representation regarding its size was a material misrepresentation, which, by reason of the terms of the policy, voids it. There is certainly no merit in the claim that, according to the averments of the defense under consideration, plaintiff warranted that his statement regarding the dimensions of the building was true. He warranted that his answers touching the description and statement of the condition, situation, value, occupancy, and title of the property were true; but none of these matters referred to the dimensions of the property involved. The provision of the policy with respect to misrepresentations only goes to those representations made by the insured which are material to the risk. In some instances, perhaps, the mere statement of the misrepresentations alleged to have been made by the insured would be sufficient from which to deduce the legal conclusion that they were material to the risk; but, when that is not the case, the insured must state the facts from which it is made to appear that the misrepresentation was material. In order that the falsity of a representation in an application for insurance may be a defense to an action on the policy, its subject-matter must be something which the insurer was entitled to know, and which probably influenced it in determining whether it would enter into the contract. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Lampkin, 5 Colo. App. 177, 38 Pac. 335; Dingle v. Trask, 7 Colo. App. 16, 42 Pac. 186; Wheeler v. Dunn, 13 Colo. 428, 22 Pac. 827; Adams v. Schiffer, 11 Colo. 15, 7 Am. St. Rep. 202, 17 Pac. 21; May, Ins. §§ 181-184. Where a party seeks to avoid a transaction upon the ground that misrepresentations were made to him, it must be made to appear that such misrepresentations were a factor which induced and influenced him to act, so that in defenses of this character it must at least appear, in connection with other essential averments, that the insurer, relying upon the truth of the representations made by the insured, was induced to, and did, enter into a contract of insurance to its injury. The defense under consideration lacks these essential requisites, for the obvious reason that it does not appear from its averments, or from any conclusion which can be logically deduced therefrom, that the insured was influenced in the slightest degree to issue the policy of insurance to the plaintiff, because of his statements regarding the dimensions of the building, or that it has been injured because of the alleged misrepresentations of the insured in this respect. The court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the fifth defense.

According to the averments of the sixth defense, the plaintiff warranted that his answer respecting the value of the property insured was true. It is charged that he falsely stated the cash value of the insured building to be $1,500, when, in truth and in fact, such value did not exceed the sum of 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

$200. The statement of value was contained in the application,—at least, it is so stated in the defense under consideration,—and, by the averments of that defense, it appears that the application is a part of the contract of insurance. Where a statement in an application for insurance is a warranty, and the application is made a part of the contract, the question of the materiality of such statement does not arise, and no recovery on the policy can be had when it appears that the statement warranted to be true is not true. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Lampkin, supra; Bennett v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 50 Conn. 420; School Dist. No. 4 v. State Ins. Co. 61 Mo. App. 597; Prudential Ins. Co. v. Hummer, 36 Colo. 208, 84 Pac. 61; Webb v. Bankers' L. Ins. Co. 19 Colo. App. 456, 76 Pac. 738. In cases of this character some facts warranted to be true must be literally so, while with respect to others there is no breach of the warranty if they are substantially true. This case belongs to the latter class. There is often a marked difference of opinion regarding values of property, and therefore all that can be required, when the issue of the correctness of the statements of the owner of the value of the property insured is involved, is that it appears to be a fair and reasonably truthful valuation, in so far as overvaluation is concerned. Applying this rule to the present case, it is apparent, from the averments of the defense under consideration, that the valuation of plaintiff was so many times greater than that charged as the true value that it cannot be regarded as approximately correct, or accounted for upon the theory that he would naturally value the property for all it was worth.

Counsel for plaintiff calls our attention to the fact that from the record it appears the application contains the following language, "The value of the property being estimated by the applicant." and, because of this statement, urges that plaintiff was only asked for, and merely gave, his opinion of the value. It is doubtful, to say the least, if we would be justified in looking elsewhere than to the defense itself for the purpose of determining its sufficiency; but, in waiving this question, we do not think the language upon which counsel relies relieves plaintiff from the charge of overvaluation. "Estimate," as defined by Webster, is to "judge and form an opinion of the value of from imperfect data; . . . to fix the worth of roughly or in a general way,"—and, while it is true that, where a party merely estimates the value of an article, considerable latitude must be allowed for discrepancies between his estimate and the real value, nevertheless, where an applicant for insurance estimates the value of the property to be insured; and warrants his statements to be true, he is required to state the value with a reasonable degree of accuracy, when the question of overvaluation is involved. A company about to issue a policy of insurance upon a building has the right to be fairly informed by the owner, when requested, as to what the reasonable value of the property is, so that it may be protected from assuming a risk so nearly equal to the actual value of the property insured that the effect might be to cause the owner not to exercise care in protecting his property. If we were justified in looking outside of the defense itself for the purpose of determining its sufficiency, or if we should consider extrinsic facts for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the error committed in sustaining the demurrer was prejudicial, we might call attention to the fact that, although the policy was for $1,000, the jury only returned a verdict for the sum of $725 as the loss sustained by the plaintiff by the total destruction of the building insured. Counsel for plaintiff urges that the defense does not allege that the plaintiff warranted the value of the building to be $1,500, but merely represented it was of that value. This contention is based upon the statement of the last paragraph, which is to the effect that plaintiff falsely stated and represented the cash value of the insured premises to be $1,500. In construing an affirmative defense, the ultimate facts alleged must be determined from the entire defense, and not merely from one or more of the paragraphs thereof. From the other averments of the defense, which we have assumed to be as counsel for defendant claims, it appears that the application was made a part of the policy, and that in such application the plaintiff warranted that his answer touching the value of the property was true, so that, construing this defense as a whole, it appears that there was a breach of the warranty in this respect, because it is charged that in the application the plaintiff falsely stated and represented the cash value of the insured building was $1,500, when, in truth and in fact, it did not exceed the sum of $200.

Counsel for plaintiff also contends that the defense under consideration is insufficient because it does not allege that the company has repaid the premium or any part thereof to the insured. The company is not seeking to rescind its contract of insurance, but to avoid liability thereon because of the fraud of the insured. Where a policy, by its terms, is void by reason of fraud on the part of the insured, the premium cannot be recovered back. Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. Paul, 10 Ill. App. 431; Friesmuth v. Agawam Mut. F. Ins. Co. 10 Cush. 588. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The demurrer to the sixth defense should not have been sustained.

By the third defense it was alleged that the policy contained the following provision: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if the insured now has, or shall hereafter make or procure, any other contract of insurance, whether valid or not, on the property covered in whole or in part by this policy." It is then charged that at no time was any agreement whatsoever respecting other insurance indorsed on or added to the policy. It is further alleged, in substance, that plaintiff, since the issuance of the policy by defendant, procured another contract of insurance in the sum of $500 on the same property, and that he had not given it any notice whatsoever that he had procured such contract of insurance. Plaintiff has assigned as cross error the action of the court in overruling the demurrer to this defense, and further contends the evidence discloses that the policy issued, which the defendant claims voided the policy issued by it, never took effect. Counsel for defendant insists that this contention is immaterial, because the provision in the policy upon which it relies specially provides that procuring any other contract of insurance on the property covered by its policy renders it void. The crucial question is whether there was an assumption of risk by the company which it is claimed issued the second policy, and what insured understood regarding such risk. According to the testimony, plaintiff applied to Mr. Coon for additional insurance in the Mercantile Fire & Marine Insurance Company of Boston. This application was made subsequent to the issuance of the policy by defendant. Mr. Coon testifies, in substance: That plaintiff applied to him for additional insurance; that he did not remember definitely what was said as to when the policy representing such insurance should go into effect; that he thought it was his intention that it should not take effect until he heard from the company; that his recollection was that he said he did not know whether the company would accept the risk, and he would send on the policy for its approval; that he did not extend any credit to Mr. Duncan for the premium, and Duncan did not pay the premium at that time; and that he kept the policy in his office, and sent the report to the company at St. Louis, and in due course of business an order was received canceling it. Plaintiff testified, in substance. That he applied to Coon for a $500 risk in the Mercantile company; that Coon filled out the policy and placed it in his desk, and said it would not go into effect until he was so advised by the company; that he did not pay any premium to Mr. Coon, the latter saying that it was not necessary, as there would be no risk until he was advised by the company that the risk was accepted. From these statements it clearly appears that no risk was assumed by the Mercantile Fire & Marine Insurance Company, that there was no attempt on the part of the agent to make any arrangement which would bind the company until he had advised with those in authority over him, and that the plaintiff understood that the policy written by the agent should not take effect until approved by the company. The requirement in a policy that other insurance covering the same property must be assented to in writing and indorsed on the policy is valid; but that provision is not violated when it appears that the company to which application for additional insurance was made, as well as the owner, understood that no risk was ever assumed by the former.

The seventh defense appears to be based upon a violation of the vacancy-permit clause contained in the policy. This clause is as follows: "If any building becomes and remains vacant for five days the policy thereupon shall become void, unless continued by consent of the company. It shall be the duty of any owner of any building or buildings insured by this company, in case such building shall become vacant, to report the same to the secretary at the home office within five days of such occurrence, and as often as every ten days thereafter during said vacancy. Any failure to make such report shall render his policy void." It is also alleged, in effect: That, on the 12th day of September, 1903, the company issued the plaintiff a permit that the building insured might remain vacant for a period of thirty days from that date; that, on the 27th day of October, following, a second vacancy permit was issued allowing the building to remain vacant for the period of sixty days from that date; and that at no time during the period the building was vacant did plaintiff make any report thereof to the company. It is further alleged that the building was vacant from June 1, 1903, until September 12th, following, and that no reports of such vacancy were made to the company during that period. The evidence discloses that the building was vacant from June 1st, as alleged, that no permit for such vacancy was issued by the company, that the plaintiff at no time reported to the company that the building was vacant, and that from October 12th to the 27th it was vacant without any permit. It also appears from the testimony, which is undisputed, that a representative of plaintiff called on Mr. Coon, the agent of the defendant, and directed his attention to the fact that the vacancy permit issued on September 12th had expired, and requested that a permit be issued allowing the premises to remain vacant for the period of sixty days. Evidently this conversation with Mr. Coon took place after the September 12th permit had expired. As a result of the request then made, the permit dated October 27th was issued. The evidence discloses that the company was not aware of the vacancy of the building from June 1st to September 12th until after the loss occurred. On this record counsel for the company contend that the vacancy of the building from June 1st to September 12th, and the failure of the plaintiff to notify the company each ten days of such vacancy, as well as the failure to notify the company that the building was vacant during the period for which vacancy permits had been granted, rendered the policy void.

When a clause in a contract of insurance is susceptible of two constructions, that one will be adopted which is most favorable to the assured. German Ins. Co. v. Hayden, 21 Colo. 127, 52 Am. St. Rep. 206, 40 Pac. 453; Strauss v. Phenix Ins. Co. 9 Colo. App. 386, 48 Pac. 822. The clause in the policy regarding vacancies is somewhat ambiguous, but we think a fair construction of it is that notice to the company of vacancy of the insured building is only to be given when no permit for vacancy has been issued by the company. The clause under consideration recites, in effect, that, if the building insured remains vacant for five days, the policy shall become void, unless continued by consent of the company; and, in case such building becomes vacant, the duty is imposed upon the insured to report the same to the company within five days of such occurrence, and as often as every ten days thereafter during such vacancy. The evident purpose of this provision is to advise the company that the building is vacant; but, where a permit has been issued by the company, allowing the building to remain vacant for a specified period, no such notice is required, because the company is advised of the vacancy and has assented that it may remain vacant for the period for which a permit has been granted. We think that the language of the permits issued by the company in this case, and incorporated in the defense under consideration, clearly indicates such to have been the construction given the clause relating to vacancies. They recite, in effect, that permission is granted the assured that the building may remain vacant for the respective periods specified, without prejudice to the insured, except that during the vacancies the amount of insurance is reduced one third. Nothing is said therein that notice each ten days during the period for which the permits were issued must be given the company. Our conclusion regarding the construction of the provision under consideration is further strengthened by the fact that, according to the averments of the defense, no reports were made by the insured relative to the building being vacant for the period covered by the permit issued September 12th, and yet, without objection, the company issued a further vacancy permit on October 27th. So far as the argument of counsel for defendant is concerned, we are unable to find that any question regarding the effect of the premises being vacant from June 1st to September 12th following was submitted to the trial judge for determination. The province of this court is to review the action of the trial court, and not its non-action.

An instruction was asked by defendant to the effect that, if the jury found from the evidence that the plaintiff did not, during the period for which a permit for the insured premises to remain vacant had been issued, report such vacancy to the company every ten days, the premises remained vacant after the issuance of such permit, the verdict should be for the defendant, was refused. There was no error in this refusal, for the reasons already given.

An instruction on behalf of the defendant was requested, to the effect that, if it appeared the insured premises were vacant and unoccupied for five consecutive days between October 12th and the 27th, without the consent of the company, the policy was void. This was refused. The refusal was not error. It appears that the company, with full knowledge that the building had been vacant during the period covered by the instruction, issued a further permit. Such action was a waiver of whatever rights it might have had under the clause of the policy above quoted, for the vacancy between October 12th and October 27th.

Error is also assigned upon the action of the court in not instructing the jury on the question of vacancy. Mere nondirection is not reversible error, unless a specific instruction, good in point of law, covering the omission, was requested and refused. No correct request covering the alleged omission was made of the trial court.

The substance of the fourth defense is that in the written application of plaintiff it was stated that he had a ninety-nine-year lease on the ground on which the insured building was located, which statement, it is alleged, was not true, in that plaintiff did not have a lease upon such ground for any period of time at all. The proof shows that the ground upon which the building was situated belonged to the Adit Mining Company, and that he would be compelled to remove it at the pleasure of the company, but that this right of the company would not be exercised unless the ground was needed for mining purposes, and that the necessity for such use was exceedingly remote. According to the further averments of the defense under consideration, it appears that appellant warranted the title to the property insured to be as represented in his application, and the company therefore claims that, under the proofs, the policy was void, because of its provisions that misrepresentation regarding the title would have this effect. The evidence discloses practically without dispute that plaintiff talked with Mr. Coon, the representative of the defendant company, regarding his title to the insured premises, and informed him that he had no written lease; but, under his arrangement with the company owning the ground upon which the building was situated, he had a right to such ground so long as the company did not desire to use it for mining purposes, and that from this information he and the agent concluded that his title was the equivalent of a ninety-nine year lease. It thus appears that the agent of the company had full knowledge of the condition of the title to the ground, and, having issued the policy with such knowledge, the condition therein avoiding the policy, if the title to the property insured was not as represented, was waived. American Cent. Ins. Co. v. Donlon, 16 Colo. App. 416, 66 Pac. 249; State Ins. Co. v. DuBois, 7 Colo. App. 214, 44 Pac. 756; Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, 13 Wall. 222, 20 L. ed. 617; Eames v. Home Ins. Co. 94 U. S. 621, 24 L. ed. 298.

Knowledge of the status of title to property insured and the statements of the assured regarding the title are necessary for the protection of insurance companies, so that they may reduce the temptation to incendiarism to a minimum, and also prevent the owner from being careless with respect to losses occasioned by fire; but where, as in this instance, the company, through its agent, has full knowledge relating to the title of the insured premises, and concludes from the information obtained from the owner, which is correct, that his title is equivalent to a ninety-nine-year lease, and so writes it in the application, the company will not be permitted to say that such statements were false. The policy contained the following clause: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added thereto, shall be void . . . if the subject of insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple." The second defense interposed by the defendant was based upon this clause. An instruction on behalf of the defendant, to the effect that, if it appeared from the testimony that, at the time of the issuance of the policy in suit, the ground upon which the insured building was situate was not owned by the plaintiff in fee simple, the verdict must be for the defendant, was refused. There was no error in this refusal. The company was as much bound by the provision in the by-laws that the application, by-laws, and policy should constitute the entire contract between it and the insured, as was the latter. The application stated that the title of plaintiff was a ninety-nine-year lease, and the company was bound to take notice of what this application disclosed regarding plaintiff's title; and it is therefore estopped from claiming the benefit of any clause in the policy regarding the title of plaintiff which provided that it was to be different from that which he had stated in his application.

We do not deem it necessary to notice in detail other errors assigned by appellant; nor do we regard it as necessary to consider further than we have the cross errors assigned on behalf of the appellee.

For the error of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the sixth defense, the judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

PERCY WADE, Appt.,
v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

(— App. D. C. —)

Gaming — bucket shop.

The keeping of a bucket shop is within the provisions of a statute providing for the punishment of one who shall keep any place for the purpose of gaming.

(March 2, 1909.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Supreme Court convicting him of violating the law against gaming. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Henry E. Davis, Richard O. Thompson, and John E. Laskey, for appellant:

A "bucket shop" is not a gaming room, within the statute.

Case Note. — Bucket shop as "place for gaming."

The question whether a place in which the business of dealing in futures on margins, without intent to make an actual delivery of the property traded in, but with the intention to receive or pay the difference between the agreed price and the market price at the time of settlement, is carried on, is within a statutory provision against gaming houses, was also under consideration in Anderson v. State, 2 Ga. App. 1, 58 S. E. 401, where it is said: "We do not think that at common law such an office would have been a gaming house. We also recognize the distinction between the meaning of the words 'betting,' 'wagering,' 'gaming,' and 'gambling.' Yet we are constrained to hold that, by judicial evolution and legislative enactment the common-law offense of keeping a gaming house has been so broadened in its scope as to include any place wherein persons are allowed to assemble for the purpose of betting, wagering, gaming, or gambling, and especially where such practices are encouraged by the proprietor."

In Kneffler v. Com. 94 Ky. 359, 22 S. W. 446, it was held that a place where persons habitually assembled to engage in betting, winning, and losing money and property, on the prospective rise and fall in stocks, bonds, grains, and other produce, is in law a common gambling house, although there is no penal statute applicable to that particular species of gambling; and the person owning and controlling it is guilty of the offense of keeping a disorderly house.

And in Arenz v. Com. 31 Ky. L. Rep. 321,

v. Allen, 149 U. S. 489-492, 37 L. ed. 823, 824, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 950; White v. Barber, 123 U. S. 392, 31 L. ed. 243, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 221; Higgins v. McCrea, 116 U. S. 671, 29 L. ed. 764, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 557; Board of Trade v. L. A. Kinsey Co. 125 Fed. 72; Boyle v. Henning, 121 Fed. 376; Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Jansen, 47 C. C. A. 497, 108 Fed. 572; Waldron v. Johnston, 86 Fed. 757; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Watson, 30 Fed. 653; Lulley v. Morgan, 21 D. C. 91; Justh v. Holliday, 2 Mackey, 346; Thrower v. State, 117 Ga. 773, 45 S. E. 126; Miller v. United States, 6 App. D. C. 12.

Shepard, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a conviction under an indictment charging a violation of the laws to prevent gaming. The indictment is in two counts. The first is substantially set out in appellant's brief as follows:

"The first count of the indictment, upon which conviction was had, charges that the appellant and said Hedges did set up and keep in the District of Columbia a place for the purpose of gaming, between August 20, 1906, and August 20, 1907, that is, an office in the Ouray building in said District, and, for such purpose of gaming, did engage in and conduct a pretended brokerage business under the name of Wade & Hedges for the making of contracts between them and other persons for the pretended buying on commission for such other persons, as brokers, of shares of the stocks of railroads and other corporations at prices to be agreed upon between them, being the market prices of such shares of stock on the New York Stock Exchange at the time of such transactions as such prices were reported by telegraph to said Wade & Hedges, with no intention on the part of said Wade & Hedges and the pretended buyers in such transactions to deliver the property so dealt in, or that the same should be paid for and received, but with the understanding on the part of both that such transactions should be merely betting and wagering contracts upon the fluctuations in the market prices of the shares of stock so contracted for, and under such bets and wagers, in case there was a rise such buyers should win, and in case there was such fall said Wade & Hedges should win, and that the sums to be paid by the one party to the other in the settlement of such bets and wagers

102 S. D. 238, a conviction for keeping a disorderly house was sustained upon evidence showing the maintenance of an establishment where persons assembled and put up money on futures.

On the other hand, in People v. Todd, 51 Hun, 446, 4 N. Y. Supp. 25, it was held that keeping a room where contracts, in effect wagers upon the fluctuation in the price of stocks, were made, did not violate § 343 of the Penal Code, which provides that "a person who keeps a room . . . to be used for gambling, or for any purpose, or in any manner, forbidden by this chapter, . . . is guilty of a misdemeanor;" the word "gambling" being evidently intended to relate to the games prohibited in the preceding sections, and to embrace them only, which games are those of absolute hazard, not dependent upon legitimate fluctuations in legal business modes. The court said: "The result of the examination of the statute under which the appellant was convicted is that it was aimed at all games of chance, and lotteries, and betting on horse racing and elections, but not against the transactions which distinguish the appellant's as one in the field of strategy, if not in games. If the question were only whether the contracts made by the appellant were gambling transactions, there could be no doubt of the propriety of the judgment rendered herein, inasmuch as the evidence warrants the finding that they were mere disguises for gambling. . . . And the appellant's place of business would be one kept for that purpose; but the appellant was indicted under one of a series of sections relating to the subject of gaming, and designed to cover the methods devices, and hazards then in the legislative mind, and of which the transactions of the appellant form, it would seem, no part."

The statute in question has, however, been amended by chapter 428, Laws 1889, so as to include establishments of the class known as bucket shops. See People v. Wade, 13 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 428, 59 N. Y. Supp. 846.

The keeping of bucket shops is in some states expressly prohibited by law. For cases arising under such statutes, see: Soby v. People, 134 Ill. 66, 25 N. E. 109; *Weare Commission Co. v. should be the difference between the prices of the property as fixed by such pretended contracts of purchase and the market prices thereof at the time of such settlement. Said count then sets up the reverse of the above transaction, wherein the customers are the pretended sellers of stocks, and said Wade & Hedges the pretended buyers thereof, with a like absence of intention on the part of both to deliver, and with the intention on the part of both to settle on differences. And further charges that, for such purpose of gaming by means of said pretended business, said Wade & Hedges maintained at said place and office a blackboard and telegraph instrument, called a ticker, from and through which ticker were received the market prices of shares of stock dealt in and recorded on said blackboard and exhibited to their said customers."

The second count charges the defendants with setting up and keeping a game, device, and contrivance for gaming known as a bucket shop the nature of which is charged as in the first count. A severance was granted and Wade only was tried. The jury returned a verdict of guilty under the first count. Defendant then moved in arrest of judgment on the ground that the indictment charged no offense under the laws of the District. This was overruled, and the single assignment of error is founded thereon.

Section 865 of the Code, which defines the offense, reads as follows:

"Gaming.—Whoever shall, in the District, set up or keep any gaming table, or any house, vessel, or place, on land or water, for the purpose of gaming, or gambling device commonly called A B C, faro bank, E O, roulette, equality, keno, thimbles, or little joker, or any kind of gaming table or gambling device adapted, devised, and designed for the purpose of playing any game of chance for money or property, or shall induce, entice, and permit any person to bet or play at or upon any such gaming table or gambling device, or on the side of or against the keeper thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not more than five years."

Section 868, which relates to the construction of § 865 and others reads as follows:

"What is gaming table.—All games, devices, or contrivances at which money or any other thing shall be bet or wagered, shall be deemed a gaming table within the meaning of these sections; and the courts shall construe the preceding sections liberally so as to prevent the mischief intended to be guarded against."

Two offenses are created by § 865. One is the setting up or keeping of a gaming table or device, the other is the keeping of a house, vessel, or place for the purpose of gaming. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The contention on behalf of the appellant is that transactions of the character charged do not constitute gaming within the letter of the Code, and cannot be converted into gaming because, in the opinion of the court, they may come within its reason and mischief. It is true, as a general principle, that criminal statutes which specifically enumerate acts, or places in which they shall be committed, and make them punishable as offenses, cannot be made to embrace other acts or places merely because they may be said to be within the reason and policy of the law, for the reason that they are of equal atrocity, and of a kindred character. United States v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. 76, 93, 5 L. ed. 37, 42. That case, which is relied on by the appellant in support of his contention, differs widely from this in respect to the question for decision. In declaring the principle above stated, it also affirms the familiar principle that the intention of the law maker must govern in the construction of penal as well as other statutes; and that, while penal statutes are to be construed strictly, they are not to be construed so strictly as to defeat the obvious intention of the legislature. See Miller v. United States, 6 App. D. C. 6, 12. In that case the indictment was for keeping a gaming table, and a place for the purpose of gaming. The specific act charged was what is called "bookmaking" on races—that is, taking bets on the result of races about to be run. "Bookmaking" is not specifically named in the statute. The contention of the appellant was the same as in this case. Chief Justice Alvey, who delivered the opinion of the court affirming the conviction, said: "The definition of a gaming table under the statute does not involve the ordinary mechanical definition of a table, but depends for its statutory meaning upon the means or contrivances adopted for playing the game. If any doubt could arise upon the construction of the terms of the first section of the act of 1883 [which is now § 685, Code], that doubt would seem to be entirely and completely removed by the very explicit terms of the 4th section of the act [now § 868], which was inserted ex industria for the manifest purpose of repelling ingenious attempts to evade the real scope and policy of the act, by subtle and refined distinctions and definitions. . . . This statute . . . was not aimed exclusively at any particular game or species of device for gaming, but was intended, as its title and its broad, comprehensive provisions declare, more effectively to suppress gaming in this District. The reason and policy of the law, as well as its comprehensive language, apply as well to all games and devices then existing, as to all that might be subsequently devised and practised. That being the object to be accomplished, what could be more grossly obnoxious to the provisions of the statute, or more demoralizing to the community, than the existence of places for the making and selling of books and pools upon horse races, baseball games, foot races, dog fights, cock fights, and all other conceivable contests upon which money may be bet or wagered. The great evil and vice of the thing is not in the horse race, foot race, or the baseball game, but in the seductive allurements held out to people, young and old, to frequent the gaming table, or the gambling device, and to indulge in excessive betting, and thereby become the victims of the wily and scheming professional gambler. Whether the game or contest upon which the wager is made be a horse race, foot race, baseball game, or what else, it is quite immaterial, if the thing or contest upon which the bet or wager is made be a game of chance."

With the end in view to prohibit all gaming, the legislature found it impracticable to enumerate each and every kind then practised, and much less so to anticipate the ingenuity of the gambler in devising new schemes for gaming when driven from old and well-known ones. For this reason, evidently, § 868 declared "all games, devices, or contrivances at which money or any other thing shall be bet or wagered shall be deemed a gaming table within the meaning of these sections;" and then, further, that "the courts shall construe the preceding sections liberally so as to prevent the mischief intended to be guarded against."

If "bookmaking" on the result of races, which, when the statutes was enacted, was as well known a form of taking bets and wages as were "bucket shop" transactions, is a contrivance for gaming, then there is no reason why the latter should be excepted from the operation of the statute intended to prevent gaming generally.

However, we are not required, by the demands of the present case, to determine whether one conducting a "bucket shop" sets up or keeps a gaming table within the definition of the statute. This is not the offense on which the conviction arises. Assuming, for the purpose of the argument only, that the ticker and blackboard, as used, do not constitute a gaming table, yet, if the transactions of the bucket shop constitute gaming, one who keeps a place where such transactions are carried on is punishable by the terms of the statute. The scheme is nothing less than the receipt and making of bets on an uncertain event, namely, the probable rise or fall of the market prices of the things pretended to be bought or sold. Betting and wagering of this kind 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) constitutes gaming in the ordinary sense of the word, notwithstanding it may be carried on under the guise of trade contracts. The law looks to the substance, and not the form, in determining the true character of such transactions. The alleged contracts made in the conduct of such transactions have uniformly been denied obligation in civil actions on the ground that they are not contracts in fact, but wagering and gambling schemes, and therefore illegal and void as against public policy. Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S. 499, 511, 28 L. ed. 225, 230, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 160; Embrey v. Jemison, 131 U. S. 336, 345, 33 L. ed. 172, 176, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 776; Pearce v. Rice, 142 U. S. 28, 40, 35 L. ed. 925, 930, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 130; Clews v. Jamieson, 182 U. S. 461, 489, 45 L. ed. 1183, 1196, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 845. In the case first cited it was said: "It makes no difference that a bet or wager is made to assume the form of a contract. Gambling is none the less such because it is carried on in the form or guise of legitimate trade."

Entertaining no doubt that the transactions of the appellant, as charged in the indictment, constitute gaming, it follows that, by keeping a place where such gaming was conducted, the defendant brought himself within the letter of the statute. The court did not err in denying the motion in arrest of judgment. The judgment will, therefore, be affirmed.

MARY L. MOSES, Plff. in Err.,

v.

V. M. AUTUONO.

(— Fla. —, 47 So. 925.)

Damages — determination — breach of contract.

1. Where a contract expressly provides stipulated or liquidated damages for a particular breach of the contract, and the breach alleged is not the one provided for or contemplated in fixing the measure of damages, the loss, if any, sustained by the

Headnotes by WHITFIELD, J.

Case Note. — Applicability of provision for stipulated damages or penalty for delay in the completion of a contract, where the entire contract is abandoned or repudiated.

It seems to be generally held that, where a contract provides for the payment of stipulated damages for a particular breach, such stipulation is applicable only to the breach provided for; and, upon the abandonment or repudiation of the entire contract, the injured party, if his actual damages are the plaintiff because of the alleged breach of the contract, should be determined, not by the stipulation contained in the contract, but by the law.

Same — general — specific.

2. Under a general allegation of damages in an action on a contract, such damages as the law holds to be the direct, natural, and necessary result of the breach complained of may be recovered. Special damages are those that do not necessarily, but do directly, naturally, and proximately result from the breach; and they may be recovered in proper cases on sufficient allegations and proofs.

Contract — lease — breach — damages.

3. For a breach of a contract to lease lands and tenements, the law contemplates compensation for losses that are the natural and proximate result of the breach. In general the measure of damages is the difference between the stipulated rent and the value of the use of the premises.

4. In an action for a breach of a contract for the lease of lands and tenements, under special circumstances warranting it, damages may be recovered for losses that are the natural, direct, and necessary consequences of the breach, when such damages greater, is not limited to the stipulated damages, or, vice versa, if the latter are the greater, he is limited to the actual damages.

In Murphy v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 100 App. Div. 93, 91 N. Y. Supp. 582, affirmed without opinion in 184 N. Y. 543, 76 N. E. 1101, it was held that a stipulation in a contract providing for the payment of a certain sum per day "for each and every day thereafter that such work shall remain incomplete," contemplated merely a delay in full performance of the contract, and, upon the contract being abandoned and afterwards completed by another company, the injured party was not limited to the amount stipulated, but was entitled to recover the actual damages. The court said: "No provision had been made to meet the unlooked-for contingency of total abandonment. - The bed rock of the stipulated sum 'by way of liquidated damages' was the ultimate fulfillment of the contract, so that the rights of the parties could be gauged by that instrument with the work completed. The language employed is, 'Should the contractor fail to finish the work at or before the time agreed upon,' the per diem allowance is to be paid 'for each and every day hereafter the said work shall remain incomplete,' unless 'delayed,' etc. The only reasonable interpretation which can be given to this provision is the one suggested, that the liability for the stipulated sum did not accrue until the contractor had fulfilled his agreement, and consequently it cannot be available to bar the plaintiff recovering the damages actually sustained by him on account of the renunciation of the agreement. The per diem allowance was not to be paid in lieu of per-20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Contract — construction — breach — liquidated damages.

6. Where liquidated damages are stipulated for to compensate for failure to complete a contract, such liquidated damages may not be applicable where there is a refusal to perform any part of the contract, when it is apparent that the parties, in stipulating for liquidated damages, did not contemplate such refusal, but only a failure to complete the contract within a specified time.

In Light, Heat & Water Co. v. Jackson, 73 Miss. 598, 19 So. 771, it was held that a stipulation in a contract for supplying a city with water, providing that, in case a hydrant remains out of order for six days after notice to the company, the company shall forfeit $10 per week to the city for each week such hydrant is permitted to be out of repair, is in the nature of a penalty for the occasional neglect of the company, and not liquidated damages for an entire breach of the contract.

In Watson v. De Witt County, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 150, 46 S. W. 1061 the plaintiff was permitted, besides the stipulated damages for failure to complete a building within a certain time, to recover, also, the actual damages resulting from the abandonment of the contract.

In Curnan v. Delaware & O. R. Co. 138 N. Y. 480, 34 N. In National Contracting Co. v. Hudson River Water Power Co. 118 App. Div. 665, 103 N. Y. Supp. 641, reversed in other points in 192 N. Y. 209, 84 N. E. 965, it was held

The stipulation for the payment of $10 per day was inapplicable in case of a total abandonment and repudiation of the entire contract.

that a stipulation in a contract for the construction of a dam and power plant on a river, providing, in effect, that the contractor agrees that, if the work shall be abandoned, or if the work be delayed or is unsatisfactory, the company shall have the power to notify him to discontinue all work, whereupon he promises to make good what it would cost over the contract price to have the work completed, is not applicable where the contractor totally abandons the contract and takes away his tools, without having been ordered to quit on notice, and the owner himself completes the work. The court said: "It will be noticed that that is an agreement on the part of the contractor. The contractor agrees that, if it 'is wilfully violating any of the conditions or agreements of this contract, or is not executing said contract in good faith,' etc., the company shall have power to notify it to discontinue all work, and, at its discretion, contract with other parties for the delivery or the completion of all or any part of the work left uncompleted by said contractor. The paragraph, it seems to me, conferred a power upon the defendant which it could exercise if it wished, and the provisions of the paragraph became operative only upon the exercise of that power. It meant that if, upon the report of the engineer in charge, the water company was so dissatisfied with the manner in which the contracting company was performing its contract that it notified it to cease work, and then make a new contract with another contractor, in the event that the new contract turned out to be more advantageous to the company than the old, the original contractor was to receive the difference; and if, on the other hand, it turned out less advantageous, the original contractor was to pay the difference up to $25,000. . . . in consequence of any notice to the contractor by the company to cease work that the plaintiff abandoned the job, and the defendant did not exercise its discretion to make a new contract after such notice to the plaintiff to cease work. There was a total abandonment by the National Contracting Company. It quit the works. It took away its tools. It breached the contract. It was not ordered off the premises. No notice was given it to cease work. It walked out, as has been found, unreasonably and wrongfully. The water power company proceeded to do the work itself; and it distinctly notified the plaintiff that, inasmuch as it had abandoned the work, the defendant considered the abandonment and refusal to proceed a breach of contract; and it proposed at once proceeding with the work, and would hold the plaintiff responsible for all damages which it would sustain from such breach of the contract by it. To that measure of damages the plaintiff entered no protest or objection. It therefore seems to me that the provisions of paragraph 'O' of the contract can in no way be applied to the situation as it now exists before this court."

Cases which, although the provision for liquidated damages was only for a particular breach of the contract, and the entire contract was abandoned, were decided on the question whether such liquidated damages were not in fact a penalty, without being in any way related to the question here annotated, have been expressly excluded from this note.

Whitfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error, on January 7, 1907, brought an action in the circuit court for Hillsborough county against the plaintiff in error to recover damages for the breach of a contract dated April 9, 1906, whereby the defendant here agreed to "at once commence the construction, and to complete with reasonable time and despatch, a three-story brick building," equipped in a specified manner, on certain lots in the city of Tampa, and to lease the same to the plaintiff for five years beginning October 1, 1906, at a monthly rental of $200 in advance, with the privilege of renewing the lease for another five years at a rental to be agreed on. The contract made a part of the declaration contains the following provision: "It is further agreed that, if the said party of the first part shall not complete and turn over to the party of the second part said three-story brick building by the first day of October, A. D. 1906, then the said party of the first part shall pay to the party of the second part the sum of ten ($10.00) dollars for each day thereafter until said building is completed, and turned over to the said party of the second part," provided general strikes did not interfere.

The declaration alleges "that the defendant, regardless of her duty and legal obligation to the plaintiff, has failed wholly to keep said agreement, and has not even commenced the construction of said building, and, on May 9, 1906, duly notified the plaintiff that it would be impossible for him to build and complete said building, and that he (meaning the plaintiff) could govern himself accordingly." Plaintiff claims $20,000 damages.

A demurrer to the declaration was overruled. Pleas tendering issues as to the damages sustained by the plaintiff were stricken or demurrers thereto sustained, and the court entered the following judgment: "It is considered by the court that the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant was one for the breach of which the 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

damages were, by agreement, liquidated; and, second, that the contract was an entire one, and that, upon an entire breach of it, the plaintiff was entitled to recover both past and prospective damages in this suit. It is thereupon ordered and adjudged that the demurrer to said pleas be and the same is hereby sustained; and, the defendant having announced in open court that she did not desire to further plead, final judgment is entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the amount of liquidated damages set out in the declaration, to wit, eighteen thousand ($18,000) dollars, which judgment is based solely upon the contract annexed to the declaration, and without the introduction of evidence except the written pleadings. It is thereupon considered by the court that the plaintiff do have and recover of and from the defendant his damages of eighteen thousand ($18,000) dollars and the costs of this suit, to be taxed by the clerk."

A writ of error from this court was taken by the defendant.

The stipulation contained in the contract as to the measure of damages does not cover any and all breaches of the contract, but specifically refers to a breach in failing to "complete and turn over to the party of the first part said three-story brick building by the 1st day of October, A. D. 1906." This provision contemplates only a breach in delaying the completion of the building which the defendant agreed to build and lease to the plaintiff. It does not contemplate, or provide the measure of damages for the breach of the contract alleged, that the defendant "failed wholly to keep said agreement and has not even commenced the construction of said building, and on May 9, 1906, duly notified the plaintiff that it would be impossible for her to build and complete said building, and that plaintiff could govern himself accordingly." Such a breach is a total failure to perform any part of the contract,—not a failure to complete it.

Where a contract expressly provides stipulated or liquidated damages for a particular breach, and the breach alleged is not the one provided for or contemplated in fixing the measure of damages, the loss, if any, sustained by the plaintiff because of the alleged breach of the contract, should be determined, not by the stipulation contained in the contract, but by the law. See Williams v. Vance, 9 S. C. 344, 30 Am. Rep. 26; National Contracting Co. v. Hudson River Water Power Co. 118 App. Div. 665, 103 N. Y. Supp. 641; Fidelity & D. Co. v. Robertson, 136 Ala. 379, 34 So. 933; Murphy v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 100 App. Div. 93, 91 N. Y. Supp. 582; Curnan v. Delaware & O. R. Co. 138 N. Y. 480, 34 N. E. 201; 1 Sedgw. Damages, 8th ed. § 419.

This action is for damages for a breach of the contract by failing or refusing to perform any part of it; and, as the measure of damages for such a breach is not provided for in the contract, the orders and judgment of the court expressly awarding damages under the terms of the contract relating to a breach of a different character are not in accordance with the requirements of the law.

The measure of damages for the breach alleged is to be determined by the application of proper rules of law, and not by the terms of the contract.

Under a general allegation of damages in an action on a contract, such damages as the law holds to be the direct, natural, and necessary result of the breach complained of may be recovered. Special damages are those that do not necessarily, but do directly, naturally, and proximately, result from the breach; and they may be recovered in proper cases on sufficient allegations and proofs. See Jacksonville Electric Co. v. Batchis, 54 Fla. 192, 44 So. 933; 5 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 739; 13 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 175; 2 Sutherland Damages, §§ 418, 419; Benedict Pineapple Co. v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 55 Fla. 514, 46 So. 732.

For a breach of contract to lease lands and tenements, the law contemplates compensation for losses that are the natural and proximate result of the breach. A party is in law held to have contemplated the natural and proximate results of his acts. In general, the measure of damages is the difference between the stipulated rent and the value of the use of the premises. Under special circumstances warranting it, damages may also be recovered for losses that are the natural, direct, and necessary consequences of the breach when they are capable of being estimated by reliable data, and are such as should reasonably have been contemplated by the parties. If the plaintiff, by reasonable exertions or care, could have prevented damages resulting to him by reason of the defendant's breach of the contract, it was his duty to do so, and, so far as he could have prevented losses to himself, he cannot recover damages therefor. See Hodges v. Fries, 34 Fla. 63, 15 So. 682; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Milton, 53 Fla. 484, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 560, 43 So. 495; Brigham v. Carlisle, 78 Ala. 243, 56 Am. Rep. 28. See also Smith v. Where the owner of a sawmill operates in connection therewith a private railroad for the purpose of transporting his employees from the sawmill to their work in the woods, and of hauling logs from the woods to the mill, the servants engaged in operating the log train and the servants riding thereon from the mill to their work are fellow servants; and the owner of the mill is not liable to one of the servants injured in the operation of the train by the negligence of his coservants.

Case Note. — Operatives employed in industrial plant as fellow servants of employees engaged in operation of private railroad conducted in connection therewith.

Upon the general question of what servants are to be deemed in the same common employment apart from statute, where no questions as to vice principalship arise, see note to Sofield v. Guggenheim Smelting Co. 50 L.R.A. 417.

As is indicated in the general note, the decisions upon the question, for the most part, may be referred to two general theories: First, that common employment in the sense used in this note depends solely upon whether the delinquent servant's negligence was a risk contemplated by the injured servant; and, second, that common employment depends on identity of departments of work.

The greater number of the cases upon the subject under consideration follow the first theory, and hold that the operatives in the industrial plant are to be considered the fellow servants of the employees operating the private railroad, although in some of the cases the court does not specifically refer to the theory, or base its decision in terms the mill; and that, while being transported on a log train to his work, he was injured in the wreck of the train caused by its collision with a tree which had fallen on the track; and that the negligence of the master consisted in knowingly permitting the tree, which was dead and in such a bad and defective condition that it was liable at any time to fall upon the track, to remain in such close proximity that it might and did fall on the track. The petition was defective because of the failure to allege that the servant did not know of the location of the tree and its defective condition, or could not have known thereof by the exercise of ordinary care.

CROSS WRITS of error to the Superior Court for Tift County to review a judgment sustaining a demurrer to a complaint in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence; plaintiff com-upon the ground that the risk was assumed by the injured servant.

Thus, in Schwind v. Floriston Pulp & Paper Co. 5 Cal. App. 197, 89 Pac. 1066, it was held that the fact that one who had charge of the tracks and cars of defendant's private railroad to and from defendant's factory, and one who was employed in its electrical department, were in different departments of the business, did not prevent them from being fellow servants.

So, a foreman of a lumber camp, whose duty, in the interest of a common employer, required him to ride on a log train to and from the camp to the mill, was held, in Sanderson v. Panther Lumber Co. 50 W. Va. 42, 55 L.R.A. 908, 88 Am. St. Rep. 841, 40 S. E. 368, to be a fellow servant with the employees of the same employer, engaged in operating such train, and to have assumed the risk of accident occasioned by the negligence of his fellow servants.

And in Railey v. Garbutt, 112 Ga. 288, 37 S. E. 360, a woodcutter and a locomotive engineer in charge of a train used for the purpose of hauling timber to a sawmill and of transporting employees of their common master from the mill to their respective places of work were fellow servants; and the master was not liable to the woodcutter for the negligent act of an engineer, as the former would be presumed to have assumed all of the usual and ordinary hazards of the business in which he was engaged.

So, in Georgia Coal & I. Co. v. Bradford (Ga.) 62 S. E. 193, it was held that a teamster employed by a coal and iron company to assist in hauling a boiler from the furnace plant of the company to its coal mines for use therein in getting out coal for consumption in the furnace and locomotives of the company was a fellow servant with the engineer and fireman of a locomotive operated in the yards of and in connection with such furnace plant. and therefore not 20 L.R.A. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. Felton Hatcher, Buie & Knight, J. J. Murray, and Richard Card for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Fulwood & Murray, for defendant in error:

The plaintiff and the defendant's engineer in charge of the engine and log train were fellow servants.

Ingram v. Hilton & D. Lumber Co. 108 Ga. 196, 33 S. E. 961; Railey v. Garbutt, 112 Ga. 288, 37 S. E. 360.

Evans, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before us on an exception to the dismissal of the plaintiff's case on general demurrer. The petition was brought by Joseph Roland against H. H. Tift to recover damages for a personal injury, and entitled to recover damages from the master for injuries attributable to their negligence. The court said that, under the "consociation or department rule" there could be no hesitancy in holding that the employees mentioned were not fellow servants, but that such rule did not prevail in Georgia.

So, a founder in a blast furnace, although he had nothing to do with the outside work at all, was held, in Adams v. Iron Cliffs Co. 78 Mich. 271, 18 Am. St. Rep. 441, 44 N. W. 270, to be the fellow servant of a locomotive engineer whose duty it was to move cars back and forth upon the furnace track as desired in the business.

And in Buck v. New Jersey Zinc Co. 204 Pa. 132, 60 L.R.A. 453, 53 Atl. 740, it was held that one whose duty it was to do the blacksmith work necessary upon the instruments used in the construction of a manufacturing plant, in making a link for the chain used to hold in position the box of a dump car, was a fellow servant of one engaged in operating the car. The court said: "We cannot avoid the conclusion, therefore, that the blacksmith and the plaintiff were coemployees. Both were employed by the same master; were engaged in the same circle of employment; each was helping to carry forward in his own way a definite portion of the work directed to a common end."

An employee in an extensive lumber mill, who, to save time, rode upon a tram car propelled by steam and used by the mill owner to carry lumber from one portion of the mill to another, was held in McFarlane v. Gilmour, 5 Ont. Rep. 302, to be a fellow servant of the man whose duty it was to keep the track in repair.

In a few cases the court has adopted the second of the theories indicated above.

Thus, in North Chicago Rolling Mill Co. v. Johnson, 114 Ill. 57, 29 N. E. 186, where a common laborer in a mill was injured by contained the following allegations in substance: In February, 1902, Tift owned and was operating a sawmill. In connection therewith he operated a railroad (not chartered) for the purpose of hauling logs to the mill, to be manufactured into lumber, and transporting his employees to and from their work at the mill and in the woods. Early in the morning, and before day, petitioner, who was an employee, with other employees, was being transported on a log train from the mill to the woods to begin work, and while on the way the log train ran against a tree which had fallen on the track, and was wrecked. In the collision of the log train with the obstruction on the track petitioner sustained injuries specifically described. It was not a part of the duty of petitioner to run the train, nor to look after or keep the track in order. The plaintiff, at the time of the injury, was riding on one of the cars of the train, being carried to his work. He was on the train by authority of the defendant, to be transported to his work, and was neither a trespasser nor a coemployee of the servants engaged in running the train. The negligence of the defendant consisted in running the train backwards, in a careless and reckless manner, without proper lights on the forward end of the train, without keeping a lookout for obstructions, and in the recklessness of the servants in charge of the train, who, upon discovery of the log on the track, attempted to break the log or throw it from the track by greatly increasing the speed of the train. It was also alleged that the defendant knew, or could have known, that the tree was dangerously near the railroad track and liable to fall on the same. This latter allegation was amplified by an amendment alleging that the defendant was negligent in permitting the tree to stand in dangerous proximity to the railroad track, and in not removing the tree from a place where it could and did fall on the track; that the tree was in a bad and defective condition, being a dead tree and liable to fall on the track at any time, all of which was known to the defendant, or could have been known by the exercise of ordinary care. It is also alleged that petitioner could not have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence by the exercise of proper care.

The relation of master and servant existed between the plaintiff and defendant at the time of the former's injury. The plaintiff predicates the defendant's liability (1) upon the negligence of the servants in the operation of the train; and (2) upon the negligence of the master in permitting a dead tree which was liable to fall at any time to stand in dangerous proximity to the railroad track. As to the first ground of the negligence of those in charge of a train running upon the defendant's private road, the court, after speaking of the ruling of several cases upon the general subject, said: "That ruling requires that the servants of the same master, to be coemployees, so as to exempt the master from liability on account of injuries sustained by one resulting from the negligence of the other, shall be directly co-operating with each other in a particular business.—i. e., the same line of employment,—or that their usual duties shall bring them into habitual association, so that they may exercise a mutual influence upon each other promotive of proper caution. The idea is that the relations between the servants must be such that each, as to the other, by the exercise of ordinary caution, can either prevent or remedy the negligent acts of the other, or protect himself against its consequences; and, of course, where there is no right or no opportunity of supervision, or where there is no independent will, and no right or opportunity to take measures to avoid the negligent acts of another without disobedience to the orders of his immediate superior, the doctrine can have no application. How can the laborer be profited by a knowledge of the usual manner of doing work in another department, if he is unable, in any reasonable way, while engaged in the proper discharge of his duties, and without disobedience to his immediate superiors, to influence the 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

conduct of the laborers in that department? The instruction was properly refused."

And in Joliet Steel Co. v. Shields, 146 Ill. 603, 34 N. E. 1108, the Johnson Case was followed; and it was held that the foreman of a gang of men engaged in keeping defendant's private railroad in repair was not the fellow servant of men engaged in handling the iron within the mill. In speaking of who were fellow servants in the sense used in this note, the court said: "One person may be employed to transact one department of business, and another may be employed by the same master to transact a different and distinct branch of business; but, if their usual duties bring them into habitual association, so that they may exercise a mutual influence upon each other promotive of proper caution, such persons might be regarded as fellow servants."

In Keystone Mills Co. v. Chambers (Tex. Civ. App.) 118 S. W. 178, the facts were very similar to those in ROLAND v. TIFT, and the court held that the injured employee was not a fellow servant of the employees in charge of the train, inasmuch as he did not come within the terms of the statute providing which of the servants of those operating a railroad are fellow servants with each other. But this note was not intended to include cases involving statutes which expressly declare who are fellow servants.

liability: It does not appear what was the exact character of the plaintiff's work; but, as it is alleged that he was being transported to his work in the woods at the time he sustained his injuries, and that the train on which he was riding was a log train, employed in hauling logs to the mill, he was probably a woodcutter, whether employed as a woodcutter or performing other work in the woods; and it clearly appears that the plaintiff's employment was connected with the operation of the sawmill. There is an averment that the plaintiff was not a coemployee of the servants engaged in operating the train. This allegation, however, is but the statement of the legal conclusion that the relation of fellow servant did not exist between the plaintiff and the servants in charge of the train from the facts alleged. This conclusion is unwarranted. The petition discloses that the master was engaged in operating a sawmill, and, in the conduct of its business, used various instrumentalities, and assigned his servants to the discharge of duties in the different departments of his enterprise. One set of servants managed the train which conveyed other servants to and from their work in the woods, and hauled the logs cut by them to the mill. Another set of servants cut the trees into logs ready to be manufactured into lumber. Others loaded them on the train to be conveyed to the mill, and still other servants operated the mill. All of those servants were engaged in labor for the furtherance of the general purpose of the business in which they had contracted to serve, and were fellow servants within the purview of Civil Code 1895, § 2610, which provides that, "except in case of railroad companies, the master is not liable to one servant for injuries arising from the negligence or misconduct of other servants about the same business." Georgia Coal & I. Co. v. Bradford, 131 Ga. 289, 62 S. E. 193; White v. Kennon, 83 Ga. 343, 9 S. E. 1082; Ellington v. Beaver Dam Lumber Co. 93 Ga. 53, 19 S. E. 21; Railey v. Garbutt, 112 Ga. 288, 37 S. E. 360. Whether the transportation of the plaintiff was gratuitous, or whether it was included in the contract of service, in either case (there being no special payment for the transportation) the plaintiff's transportation to the woods was incident to the service which the plaintiff was to perform, and closely connected with it. Gillshannon v. Stony Brook R. Corp. 10 Cush. 288; McGuirk v. Shattuck, 160 Mass. 45, 39 Am. St. Rep. 454, 35 N. E. 110; 2 Labatt, Mast. & S. § 624. So that the alleged acts of negligence of the defendant's servants in the operation of the log train afford no basis for an action against the defendant. They and petitioner were fellow servants, and the defendant is not liable for any injury occasioned to the plaintiff by the negligence of his coservant in operating the train.

It is alleged, secondly, that the master was negligent in knowingly permitting a dead tree to remain so near the track that from its defective condition it was liable at any time to fall upon the track. While the servant was riding to his work in the course of his employment, the reciprocal obligations of himself and the master were not different from those in which they stood after the servant had reached his destination and commenced work in his particular department. The master owes a duty to furnish his servant a reasonably safe place in which to work; and, if there are dangers incident to an employment, unknown to the servant, of which the master knows, or ought to know, he must give the servant warning in respect thereto. But the servant assumes the ordinary risks of his employment, and is bound to exercise his own diligence to protect himself. In suits for injuries arising from the negligence of the master, where the dereliction of duty consists in a failure to provide a safe place for work or a failure to warn the servant of an unknown danger, the servant must not only make it appear that the master failed to perform his duty in furnishing a safe place to work, or to warn him of unknown dangers, but also that the servant injured did not know, and had not equal means of knowing, the defective condition of the instrumentality employed or of the danger, and, by the exercise of ordinary care, could not have known thereof. Civil Code 1895, §§ 2611, 2612; Turner v. Seville Gin & Warehouse Co. 127 Ga. 555, 56 S. E. 739. The duty of the master who transports his servants to their work, in providing safe carriages for their use, where separate compensation for the transportation is not charged, is somewhat analogous to the duty to provide a safe place to work. The fundamental basis of liability of a master to a servant injured in his employment is the master's violation of duty. The servant's assumption of risk becomes, by force of the cited Code sections, a term of the contract of employment by which the servant impliedly agrees that dangers of injury which are incident to the discharge of the servant's duty shall be at the servant's risk. No right of action arises in favor of the servant at all until it is made to appear that the master has violated his duty, and the servant cannot recover of the master damages for an injury resulting from a risk he has legally assumed. It is therefore essential that the servant, in formulating his cause of action against the master, shall allege facts from which the master's dereliction of duty is made to appear. He must allege either in so many words, or in the statement of facts from which the implication may be drawn, that the injury was not the resultant of a risk of danger assumed by him. See Allen v. Augusta Factory, 82 Ga. 79, 8 S. E. 68; Worlds v. Georgia R. Co. 99 Ga. 283, 25 S. E. 646. In describing the tree and its location, the plaintiff states that it was a dead tree, that it was near the track, and, because of its defective condition, it was liable at any moment to fall upon the track. The condition of the tree was patent; and, from the plaintiff's failure to otherwise aver, we must assume that he knew, or at least had equal means with the master of knowing, the defective condition of the tree. The provisions of the Code section previously cited require that a servant, when he sues for an injury caused by the master's failure to provide for him a safe place to work, or to give him warning of a danger incident to his work, must allege and prove that he did not know of the defective condition or of the danger, and could not have known thereof by the exercise of ordinary care. The petition is defective in failing to allege that the plaintiff neither knew, nor could have known, of the defective condition of the tree which fell across the track, derailing the train and resulting in his injury.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error rely strongly on the case of Corley v. Coleman, 113 Ga. 994, 39 S. E. 558. In many respects that case on its facts is very similar to the case in hand. But in that case the plaintiff distinctly alleged that, while the condition of the tree which fell upon the track was such as to imperil the lives and safety of the employees upon passing trains, the fact that it was in such condition was not known to the injured servant, and could not have been discovered by him by merely passing the tree. There is no such averment in the petition in this case, and the failure to allege lack of knowledge of the danger or defective condition of the tree by the servant distinguishes this case from Corley's Case.

SEDGWICK COUNTY, et al., Pliffs. in Err.,

v.

WILLIAM WOLF et al.

(— Kan. —, 98 Pac. 237.)

School district — boundaries — petition to change.

1. Although the statute contemplates the filing of a petition with a county superintendent for the change of boundaries of a school district as a basis for the issuance by him of a notice setting a time for a hearing upon the requested change, yet, where a verbal request is made for the change, and proper notice is given, the interested parties appear, the order is made, appeal is taken to the board of county commissioners, and the order is affirmed, the proceeding is only irregular, but is not void.

Same — change — collateral attack.

2. Such an order so made and affirmed is final, and is not subject to collateral attack in an action for injunction.

Same — officers — detachment of territory.

3. Upon the detachment of the territory within which a school-district officer resides from the school district of which he is an officer, his office immediately becomes vacant ipso facto, and may be filled by appointment.

Quo warranto — public office — illegal holding.

4. Quo warranto, and not injunction, is the proper remedy for an illegal holding of a public office.

Case Note. — Effect of detachment from a political division, of territory in which an officer resides, upon his tenure of the office.

Where a county is divided by act of legislature for the purpose of forming a new county; and it so happens that a county judge of the original county resides in that portion set off as a new county,—his office as county judge ceases; and he is no longer competent to act under his commission. People v. Morrell, 21 Wend. 563; State ex rel. Ives v. Choate, 11 Ohio, 511.

It was held in Mauck v. Lock, 70 Iowa, 266, 30 N. W. 566, that, where a road supervisor, by reason of the restricting of a township, ceases to be a resident of the district for which he was elected, he ceases to be a supervisor. This case distinguishes State ex rel. Gill v. Milwaukee County, infra, on the ground that, although the boundaries of the district from which the county supervisor in the latter case was elected were changed, the decision turned upon the fact that his duties were not local; and that, on the other hand, he was essentially a county officer.

And in State ex rel. Hartshorn v. Walker, 17 Ohio, 135, it was held that, upon the formation of a new county from part of the territory of another, county commissioners whose residence was thereby changed to the new county ceased to hold office in the event of their failure immediately to remove within the new limits of the old county.

A justice of the peace commissioned for ERROR from the District Court for Sedgwick County to review a judgment denying relief in an action brought to enjoin certain actions of the school board for District No. 116 in that county. Affirmed.

Statement by Smith, J.:

This action was brought August 7, 1906, for the purpose of having the order of A. D. Taylor, county superintendent of public instruction of Sedgwick county, which purports to detach a portion of the territory of school district No. 116 in that county therefrom and attach it to school district No. 141, declared invalid, and to enjoin the individual defendants from exercising the duties of the several offices of director, treasurer, and clerk of school district No. 116, and from exercising the duties of the official school board of said district. The action was brought in the name of school district No. 116, and H. Schirenbeck, H. R. Goodman, and Alice Yoder, who claimed to hold the respective offices and to constitute the school board of the district. On April 13, 1906, the county superintendent of public instruction, at the request and suggestion of residents of the school district, issued a notice of a hearing on the application to change the boundaries of the school district.

The notice of such hearing was duly posted, and, on the ensuing May 12th, the hearing was duly had. All of the individual plaintiffs in error were residents of the territory proposed to be detached, and they, with a number of other residents of such territory, appeared at the hearing, and opposed the allowance of the application. The application, however, was allowed, and they appealed from the decision of the superintendent to the board of county commissioners, and the board of county commissioners affirmed the decision in June, 1906. Thereupon the county superintendent appointed a director and clerk of the school district, evidently assuming that, by the detaching of the territory in which each of the old members of the school board resided, a vacancy occurred in each of said offices. It appears that two school-district meetings were held on July 19, 1906, at one of which Alice Yoder claims to have been re-elected clerk and Schirenbeck and Goodman claim to have continued in office by reason of the nonexpiration of the respective terms for which they had theretofore been elected. At the other annual school meeting of school district No. 116 on the same date the defendants claim, respectively, to have been elected director, treasurer, and clerk of the a certain county ceases to be a justice of that county upon a division thereof for the purpose of forming a new county, in case his place of residence is in the territory taken from the original county. Respublica v. McClean, 4 Yeates, 399.

Where the result of the creation of a new judicial circuit is to make a judge of the original circuit a nonresident thereof, his office does not become vacant on account of the nonresidence until he has been allowed a reasonable time for removing to the circuit for which he was appointed. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Messmore, 14 Wis. 177.

Although an office becomes vacant by statute upon an officer ceasing to be an inhabitant of the district for which he was elected, a duly elected road overseer does not lose his office because of a change in the district from which he was elected, which placed his residence outside thereof, such change being prospective in its operation. State ex rel. O'Connell v. Nelson, 7 Wash. 114, 34 Pac. 562.

In Re Wood, 34 Kan. 645, 9 Pac. 758, it appeared that a portion of a township had been transferred by act of legislature from one county into the boundaries of a newly formed county, and a justice of the peace residing in that part of the township detached assumed to act in that capacity for the new county. It was held that he was without authority to do so because the action of the legislature in detaching the part of the township in which the justice resided ousted him from office.

And see Frazer v. Miller, 12 Kan. 459, where it was said that, where a township was divided, and one of its two justices was thrown into the new township, a vacancy in his office occurred, as upon a voluntary removal from the original township.

But State ex rel. Gill v. Milwaukee County, 21 Wis. 449, holds that, although the boundaries of a district from which a supervisor had been elected were so changed that he ceased to be a resident of his district yet he did not thereby cease to be a supervisor. The decision is upon the ground that the office in this case was not local or strictly representative as to the election district, but that such divisions were for convenience merely in providing for the continuance of the body corporate.

In State v. Hixon, 27 Ark. 398, on a demurrer to an information filed in quo warrant proceedings for the removal of a sheriff from office, it was held that an act of the legislature in creating a new county, and thereby changing the sheriff's place of residence so as to constitute him a nonresident of the county for which he was elected, did not of itself cause a forfeiture of his office. It is suggested in this case that a person who persists in exercising the duties of a sheriff of a county for an unreasonable time, while he remains a nonresident of it, may perhaps be found guilty of a misdemeanor in office; but it is not until conviction thereof before a competent tribunal that he can be removed from his office.

school district. The probate court issued a temporary injunction in the absence of the district judge, and, on the trial of the case in the district court, the court found the issues in favor of the defendants, and denied a permanent injunction.

Mr. John W. Adams, for plaintiffs in error:

The act detaching the territory was void as requisite written notice of the proposed change was not made.

Messrs. D. M. Dale and S. B. Amidon, for defendants in error:

The action of the county superintendent altering the boundaries cannot be attacked in a collateral proceeding.

School Dist. No. 8 v. Gibbs, 52 Kan. 564, 35 Pac. 222; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 37; Topeka v. Dwyer, 70 Kan. 244, 78 Pac. 417, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 239; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Lyon County, 72 Kan. 16, 82 Pac. 519, 84 Pac. 1031; Levitt v. Wilson, 72 Kan. 160, 83 Pac. 397; Chaves v. Atchison, 77 Kan. 176, 93 Pac. 624.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal questions presented in this case are: (1) Was the order of the county superintendent affirmed by the board of county commissioners detaching the territory from school district No. 116 and attaching it to another school district valid? (2) If this order was valid, it being conceded that each member of the school board at the time the order was made and thereafter was a resident of the detached territory, did this ipso facto create a vacancy in each of the offices of said school board?

1. The plaintiffs in error contend that the county superintendent had no authority to issue the notice of the hearing on the application for a change of boundaries of the school district, for the reason that no written petition had been presented to him requesting the same. It is said in State v. Secrest, 60 Kan. 641, 645, 57 Pac. 500, 502: "No express provision is made for a petition to the county superintendent, but written notice of the proposed change of districts is specifically required, and therefore the statute plainly contemplates that a petition shall be made for the proposed change; and this is the basis of the notice given by the county superintendent." Assuming that the word "petition" as used in that case means a written petition, the county superintendent in this case acted irregularly in issuing the notice upon a verbal request only. The record, however, discloses that a proper notice was issued and properly posted; also, that a large number of the residents of the territory proposed to be detached appeared at the hearing, and, upon receiving an adverse decision, appealed from the action of the county superintendent to the board of county commissioners, which board affirmed the decision of the county superintendent. There is no question but that all the parties concerned fully understood the issue involved, and had a full and fair opportunity to be heard; that, after a full hearing was had, the order was made, was appealed from, and affirmed. The proceeding was irregular in its inception, but is not void.

A portion of § 6121, Gen. Stat. 1901, reads: "If in the formation or alteration of, or refusal to form or alter, school districts, any person or persons shall feel aggrieved, such person or persons may appeal to the board of county commissioners, who shall confer with the county superintendent, and their action shall be final. . . ." Great precision and formality, especially in the absence of an express requirement of statute, should not be held imperative in quasi judicial proceedings of this character. The order of the county superintendent as affirmed is valid, and is final. Neither can the plaintiffs in error interfere by injunction with the management and control of the school affairs of school district No. 116 in which they no longer have an interest. School Dist. No. 8 v. Gibbs, 52 Kan. 564, 35 Pac. 222.

2. As to whether the removal of a school-district officer by a detachment from the district of the territory in which he resides creates a vacancy in the office, the authorities are not uniform. See 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 426. In the early case of Williams v. School Dist. No. 1, 21 Pick. 75, 32 Am. Dec. 243, it was held that a clerk of the school district "is competent to act as such, although he has removed into an adjoining district in the same town, and another has been chosen in his stead, but not sworn." The reason for the decision is set forth in the following excerpt from the opinion: "The Revised Statutes (chap. 23, § 27) provide that the district shall choose a clerk to be sworn, etc., and who shall hold his office until another shall be chosen and sworn in his stead. The manifest intent seems to have been that there should at all times be a recording officer charged with the duty of keeping a record of the proceedings and votes of the district. In this case the district had proceeded to choose another, but, until he was qualified, we think by force of the statute, the former clerk was competent to act." In Salamanca Twp. v. Wilson, 109 U. S. 627, 27 L. ed. 1055, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 344, it is decided that "the removal of a treasurer of a township in the state of Kansas from the limits of the township into the limits of an adjoining township, without resigning his office, does not vacate the office so as to invalidate service of summons upon him in his official capacity for the purpose of commencing an action against the township." In the opinion it is said: "There is nothing in the Constitution or laws of Kansas which requires a township treasurer to be a resident of or voter in the township when elected or qualified; neither is there anything which vacates the office if the officer removes from the township during the term for which he was elected. Justices of the peace are township officers, and as to them it is expressly provided that they 'shall reside and hold their office in the township for which they shall have been elected.' Dassler's Comp. Laws 1879, chap. 110, p. 978 (5970) § 4. As no similar provision is made in respect to any other township officer, the implication necessarily is that actual residence in the township is not required of them. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius." This decision is based expressly upon the absence of any requirement in the statute that the treasurer of a township should be a resident of the township when elected and qualified. Also it expressly implies that, if there were such a requirement in the statute, the rule would be different. In passing, it may be said that, soon after the publication of this decision, the statute of Kansas was amended in the respect suggested. The school laws of Kansas (§§ 6125, 6127, Gen. Stat. 1901), in effect, limit the choice of director, clerk, and treasurer of a school district to such electors thereof as shall have been in good faith residents of the district for thirty days next prior to the election. As to whether the detachment of the territory in which an officer lives constitutes a removal of residence, this court, in Frazer v. Miller, 12 Kan. 460, has settled the policy of this state. In the syllabus it is said: "Where, by the division of a township, one of its two justices is thrown into a new township, there is created a vacancy in the office of justice of the original township which may be filled by appointment." In the opinion by Mr. Justice Brewer it is said: "He was removed from the township, not by his own volition, but by the act of partition. The result is the same, though the manner of accomplishment is different."

We conclude that, when the detachment of the territory in which all the members of the old school board resided became final by 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the affirmation of the decision of the county superintendent by the board of county commissioners, the offices of the director, treasurer, and clerk of the school district No. 116 immediately became vacant ipso facto. The incongruity of a contrary holding is apparent when it is considered that the entire business management of the school district would thereby be turned over to officers who derive no emoluments from their offices, and who have no interest in the affairs of the district. Making the school district a party plaintiff to this action, in which it could in no event thereof derive a benefit, is a more specific illustration. Were the contrary view the law, however, this action could not be maintained by the plaintiffs. Quo warranto, and not injunction, is the proper remedy for the illegal usurpation of an office.

Much is said in the briefs of the violation or ignoring of the temporary injunction issued in the case by the probate judge. Even if the probate judge had jurisdiction to issue a temporary injunction which this writ purports to be (State ex rel. Bender v. Johnston [Kan.] 97 Pac. 790), the question of a contempt thereof is not involved in this action.

The District Court determined the issues in this case in favor of the defendants in error, and the judgment is affirmed. The costs in this court will be taxed to the plaintiffs in error other than School District No. 116.

C. C. COLEMAN, Plff. in Err.,

v.
F. P. MACLENNAN.

(— Kan. —, 98 Pac. 281.)

Libel — privileged communications — candidate — character.

1. If the publisher of a newspaper circulated throughout the state publish an ar-

Headnotes by BURCH, J.

Case Note. — Libel and slander; privilege as affected by extent of publication.

It is intended to include herein only cases which have considered the question of privilege as affected by excessive publicity. Cases passing on the question as to whether or not the doctrine of privilege applies, and also cases considering the question of privilege as affected by the character of the publication, are excluded.

General doctrine.

The general rule is that the publication of defamatory matter, false in fact, is in ticle reciting facts, and making comment relating to the official conduct and character of a state officer, who is a candidate for re-election, for the sole purpose of giving to the people of the state what he honestly believes to be true information, and for the sole purpose of enabling the voters to cast their ballots more intelligently; and the whole thing is done in good faith,—the publication is privileged, although the matters contained in the article may be untrue in fact, and derogatory to the character of the candidate.

Same — newspaper — limitations.

2. Generally publication should be no wider than the moral or social duty to publish. If it be designedly or unnecessarily or negligently excessive, privilege is lost. But, if a state newspaper published prilaw malicious; and the injured party has an action for damages therefor. The exception to this rule is when the cause or occasion of a publication is such as to render it properly necessary for common convenience and the general welfare of society that the party making it should be protected from liability. This circumstance rebuts the inference of malice otherwise arising from the publication, and the publisher is liable only on proof that in making the publication he was actuated by a malicious motive. One way of proving malice in such cases is to show that the publication or communication was not primarily confined to persons having a corresponding interest in the subject-matter of the publication or communication.

While it is a question for the court in the first instance to determine whether a defamatory statement, if made in good faith and without malice, is privileged, yet the injured party has the right, notwithstanding the privileged character of the communication, to go to the jury if there is evidence tending to show actual malice, as when the occasion of their utterance is such as to indicate by its unnecessary publicity, or otherwise, a purpose wrongfully to defame the injured person. Dale v. Harris, 109 Mass. 193; Brow v. Hathaway, 13 Allen, 239.

But privilege is not defeated by the mere fact that the alleged libelous statements were made in the presence of others than the parties immediately interested. If, however, given unnecessary publicity, this circumstance is material to show malice in fact, and that the occasion was improperly sought or used to utter defamatory words. The conclusion to be drawn from such circumstances, however, is one of fact, to be drawn by the jury, and not by the court. Brow v. Hathaway, supra.

The leading case on this subject is Too-good v. Spyring, 1 Crompt. M. & R. 181, wherein it was held error for the trial court to have decided, as a matter of law, that a communication otherwise privileged lost its privileged character because made in the presence of a third person not interested in the subject-matter thereof. In reaching this 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

marily for a state constituency have a small circulation elsewhere, it is not deprived of its privilege in the discussion of subjects of state-wide concern because of that fact.

Appeal — findings — instructions.

3. If, on the trial of a suit for libel, the jury should find specially from the evidence that the plaintiff suffered no damages from the publication complained of, it will not be presumed that the finding was induced by instructions regarding particular questions in the case not related to that of damages; and the question whether such instructions misstate the law becomes immaterial because they could not affect the plaintiff's substantial rights.

(November 7, 1908.)

conclusion, the court enunciated the principles applying to the question of privilege, which have been quoted from with approval in a great majority of the cases in this country and England, which have had occasion to consider the subject. The court said: "In general, an action lies for the malicious publication of statements which are false in fact, and injurious to the character of another (within the well-known limits as to verbal slander), and the law considers such publication as malicious, unless it is fairly made by a person in the discharge of some public or private duty, whether legal or moral, or in the conduct of his own affairs, in matters where his interest is concerned. In such cases the occasion prevents the inference of malice, which the law draws from unauthorized communications, and affords a qualified defense depending upon the absence of actual malice. If fairly warranted by any reasonable occasion or exigency, and honestly made, such communications are protected for the common convenience and welfare of society; and the law has not restricted the right to make them within any narrow limits. . . . I am not aware that it was ever deemed essential to the protection of such a communication that it should be made to some person interested in the inquiry, alone, and not in the presence of a third person. If made with honesty of purpose, to a party who has any interest in the inquiry (and that has been very liberally construed, [a]), the simple fact that there has been some casual bystander cannot alter the nature of the transaction. The business life could not be well carried on if such restraints were imposed upon this and similar communications, and if, on every occasion in which they were made, they were not protected unless strictly private. In this class of communications is, no doubt, comprehended the right of a master bona fide to charge his servant for any supposed misconduct in his service, and to give him admonition and blame; and we think that the simple circumstance of the master exercising that right in the presence of another does, by no means of necessity, take away from it the ERROR to the District Court for Shawnee County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for libel. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frank L. Williams, Charles Blood Smith, and John E. Hesslin, for plaintiff in error:

False charges concerning a public officer or candidate for public office, imputing to him corrupt or criminal conduct, are not privileged, although they are published without malice.

protection which the law would otherwise afford. Where, indeed, an opportunity is sought for making such a charge before third persons, which might have been made in private, it would afford strong evidence of a malicious intention, and thus deprive it of that immunity which the law allows to such a statement, when made with honesty of purpose; but the mere fact of a third person being present does not render the communication absolutely unauthorized, though it may be a circumstance to be left with others, including the style and character of the language used, to the consideration of the jury, who are to determine whether the defendant has acted bona fide in making the charge, or been influenced by malicious motives."

In Chaffin v. Lynch, 84 Va. 884, 6 S. E. 474, although not within the scope of this note as to facts, the doctrine was enunciated that, if the communication complained of went beyond the occasion and was unnecessarily defamatory, or was more extensively published than the circumstances of the case reasonably required, it would not be protected although the defendant honestly believed that in all he did he was discharging his duty.

In Morton v. Knipe, 128 App. Div. 94, 112 N. Y. Supp. 451, the court also expressed the opinion that mere privilege of occasion did not protect a libelous communication made knowingly, or carelessly, in the hearing of those not concerned.

The existence of a malicious motive may be legitimately gathered from the circumstances under which the communication was made, as where an opportunity was sought to make it before third persons not legally interested in hearing it, rather than to those interested. Fahr v. Hayes, 50 N. J. L. 275, 13 Atl. 261.

What is excessive publication.

The following cases illustrate the extent to which defamatory matter may be published without losing the right of conditional or qualified privilege because of unnecessary or extensive publicity; also restrictions on the extent of the publication: 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

—publications in newspapers.

In Mertens v. Bee Pub. Co. 5 Neb. (Unof.) 592, 99 N. W. 847, the court expressed the opinion that a libelous publication relating to a candidate for public office, otherwise privileged, was not affected by the mere fact that the newspaper containing the publication was incidentally brought to the attention of others than those for whom it was intended.

A libelous publication made by church officials in good faith, defamatory of the pastor of their church, confined to church papers of the same faith, is privileged, even though such papers are also incidentally circulated outside the church members. Redgate v. Roush, 61 Kan. 480, 48 L.R.A. 236, 59 Pac. 1050 (cited and commented upon in COLEMAN v. MACLENNAN).

The fact that an otherwise privileged libel relating to the conduct of a minister of the gospel is published in church papers which, while generally circulating among the membership of the faith of such minister, also circulate outside the membership, does not remove the privilege. Shurtleff v. Stevens, 51 Vt. 501, 31 Am. Rep. 698.

But in the foregoing case, the court expressed the opinion that without doubt a publication might be so made as of itself to bear palpable evidence of malice, as where made in an unusual number of papers having circulation outside the circle of readers who would be legitimately interested in the facts.

A notice by a tradesman to his customers not to pay their accounts to a former employee does not lose its privileged character by the mere fact that it was published in a newspaper which circulated outside the routes of the publisher's business; nor does that fact necessarily prove malice. It is, however, evidence of express malice to be considered by the jury. Hatch v. Lane, 105 Mass. 394.

In Buckstaff v. Hicks, 94 Wis. 34, 59 Am. St. Rep. 853, 68 N. W. 403, although doubt was expressed by the court as to whether or not the publication complained of came within the doctrine of privilege, the question was considered as to the loss of privilege by the publication in a newspaper having a circulation outside a senatorial district of a senator, with reference to whose character the publication in question contained libelous statements. Under these circumstances, the court said that the claim that there was any duty, public or private, resting on the defendant to publish such a charge against the plaintiff in localities outside his senatorial district, wherein the paper circulated, was to demonstrate the absurdity of the claim; and added that there was not only no duty, but that there was certainly no tangible interest in the subject-matter, on the part of people outside the district. From this fact the court said it was plainly to be seen that the publication, even if it could be considered as privileged and made to the citizens of that senatorial district who might be said to be interested in the subject-matter, could not be made broadcast to the world and preserve its privileged character; that, in order to be privileged, it must have been confined to the people to whom the defendant owed a duty to speak, or who had an interest with the defendant in the subject-matter.

St. Rep. 135, note; Star Pub. Co. v. Donahoe (Del.) 65 L.R.A. 980, 58 Atl. 513.

The circulation without the state deprived the publisher of privilege.

Buckstaff v. Hicks 94 Wis. 34, 59 Am. St. Rep. 853, 68 N. W. 403; Rude v. Nass, 79 Wis. 321, 24 Am. St. Rep. 717, 48 N. W. 555; State v. Haskins, 109 Iowa, 656, 47 L.R.A. 223, 77 Am. St. Rep. 560, 80 N. W.

An open letter, containing false defamatory matter relating to an applicant for appointment to a public office by the common council of a municipality, is not privileged, where published in a newspaper of wide circulation, although, in the absence of express malice, it would have been privileged if confined to the appointing power. Hunt v. Bennett, 19 N. Y. 173.

Effect of casual presence of third persons.

The mere fact that casual bystanders, not legally interested in the communication complained of, are present and hear it, is not of itself sufficient to remove the privilege. Fahr v. Hayes, supra.

The casual presence of bystanders or other servants at a time when a master accuses his servant of a theft will not of itself de-

The article was privileged even if the charges were untrue.

Castle v. Houston, 19 Kan. 417, 27 Am. Rep. 127.

Burch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In August, 1904, the plaintiff held the office of attorney general of the state, and prive the words of their privileged character. Gildner v. Busse, 3 Ont. L. Rep. 561.

A bulletin by officers of a corporation, containing libelous charges against a former employee, posted in different offices of the company, otherwise privileged, does not lose that character by the mere fact that persons not interested therein, in casually passing, through the office, have seen it. Sheftall v. Central R. Co. 123 Ga. 589, 51 S. E. 646.

The privilege which would attach to statements by one of the guardians at a meeting of poor-law guardians as to a clerk's accounts, if made in the presence of the guardians only, is not lost by the presence at the meeting of third persons. Pittard v. Oliver, [1891] 1 Q. B. 474.

The mere presence of an attorney at a shareholders' meeting will not deprive statements by a shareholder as to the competency of an employee of their privileged character. Broughton v. McGrew, 5 L.R.A. 406, 39 Fed. 672.

The fact that an imputation of felony was made in the presence of a third person not legitimately interested therein does not per se remove the privilege; but the circumstances and occasion should be submitted to the jury to determine the motive of the defendant. Padmore v. Lawrence, 11 Ad. & El. 380.

So, where the jury, by its finding, negatives express malice in the utterance of an otherwise privileged slander, the fact that third persons were present and heard the communication is unimportant. Davies v. Sneed, L. R. 5 Q. B. 608.

Charging another with theft is privileged if made in good faith, in the belief that it was true, and without express malice, although made in the presence of others, where made in answer to a question by an interested party, to which such charge was a pertinent answer. Brow v. Hathaway, 13 Allen, 239.

But a statement by an employer in good was a candidate for re-election at the general election, which occurred in the following November. By virtue of his office, he was a member of the commission charged with the management and control of the state school fund. The defendant was the owner and publisher of the Topeka State Journal, a newspaper published at Topeka, and circulated both within and without the state. In the issue of the date mentioned appeared an article purporting to state facts relating to the plaintiff's official conduct in connection with a school-fund transaction, making comment upon them and drawing inferences from them. Deeming the article to be libelous, the plaintiff brought an action for damages against the defendant, alleging that the matter published concerning him was false and defamatory, and that its publication was the fruit of malice. Among other defenses, the defendant pleaded facts which he claimed rendered the article and its publication privileged.

At the trial instructions presenting the plaintiff's view of the law of privilege were refused, and the following instruction was given to the jury instead: "As you have already observed from the statement of the case, defendant claims, as his first defense, that the publication is what is known in law as 'privileged.' A communication made in good faith, upon any subject-matter in which the party communicating has an interest, or in reference to which he has a duty, public or private, either legal, moral, or social, if made to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, is privileged. And, where an article is published and circulated among voters for the sole purpose of giving what the defendant believes to be truthful information concerning a candidate for public office, and for the purpose of enabling such voters to cast their ballot more intelligently, faith, and with the belief that it is true, made to a third person to whom a servant has applied for a position, to the effect that he believes him to have committed larceny while in his employ, while privileged if made privately to such third person, is not privileged if made in the presence of others. Dale v. Harris, 109 Mass. 193.

At first glance it would seem that the last two cases are in conflict. Although decided by the same court, without drawing any distinction, a distinction suggests itself by which they are easily reconciled. In the Brow Case the charge was made in answer to a question put by an interested party to which it was pertinent. The utterer, therefore, could not be said to have the option to choose a time and place. In other words, it was an involuntary statement. In the Dale Case on the other hand, the statement was a voluntary one. On the ground of duty, if made in good faith, such a statement was entitled to protection, but, in making it, it certainly would be the duty of the utterer to do so without unnecessary publicity. It being voluntary, it would be his duty to choose such a time and place as would insure privacy. If he neglected this duty, and made the statement in the presence of disinterested persons, such fact should at least be evidence of express malice.

Webber v. Vincent, 29 N. Y. S. R. 603, 9 N. Y. Supp. 101, held that a statement reflecting upon the chastity of a woman, although a pertinent answer to a question by an interested person, was not privileged where made in the presence of others casually present. The court said that the rule in such cases was that, to be privileged, such a communication must be made only to those interested therein.

Intentional publication to third person.

A communication privileged if made by letter loses its privilege if sent through a telegraph office, where it is necessarily communicated to all the clerks through whose hands it passes. Williamson v. Freer, L. R. 9 C. P. 393.

Although otherwise libelous, a publication to the corporation of the result of an investigation as to the competency of an employee of the company is excused by the relations of the president and directors as an investigating committee from their board; yet the privilege of the officers of the corporation as individuals, or as a corporate body, does not extend to the preservation of the report in evidence in the form of a book for distribution among the stockholders of the corporation, or members of the community. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Quigley, 21 How. 202, 16 L. ed. 73.

An employer about to dismiss a servant, who calls in a third person and in his presence charges the servant with having committed embezzlement, loses the right to claim the protection of privilege. Taylor v. Hawkins, 16 Q. B. 308.

Where the publication by a corporation of a bulletin containing libelous charges against a former employee is not limited to the employees interested in the subject-matter of the publication, but is posted in various places in the office of the company, where it is not only the right of all its employees, but the duty of a large number of them other than those interested therein, to read it, the communication is not privileged. Sheftall v. Central R. Co. supra.

Under such circumstances, however, it is a question for the jury whether the business of the company, at the place where the bulletin was posted, was carried on in such a way that the company must have known at the time it was posted that the persons not interested therein would probably read it. Ibid.

Although disposed of on other grounds, in Denver Public Warehouse Co. v. Holloway, 34 Colo. 432, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 690, 114 Am. St. Rep. 171, 83 Pac. 131, 7 A. & E. Ann.

and the whole thing is done in good faith, and without malice, the article is privileged, although the principal matters contained in the article may be untrue in fact and derogatory to the character of the plaintiff; and in such a case the burden is on the plaintiff to show actual malice in the publication of the article. If you believe from the evidence in this case that on August 20, 1904, plaintiff was a candidate for re-election to the office of attorney general, and that defendant published said article for the sole purpose of giving to the voters of Kansas what he believed to be truthful information concerning the acts of the attorney general, and only for the purpose of enabling such voters to cast their ballots more intelligently, and that the defendant made all reasonable effort to ascertain the facts before publishing the same, and that the whole thing was done in good faith, and without malice toward plaintiff; and if you believe that the bulk of the circulation of the said paper was within the state of Kansas, and that its circulation outside of the state of Kansas was only incidental,—then I instruct you that your verdict must be for the defendant, although you may believe that the principal matters contained in said article are untrue in fact and derogatory to the character of the plaintiff; but, on the contrary, if you should find from the evidence that said article was published with a malicious intent to wilfully wrong and injure plaintiff, then the fact that the article is a privileged one would constitute no defense to this action, and the plaintiff would be entitled to recover such damages as the evidence shows him to have sustained by reason of said publication." In the course of the trial it became material whether the purchasable quality of county bonds offered to the school fund may be predicated upon the equalized valuation of property instead of its assessed valuation, and whether certain manipulations of the public funds in the state treasury were contrary to law. It likewise became necessary for the court to give the jury a definition of a "conspiracy" and to apply the definition to the facts of the case. Instructions tendered by the plaintiff upon these subjects were refused, and exceptions were saved to those given. The following instruction asked by the plaintiff was refused, and an exception noted: "The court instructs you that even though you should believe from all the evidence in this case, if you do so believe it, that the publication of the article as alleged in plaintiff's petition was privileged and justifiable within the limits of the state of Kansas, yet I instruct you that, under the evidence and the pleadings in this case, the publication of such article outside of and beyond the limits of the state of Kansas is neither privileged nor justifiable; and, if you believe from the evidence that publication of said article was made outside of and beyond the limits of the state of Kansas by the circulation of any number of copies of the Topeka State Journal containing said article, the plaintiff in this action is entitled to recover damages for such publication beyond the boundaries and limits of the state of Kansas." No exception was taken to the following instruction, relating to the subject of damages: "In case you find for the plaintiff, the next question for you to determine is the amount of recovery. In this there is no mathematical rule that the court can give you as a guide. You will assess his damages in such sum as will compensate him for all damages he has sustained as a necessary and natural result of the publication of the article charged; and in arriving at this you should consider the injury, if any, to his feelings, and his reputation, and the humiliation, if any, caused by such

Cas. 840, the court said that, if the officers of a corporation, in publishing defamatory matter relating to an employee, exceed the just limits necessary to accomplish the legitimate purpose of protecting the corporation and the employees, such fact may go to the jury as evidence of malice; but the privilege is not lost unless malice in fact existed.

although question of privilege because published to persons not legitimately interested was not specifically considered, are Bradstreet Co. v. Gill, 72 Tex. 115, 2 L.R.A. 405, 13 Am. A much stricter rule of privilege was applied in Beardsley v. Tappan, 5 Blatchf. 497, Fed. Cas. No. 1,189 [reversed on other grounds in 10 Wall. 427, 19 L. ed. 974], holding that the publicity given a false report by a reporting agency as to a tradesman's solvency, by reporting it in a book to which clerks of the agency had access, deprived the report of its otherwise privileged character.

publication, and the injury, if any, to his business and profession. If you find that the article was published maliciously, as hereinbefore defined, you may then, if you see fit, assess damages, called 'punitive damages,' in addition, by way of smart money or punishment to the defendant for having published the article in question, and for the purpose of setting a wholesome example to others. I further instruct you that punitive damages may not be recovered by the plaintiff, nor allowed by you in your verdict, unless you shall first find the plaintiff is entitled to recover actual damages in some amount."

Many special questions were submitted to the jury, among which were the following; the answers returned being appended:

"(1) Does the testimony show that the plaintiff sustained any actual damage by the publication of this article mentioned in his petition? Ans. It does not.

"(2) If you answer the foregoing question in the affirmative, then state in detail of what such actual damage consists? Ans. _____."

"(52) On the 20th day of August, 1904, when said article complained of was published, did said defendant, or any of his employees, have any actual malice of or against the said plaintiff? Ans. No."

The jury found generally for the defendant. A motion for a new trial was overruled and the plaintiff prosecutes error.

The plaintiff claims that the court committed grievous error in its instructions to the jury and by refusing to instruct according to the plaintiff's requests: the instruction upon the subject of privilege being attacked with especial fervency. To this claim the defendant makes two answers: First, that the instructions given state the law; and, second, that, even if error was committed in giving and refusing instructions, it has become inconsequential in view of the special finding that the plaintiff suffered no damages from the publication of the article which occasioned the suit. The plaintiff replies that the finding referred to was induced by the instructions assailed, although they relate to other branches of the controversy. Beyond their importance to the immediate parties, the questions raised are of the utmost concern to all the people of the state. What are the limitations upon the right of a newspaper to discuss the official character and conduct of a public official who is a candidate for re-election by popular vote to the office which he holds? What are the limitations upon the authority of this court to overturn a verdict and judgment, and to remand a case for retrial, upon a claim that an error of the district court respecting a particular feature of the litigation has tainted the whole result? The Constitution contains a provision which reads as follows: "The liberty of the press shall be inviolate; and all persons may freely speak, write, or publish their sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of such right: and in all civil or criminal actions for libel the truth may be given in evidence to the jury, and, if it shall appear that the alleged libelous matter was published for justifiable ends, the accused party shall be acquitted." Bill of Rights, § 11. The Constitution supplies no definition of the term "liberty of the press." A right existing at the time the Constitution was adopted is guaranteed, the nature and extent of which must be ascertained by looking elsewhere. Frequently it is said that the expression was used in the sense it bears in the common law. If so, the question arises: The common law at what stage of its development? Certainly not the common law of England as it existed when first transplanted to this country by our forefathers in the fourth year of the reign of King James I. (1607). All printing was then subservient to royal proclamations and prohibitions, charters of privilege, license and monopoly, and decrees of the Court of Star Chamber. The newspaper proper did not appear until 1622, and the beginnings of the modern law of libel find their source in the Star Chamber decision De Libellis Famosus, rendered in 1609. Nothing like a definition could be framed from the law of England at any subsequent period. When the Court of Star Chamber was abolished in 1641, Parliament assumed the prerogative respecting the licensing of publications which it had held, and the press did not become free from this restraint until 1694. Its liberty was then more theoretical than actual on account of the harshness of the law of libel, and the manner in which that law was administered in the courts. The long struggle against the courts, culminating in the passage of the libel law of 1792, with which the names of Fox, Erskine, and Camden are so honorably and brilliantly associated, is familiar history. The statutes de scandalis magnatum were not formally repealed until 1887, although prosecutions under them ceased long before. A species of censorship survives in the act of 1843 requiring new plays to be submitted to the Lord Chamberlain for examination and approval, and the present state of the law of England on the subject of defamation is described in an essay, "History and Theory of the Law of Defamation," in 3 Columbia Law Review, 546, as follows: "Unfortunately the English law of defamation is not the deliberate product of any period. It is a mass which has grown by aggregation, with very little intervention from legislation, and special and peculiar circumstances have from time to time shaped its varying course. The result is that perhaps no other branch of the law is as open to criticism for its doubts and difficulties, its meaningless and grotesque anomalies. It is, as a whole, absurd in theory, and very often mischievous in its practical operation."

Little aid is supplied by a consideration of our own colonial history and the early history of our separate national existence. The colonies followed closely the practice of the mother country. Even the publication of general laws was forbidden by the magistrates, who yielded only after long and bitter struggles. Royal governors were instructed to prohibit printing, books were burned as offenders against the public welfare, and the school histories all tell about Governor Berkley's boast that free schools and printing presses were not allowed in Virginia. The proceedings of the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States were conducted in secret. The provision forbidding Congress to pass any law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press came into the Constitution by way of an amendment. The debates of the Senate did not become open to the public until 1793, and the incident of the ill-starred sedition law in our constitutional history shows how far ideas relating to the protection of personal character and governmental institutions were then unreconciled in legal theory with freedom of thought and expression upon public questions. At the time the Constitution of this state was adopted some progress had been made, and some clarification had taken place. But statutory improvement had been halting and inefficient, judicial decisions had often been narrow, illiberal, and confusing, and the main principles of the law of libel remained substantially the same as they were when Blackstone wrote. The result is that "liberty of the press" is still an undefined term, and, like some other familiar phrases of constitutional law, must remain undefined. Certain boundaries are fairly discernible within which the liberty must be displayed, but precise rules cannot be formulated in advance to govern its exercise on particular occasions. In the decision of controversies the character, the organization, the needs, and the will of society at the present time must be given due consideration. The press as we know it to-day is almost as modern as the telephone and the phonograph. The functions which it performs at the present stage of our social development, if not substantially different in kind from what they have been, are magnified many fold, and the opportunities for its influence are multiplied many times. Judicial interpretation must take cognizance of these facts. As Chief Justice Cockburn said in deciding a famous libel suit: "Whatever disadvantages attach to a system of unwritten law, and of these we are fully sensible, it has at least this advantage: That its elasticity enables those who administer it to adapt it to the varying conditions of society, and to the requirements and habits of the age in which we live, so as to avoid the inconsistencies and injustice which arise when the law is no longer in harmony with the wants and usages and interests of the generation to which it is immediately applied." Wason v. Walter (1868) L. R. 4 Q. B. 73, 93. The constitutional guaranty clearly means that the press shall be free from previous government license, and the decisions are quite uniform, but not unanimous, that it shall be free from court censorship through injunctions against publication. Early writers on constitutional law and early cases say that it means no more, but later commentators and later decisions maintain that it does mean more. Thus, Judge Cooley has said: "But, while we concede that liberty of speech and of the press does not imply complete exemption from responsibility for everything a citizen may say or publish, and complete immunity to ruin the reputation or business of others so far as falsehood and detraction may be able to accomplish that end, it is nevertheless believed that the mere exemption from previous restraints cannot be all that is secured by the constitutional provisions, inasmuch as of words to be uttered orally there can be no previous censorship, and the liberty of the press might be rendered a mockery and a delusion, and the phrase itself a byword, if, while every man was at liberty to publish what he pleased, the public authorities might nevertheless punish him for harmless publications. . . . The evils to be prevented were not the censorship of the press merely, but any action of the government by means of which it might prevent such free and general discussion of public matters as seems absolutely essential to prepare the people for an intelligent exercise of their rights as citizens. The constitutional liberty of speech and of the press, as we understand it, implies a right to freely utter and publish whatever the citizen may please, and to be protected against any responsibility for so doing, except so far as such publications, from their blasphemy, obscenity, or scandalous character, may be a public offense, or as by their falsehood and malice they may injuriously affect the standing, reputation, or pecuniary interests of individuals." Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. 603, 604.

This doctrine was recently authoritatively stated by the supreme court of North Carolina as follows: "In its broadest sense, freedom of the press includes not only exemption from censorship, but security against laws enacted by the legislative department of the government, or measures resorted to by either of the other branches for the purposes of stifling just criticism or muzzling public opinion." Cowan v. Fairbrother, 118 N. C. 406, 32 L.R.A. 829, 54 Am. St. Rep. 733, 24 S. E. 212. Such, also, is the opinion of the supreme court of Texas. Whatever more than freedom from previous license the constitutional guaranty may include, it is clear that it does not grant immunity for the publication of articles which imperil the public peace by advocating the murder of governmental officers and the destruction of organized society. Constitutional government may at least protect its own life, and Johann Most was properly convicted under a statute designed to secure the public peace, because of an article appearing in his newspaper, the "Freiheit," instigating revolution and murder, suggesting the persons to be murdered through the positions occupied and the duties performed by them, advising all persons to discharge their duty to the human race by murdering those who enforce law, denouncing those who would spare ministers of justice as guilty of a crime against humanity, and naming poison and dynamite as agencies to be employed in murder and destruction. People v. Most, 171 N. Y. 423, 58 L.R.A. 509, 64 N. E. 175. Constitutional government may also, under its police power, take reasonable steps to protect the morals of the people for whom and by whom it is instituted, and to this end may suppress the circulation of newspapers which, like the Kansas City Sunday Sun of infamous memory, are devoted largely to the publication of scandals, lechery, assignations, intrigues of men and women, and other immoral conduct. Re Banks, 56 Kan. 242, 42 Pac. 693; State v. Van Wye, 136 Mo. 227, 58 Am. St. Rep. 627, 37 S. W. 938; Strohm v. People, 160 Ill. 582, 43 N. E. 622. Likewise, newspapers may be suppressed which are made up principally of criminal news, police reports, and pictures and stories of bloodshed, lust, and crime. State v. McKee, 73 Conn. 18, 49 L.R.A. 542, 84 Am. St. Rep. 124, 46 Atl. 409. Newspapers like those just described display the licentiousness, and not the liberty, of the press. Here, as elsewhere in our political system, just rules and regulations are not badges of oppression, but are the necessary conditions of true liberty, and the constitutional guaranty under discussion is not opposed to penal and remedial laws upon the 20 L.R.A. (N.S.)

subject of libel and the regulation of procedure in the conduct of libel cases. Even in these days when the amassing of wealth absorbs so much of the energy of the race, it may still be said that a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches. Among sovereign states that "decent respect to the opinions of mankind" which prompted the appeal to public opinion made in our own Declaration of Independence is the chief sanction for the great body of rules known and observed as international law. The terror of social reprobation and public disgrace induces observance of the criminal law more than fear of fine and imprisonment. The desire to meet social standards of virtue contributes to business integrity. While the approval of conscience is a strong force and may righteously isolate the martyr and the reformer for a time, the love of deserved social esteem, the innate craving for the social crown of "well done," is a most powerful motive to good conduct with the great mass of mankind. Without doubt it is responsible for a large share of our mental, moral, and material progress. A good reputation honestly earned is not only one of the most satisfying sources of a man's own contentment, but from a commercial standpoint it is one of the most productive kinds of capital he can possess. Therefore, it ought to find guaranties of protection in the fundamental law along with those which guard liberty of the press, and such is indeed the case. The provision of the Bill of Rights quoted takes for granted a law of libel, and § 18 of that document places injury to reputation on the same plane with injury to person and property. It reads as follows: "All persons, for injuries suffered in person, reputation, or property, shall have remedy by due course of law, and justice administered without delay." Gen. Stat. 1901, § 100. It is very clear that these words cannot, however, be given unlimited signification and force in all cases. Where the public welfare is concerned, the individual must frequently endure injury to his reputation without remedy.

In some situations an overmastering duty obliges a person to speak, although his words bring another into disrepute. Such is the case of a witness testifying to relevant facts in court. Reasons of public policy forbid that the question of malice in his mind should be investigated, and the communication he makes, although damaging in the extreme, is absolutely privileged. He may be prosecuted for perjury, but a civil action based upon his statements is not permitted. "A man may be defamed by an unjust removal from office on unfounded charges, by injurious testimony given in courts of justice, by the unwarranted deductions of counsel in presenting his case adversely to the jury, and in many other ways where notwithstanding the agent in the injury was wholly free from legal fault. Thus a great public character may perhaps suffer in reputation all his lifetime from an impeachment for an offense never in fact committed; yet, if the impeachment was instituted in good faith, and on grounds apparently sufficient, those concerned in it only performed a public duty. We unhesitatingly recognize the fact that in many cases, however damaging it may be to individuals, there should and must be legal immunity for free speaking; and that justice and the cause of good government would suffer if it were otherwise. With duty often comes a responsibility to speak openly and act fearlessly, let the consequences be what they may; and the party upon whom the duty was imposed must be left accountable to conscience alone, or perhaps to a supervising public sentiment, but not to the courts." Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. 246. In other situations there may be an obligation to speak, which, although not so imperative, will, under certain conditions, prevent the recovery of damages by a party suffering injury from the statements made. There are social and moral duties of less perfect obligation than legal duties, which may require an interested person to make a communication to another having a corresponding interest. In such a case the occasion gives rise to a privilege qualified to this extent. Anyone claiming to be defamed by the communication must show actual malice, or go remediless. This privilege extends to a great variety of subjects, and includes matters of public concern, public men, and candidates for office. Under a form of government like our own, there must be freedom to canvass in good faith the worth of character and qualifications of candidates for office, whether elective or appointive, and, by becoming a candidate, or allowing himself to be the candidate of others, a man tenders as an issue to be tried out publicly before the people or the appointing power his honesty, integrity, and fitness for the office to be filled.

In the case of Wason v. Walker, L. R. 4 Q. B. 73, already cited, the question for decision was whether a report of a debate in Parliament containing matter disparaging to the character of an individual, spoken in the course of debate, furnished ground for an action of libel by the party whose character was called in question. The court held that it was not, and in the opinion of Chief Justice Cockburn it is said: "The other and the broader principle on which this exception to the general law of libel is founded is that the advantage to the community from publicity being given to the proceedings of courts of justice is so great that the occasional inconvenience to individuals, arising from it, must yield to the general good. It is true that, with a view to distinguish the publication of proceedings in Parliament from that of proceedings of courts of justice, it has been said that the immunity accorded to the reports of the proceedings of courts of justice is grounded on the fact of the courts being open to the public, while the houses of Parliament are not; as also that, by the publication of the proceedings of the courts, the people obtain a knowledge of the law by which their dealings and conduct are to be regulated. But in our opinion the true ground is that given by Lawrence, J., in R. v. Wright, 8 T. R. 298, namely, that, 'though the publication of such proceedings may be to the disadvantage of the particular individual concerned, yet it is of vast importance to the public that the proceedings of courts of justice should be universally known. The general advantage to the country in having these proceedings made public more than counterbalances the inconvenience to the private persons whose conduct may be the subject of such proceedings.' In Davidson v. Duncan, 7 El. & Bl. 231, Lord Campbell says: 'A fair account of what takes place in a court of justice is privileged. The reason is that the balance of public benefit from publicity is great. It is of great consequence that the public should know what takes place in court; and the proceedings are under the control of the judges. The inconvenience, therefore, arising from the chance of injury to private character, is infinitesimally small as compared to the convenience of publicity.' And Wightman, J., says: 'The only foundation for the exception is the superior benefit of the publicity of judicial proceedings which counterbalances the injury to individuals, though that at times may be great.'" Paraphrasing this language, it is of the utmost consequence that the people should discuss the character and qualifications of candidates for their suffrages. The importance to the state and to society of such discussions is so vast and the advantages derived are so great that they more than counterbalance the inconvenience of private persons whose conduct may be involved, and occasional injury to the reputations of individuals must yield to the public welfare, although at times such injury may be great. The public benefit from publicity is so great and the chance of injury to private character so small that such discussion must be privileged.

The law of libel which the Constitution takes for granted gives expression to and room for the operation of these fundamental principles of public policy, and the Bill of Rights must be interpreted accordingly. Section 11 of the Bill of Rights sets off the inviolability of liberty of the press from the right of all persons freely to speak, write, or publish their sentiments on all subjects; and this fact has given rise to claims on the part of newspaper publishers of special privileges not enjoyed in common by all. Whether such claims are just need not be decided in order to determine the rights of the parties to this litigation. So far they have been rejected by the courts, and the present consensus of judicial opinion is that the press has the same rights as an individual, and no more. The basis of the contention for a more liberal indulgence lies in the modern conditions which govern the collection of news items and the insistent popular expectation that newspapers will expose, and the popular demand that they shall expose, actual and suspected fraud, graft, greed, malfeasance, and corruption in public affairs and questionable conduct on the part of public men and candidates for office without stint, leaving to the people themselves the final verdict as to whether charges made or opinions expressed were justified.

Neither is it necessary in this case to define the word "sentiments," used in § 11 of the Bill of Rights. If that word means no more than thoughts, judgments, opinions, or notions, and the section does not protect freedom to make assertions of fact, still a more liberal libel law would not violate it. The Constitution guarantees to the individual a minimum of liberty. Other law is not forbidden to secure a larger measure. There is great diversity of opinion regarding the extent to which discussions of the fitness of candidates for office may go. In England and Canada the limit is fixed at criticism and comment, which, however, may be severe, if fair, and may include the inferring of motives for conduct in fact exhibited if there be foundation for the inference. In some of our own states the rule is more liberal, while in others it is more narrow. According to the greater number of authorities, the occasion giving rise to conditional privilege does not justify statements which are untrue in fact, although made in good faith, without malice and under the honest belief that they are true. A minority allows the privilege under such circumstances. The district court instructed the jury according to the latter view, and the instruction given has the sanction of previous decisions of this court.
